has already reached seventeen parts, the last number, which is devoted to Anecdotes of Genius, appear to us not only the most interesting, but we suspect, presents as strong a claim to originality as any of its predecessors. By originality, we must not be understood to assert that the facts illustrative of genius are entirely new to us, but that they are generally such as have not been detached as anecdotes or not very generally known. The subject is one that affords much variety of incident, and this volume presents genius in almost all its shapes, and often under peculiar circumstances of peculiar interest. The following are extracts:—

'Tourneur.—Monsieur de Tourneur, the elegant translator of Young's Night Thoughts, sold the version for the trifling sum of twenty-five louis d'ors, to a Madame de C—, who at least made sixty thousand livres of the work! While de Tourneur was translating Young, and adding new energy to his native language, he was seldom indulged with a bed to repose his wearied limbs on; being often obliged with his wife to leave Paris before night, to seek the most convenient and hospitable hedge in the environs of the capital, under which they might wait the dawn of the succeeding day, fraught with equal misery.'

'Lovelace.

'"Dinnerless the polish'd Lovelace died."

C. DVEN.

'Colonel Sir Richard Lovelace was an amiable and accomplished man, who lived in the time of the civil wars: by the men, respected for his moral worth and literary talents; by the fair sex, almost idolized for the elegance of his person, and the sweetness of his manners. He was author of a collection of poems, intitled Lucasta, printed in 1649; and which possess great merit. Being a great loyalist, he was appointed by the people of Kent to deliver their petition to the House of Commons for the restoration of Charles, and for settling the government. The petition giving offence, he was committed to the Gate House, Westminster, where he wrote that well-known and elegant little song, "Loyalty Confined," beginning thus:—

"When Love with unconfined wings,
Hovers within my gates;
And my divine Altiva brings,
To whisper at my grates;
When I lie tangled in her hair,
And fettered in her eye;
The birds that wait on in the air,
Know no such liberty."

'After a few months' confinement, he obtained his liberation; but having, by that time, consumed all his estate, partly by furnishing the king with men and money, and partly by assisting ingenious persons of every description in difficulties; he became himself, not long after, involved in the greatest distress, and fell into a deep melancholy; which brought on a consumption, and made him as poor in person as in purse, till he became the object even of common charity. The man, who, in the days of his gallantry, wore cloth of gold, was now naked, or half covered only with filthy rags! he who had thrown splendour on palaces, now shrunk into obscure and dirty alleys; he who had associated with princes, had banquetted on dainties, been the patron of the indigent, the admiration of the wise and brave, the darling of the chaste and fair, was now fain to herd with beggars, gladly to partake of their coarse offals, and thankfully receive their twice given alms:—

“To hovel him with swine and rogues forlorn,
In short and musty straw.”

‘Worn out with misery, he at length expired in 1658, at a very mean and wretched lodging, in Gunpowder Alley, near Shoe Lane, and was buried at the west end of St. Bride’s Church, Fleet Street.’

‘Crebillon.—When Crebillon was composing his tragedy of Cataline, a friend called on him, and was surprised to see four large ravens sitting at his elbow. “Walk gently, my good friend,” said the poet, “walk gently, or you will put my conspirators to flight.”

“In his last illness, Crebillon expressed great regret that he should not live to finish the play which he had in hand, having gone through two acts of it only. The physician who attended him, begged that he would bequeath him the two acts. Crebillon turned to him, and, with a smile, repeated a line from one of the acts:—

‘Moods of Writing.—Aristotle mentions a poet, who never wrote to well as when his poetic fury hurried him into a kind of phrenzy. The admirable pictures we have in Tasso’s Armida and Clorinda, were drawn at the expense of a disposition he had to real madness, into which he fell before he died. “Do you imagine,” says Cicero, “that Pacuvius wrote in cold blood? No; it was impossible. He must have been inspired with a kind of fury, to be able to write such admirable verses.”

“In the modes which have been taken of exciting the mind to particular temperaments, there is a strange contrariety. Dryden used to ply himself with physic and phlebotomy before sitting down to any important work; Blackstone never penned a line without a bottle of old Port at his elbow; while Dr. Johnson, a very dray-horse in literary drudgery, used to laugh at all such preparatives, and to contend that a man was worth nothing, who could not write equally well at all times and under all circumstances.”

‘Walter Scott.—It is not generally known, that there was a poet of the name of Walter Scott, before the present celebrated bard. He lived about the middle of the seventeenth century, and describes himself as—“An old souldier and no scholler;

And one that can write none
But just the letters of his name.”

“On the death of his grandfather, Sir Robert Scott, of Thirlstone, his father having no means to bring up his children, put this Walter to attend cattle in the field; “but,” said he, “I gave them the short cut at last, and left the kine in the care; and ever since that time, I have continued a souldier abroad and at home.” He left a poem written at the age of seventy-three, dedicated to two gentlemen of the name of Scott, which he thus concludes:—

“—Broom my book, stretch forth thy wings and fly

Amongst the nobles and gentility;
Thou art not to sell to scavengers and clowns,
But given to worthy persons of renown.
The numbers few I’ve printed in regard,
My charges have been great, and I hope reward;

I caused not print many above twelve score,
And the printers are engaged that they shall print no more.”

The part is dedicated to Mr. Southey, and contains a very neat portrait of the poet laureat. We presume that the brothers Percy had not seen the ‘Vision of Judgment,’ when they selected its author par excellence, as the representative of genius.

LETTER FROM W. B. I.

TO THE EDITOR.

MY DEAR —.—In the name of all that is heavenly, how long dost thou intend to winter in that vilest of all vile abodes—London? Of a verity, thine abiding hath alarmed me much; and, did I not perceive thy head and hand impressed upon the pages of thy periodical, I should imagine thou wert a subject for some city Galen.

Thy last epistle to me, my right good friend, beareth date in January last; albeit, I have replied thereunto three several times, and yet have I received no rejoinder. Now, in sober solemnity, this is too bad,—and I should have felt in my heart to have ‘cut’ thee quite, but that I have pondered on thy avocations,—independently of which, too, my affectionate rib hath whispered into mine ear, that the month of thy wonted sojourning approacheth, and the remembrance of thy exquisite jocundity foreth a smile upon the lips that were almost resolved upon eternal compression to thee.

However, as I propose to place thee upon trial once (mind, only once) more,

I shall e’en forget and forgive past misconduct, and t. l. l. thee, that on May-day, at four a. m. all eyes from ——— Lodge will be directed whither the park, towards the King’s highway, and the first machine-hauling quadruple of quadrupeds we behold—look that thou be with them; if not, ———

This being dispatched, now for some inquiries as touching thee and thine, (idelicet,) the Chronicle; but, per-adventure, I should first tell of internal impressions. It makes a marvellous stir in the country round abouts, I promise thee. But, to the bar of all jesting, my dear fellow, I must very heartily congratulate you upon your extensiveness and extending influence;—your sale in this quarter is absolutely astounding, and there is some talk of the establishment of paper-mills upon the strength of it here—trusting to the advantage of my brotherhood to thee; but of this, more anon.

By the by, who is this ‘W. H. PARRY,’ that writes such flaming articles in you? He is, certes, a devilish shrewd dog—none of your milk and water men—one who knows how to enjoy a delicious garden without shoving his proboscis into every hole and corner, to find out weeds and dandelions—and can smell a rose as he should do, without pricking his fingers. I must know this Mr. Parry—do get him to come down with you. I see the name of one ‘SAM SPIRITSAIL,’ too—he’s no fool let me tell you; I wish he would take some appellation less villainous,—I never see it without thinking of Wapping—a place of all others—but you know Wapping; you may shake hands with him for me, if you please, but say nothing of the invitation to Parry, (Sam’s a good fellow, and I should be loth to hurt his heart;) but my place, you know, is more of a box than a castle, and I should not find room for all your clever contributors.

Our friend ——— will be there—he promises to give you some extracts of his projected work, for which I beg to say you must thank my exertions. That will certainly make a buzz in the world, I suspect; when you notice it, try to restrain your admiration, and speak with the coldest equanimity. You recollect when I exhibited to you his paragraph on the ———, intimating that it was the prosing of old Parson S. (as great a blockhead, you know, out of the way of drinking and rabbit-shooting, as ever took orders.) I thought you would go mad—you swore ’twas excellent—absolutely divine—and when I introduced you to each other, good Lord! what lore and logic followed—faith, I thought half-a-dozen of such heads would set the world in flames, in a month, (lunar,) and I am not now sure that seven would not do the job.

I have a strong idea of publishing some of my doggerel; Longman and his host of adjuncts have offered me £50l. but I refused—not from vanity, (no, 'pon my honour,) but I wish to stand upon my own merits, and challenge the true opinion of the world.

An Oxford friend of mine (a M. A.) spoke to me the other day about your paper,—hinting, that if you had any wish to retire from the conduct of it, a 'cool' £2000. would be at your service,—muttering something about advances on a contingency; I almost think I affronted him, for I laughed in his face,—I made the amende honorable as well as I could, however, by mentioning its high solicitation over the water.

But I must, pro tempore, hold my peace, for the Bath vellum is (are not you?) exhausted, and your friend D. is attending to his duties, near St. Stephens, so that I have not a frank for it; therefore, my dear ———, believe me,

Thine absolutely and for ever,

W. B. L.

P. S. I fancy I must soon borrow a coltman or two in your paper, for the purpose of doing a good deed. There happen to be sundry worthy literati whose knuckles require to be rapped, and as I have had a rod in my pickling jar for some time past, I shall speedily make an application of it; you guess to whom I am making allusion,—therefore mum.

ANCIENT COIN.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—I am ashamed to be so troublesome to you and your readers, but since I sent my letter, which appeared in your last Chronicle, I have discovered that on the reverse side of the coin, found in Spa Fields, are these letters,—D A V D. As it may throw much light on the information which I have already communicated, I trust you will indulge me with this note's insertion. Your's, &c. P.

THE INNS OF COURT, &c. &c.

Grays Inn.—A nother and last of the inns of court; so named from the ancient and noble family of the Grays having resided here from A. D. 1315, until the latter end of the reign of King Henry the Seventh. But notwithstanding this residence of the Grays, it is observed from good authority, that the students of the law held this house by lease from the Lord Gray of Wilton, in King Edward the Third's reign; and, about eight years after, a bargain and sale of the manor of Port Pool (or Grays Inn), made to Hugh Denys, the prior and monks of Sheene, near Richmond, got licence to purchase lands in mortmain to the value of 100l. per annum; and, accordingly, they had granted to them the said manor with the appurtenances, four messuages, four gardens, one croft, eight acres of land, and which the said prior and monks of Sheene possessed, and which they devised to the students of the law for the rent of 6l. 13s. 4d. per annum, as appears by the register of the house, and which they so held until the general dissolution of monasteries by Parliament, 30th Henry VIII.; which then coming to the crown was granted to them soon after by the said king in fee, in the 32d Henry VIII.; the said rent of 6l. 13s. 4d. was paid to the king's use for one whole year as per the accounts of the treasurers. Vid. Orig. Jur. p. 172. and this has continued ever since.

The first reader of this house was John Spelman, Esq. A. D. 1516, first treasurer, A. D. 1530.

There are several coats of arms in the hall, among which are those of Lord Gray of Wilton; Sir Nicholas Bacon, keeper of the great seal; Sir Francis Bacon, Baron of Verulam; and Sir John Spelman, one of the judges of the King's Bench.

As to the buildings,—the chapel is supposed to have been erected soon after the inn was established: it is of the Gothic order, and appears to have undergone a thorough repair in 1699; there are no burials in it, nor, consequently, any monuments. The roof of the hall is finely built of oak timber in the manner of Westminster Hall.

Serjeant's Inns.—Are two, the one situate on the south side of Fleet Street, opposite Fetter Lane; the other in Chancery Lane, on the east side, and near the end adjoining to Clifford's Inn.

Mr. Stow says these inns were intended solely for the use of the judges and serjeants.—(Vide prefatory remarks to these inns).

The one in Fleet Street was destroyed by fire on the 1st January 1702, and rebuilt A. D. 1703. There is in each a hall and chapel.

Barnard's Inn.—An inn of chancery belonging to Gray's Inn, situate on the south side of Holborn, near Castle Street; it was anciently called Mackworth's Inn, as given by the executors of John Mackworth, Dean of Lincoln, A. D. 1453, about which time it is believed to have been made an inn of chancery.

Clement's Inn.—Also an inn of chancery, situate near St. Clement's Church, (not so called from the well,) but both the church, inn, and well from the pope to whom the church was dedicated, Clement,—a word signifying mild, and of which name there have been one bishop and many popes of Rome; it is believed that the church was dedicated to Clement the First, who was (according to Dr. Heylin's Catalogue of the Bishops and Popes of Rome,) the first after St. Peter, who had the charge of the Christian church about the year of Christ 94. Mr. Stow says, the word Danes was annexed because Harold*, a Danish king, and other Danes were here buried. It is supposed the students of the law had their inns or lodgings here about A. D. 1478. It is said to have descended to the Earls of Clare from Sir William Hollis, lord mayor of London, A. D. 1539, who had it from one Cantlow, about the year 1528.

Clifford's Inn.—Another of the inns of chancery, situate on the north side of Fleet Street, by Saint Dunstons Church, and so named as being the city residence of the honourable family of the Cliffords (from whom the Earls of Cumberland descended,) Robert de Clifford having the inheritance thereof by grant from King Edward the Second, A. D. 1309, to hold by the service of one penny paid into the exchequer at Michaelmas; and it came to the king for certain debts due to him from one Malcolm de Harley, pledge to Edward the First, on this side the Trent; and the widow of the said Robert demised it, A. D. 1337, to students in the common law for the rent of 10l. and afterwards by a grant thereof to Nicholas Sulyard, Esq. principal of this house, and other seniors, in consideration of 600l. and 4l. per annum, which is most probably continued to the lawyers ever since.

* Harold's body was taken up and thrown into the Thames by order of Hardicanute, and was afterwards found by a fisherman and buried in this church-yard.

Furnival's Inn.—Another of the inns of chancery, situate on the north side of Holborn, almost opposite Fetter Lane. It was given the name of Furnival from having been the house of the family of the Lord Furnivals, and was at last let out in tenements to lawyers, who it appears resided here A. D. 1407.

Lyon's Inn.—Also an inn of chancery, situate on the south side of Wych Street, has been known as an inn ever since the year 1420, its foundation being uncertain.

New Inn.—An inn of chancery, situate on the north side of Wych Street, to which place this society is supposed to have removed from Sea Coal Lane, to be for their convenience nearer to the other inns of court and chancery.

This place was before their removal a common hostery, or inn known by the sign of the 'Blessed Virgin,' and was procured from Sir John Fineux, sometime Lord Chief Justice of England, for the rent of 6l. per annum, and they were to be considered as tenants at will.

Staple's Inn.—Another inn of chancery, situate on the south side of Holborn, a little eastward from Middle Row. It appears by tradition to have been so called from its being formerly a stall where wool merchants used to meet (wool being one of the four staple commodities mentioned by the statutes).

It likewise appears to have been an inn of chancery in A. D. 1415, and probably long before that time; and was held by lease, and the inheritance granted by John Knighton and Alice his wife, to the ancestors of Gray's Inn, about 10th Henry 8th, by the name of all the messuage or inn of chancery called Staple Inn.

Thavie's Inn.—Also an inn of chancery, situate on the south side of Holborn, almost opposite Hatton Garden, called Thavie's from one Mr. John Thavy, whose house it was in the reign of Edward the Third, and at the same time an hostel or inn for the apprentices (says his will) of the law; and coming afterwards into the possession of Gregory Nichols, citizen and mercer of London, he, in the year 1549, granted it to the benchers of Lincoln's Inn, and their successors, who demised it to the principal and fellows of this house for 3l. 6s. 8d. with the like privilege as at Furnival's Inn, as to the gentlemen's admission.

Simmond's Inn.—Situate on the east side of Chancery Lane, is not an inn of Chancery: its origin is dubious; it is chiefly occupied by attorneys, &c.

FORGET-ME-NOT.

To—

My love,—'t'other day, as we stray'd
O'er meads where wild flowers were growing,
'Mongst others that beauty display'd,—
One sweet little flow'et was blowing;
How pensive it hung its small head,
How modest its charms were display'd,
It shrank from the sight as with dread,
That the day had its beauty expos'd.
Forget-me-not, plaintive I sigh'd,
Is the name of the delicate flow'r!
'Forget me not!' sweet you replied,
'Forget me not,' while in your power.
Our eyes then our feelings impart,
And all that was ever express'd
By language, was felt in each heart,
And vented in sighs from each breast.
My love, this same sweet little flow'r,
Whose name will be dear to me ever,
A lesson has taught from that hour,
No time from my bosom can sever;
'Forget me not,' should we ere part,
Is the bosom's soft language of each,
Thus the little blue flow'r to the heart;—
Tells all that whole volumes can teach.

ENCOURAGEMENT.

INSCRIBED TO ELIZA *.

WHoso'er the youth that hath left thee so lone,
That thy love is sunk deeply from melody's tone;
Far, far, may he wander o'er ocean and land,
And be toss'd on the waves, and be wreck'd on the sand;
May his heart-strings be wither'd, his prospects decay'd;
If he listen not back to his desolate maid;—
If the strings of conviction, with sorrows that burn,
Do not check his career, and inspire his return.
Oh die not, thou feminine sufferer, in love!
There are trials and traits that their sweetnessness prove;
After storms there are rainbows of sunshine so bright,
That the cloudy-hued morn rests in beauty at night;—
There are flowers, that were sinking to earth in despair,
Updrawn by the gentle compassionate air:—
So thy grief into comfort and life may be sigh'd,
And thou be his happy and delicate bride!
Is thy heart not o'erpress'd when remembrance portrays,
In the sadness of fancy, the past of thy days?
Is the present not gloomy, because of thy tears?
Will the future be more so,—impeded by fears?
Imagine new pleasures, tread angelic benights,
And entwine thy white brow with a fanciful wreath;
Whence thee not yet on the tomb and grave up,
While one drop of affection remain in Hope's cup.

Fine Arts.

BRITISH GALLERY.—No. V. (Concluded.)

'The cunning painters that with curious care
Limning a landscape, various, rich, and rare,
Have set to work, in all and every part,
Invention, judgment, nature, use, and art.'

ANON.

THE south room of the gallery of the British Institution, upon which we now intend to offer our concluding observations, contains, we think, more to like, less to disappoint us, and less to admire, than either of the preceding divisions. There are fewer failures and a greater proportion of respectably executed pictures, than we find either in the north or middle compartments of the exhibition, while there is comparatively much less of excellence to attract the attention or gratify the judgment. This is, perhaps, owing, in a great measure, to the superabundance of pictures of still life, dead game, and subjects of a similar nature, which we meet with in this room; subjects which, although they admit of great excellence in their several walks, are yet incapable of that strong and almost preternatural superiority with which performances, on a loftier stage of art, are, by the magic of genius, worthy of being invested. They ought, perhaps, in general, rather to be considered as the common places of the imitative arts, useful, indeed, as studies for the acquisition and treasuring up of knowledge and of skill, for the more important branches of design, and not as objects worthy of the sole and exclusive, or even of the principal care of the professor. We have, perhaps, run to too great a length upon this point, but we could not avoid digressing in some degree, for the purpose of warning the lovers of art against a practice which, we are afraid, is gaining ground in our present 'ton of painting. There are, however, some splendid exceptions in the room now under consideration; we believe we need only mention the names of Singleton and the late E. Bird to confirm our opinion. From the pencil of the former we were extremely gratified in recognizing 'the Conversion of the Jailor, by Paul and Silas.' It is a performance replete with intelligence, character, and beauty of composition, not unattended by a considerable degree of practical skill. The character of Paul, energetic and enthusiastic, during the period of his zealous attachment to Judaism, embodied as it is, in the sky scaling glance and rapturous exclamation of triumph, is nobly contrasted with the milder and less strenuous faith of Silas, which finds its vent in the startling emotions of wonder. The sketch for his 'Chevy Chase,' by Mr. Bird, is a strong and vigorous effort of his genius, rough, like the tumult of departed heroism, yet containing, within its unpolished exterior, the remains of the heart that was daring to design, and of the hand that was strong to execute. We were also highly delighted with the 'Satan and Ithuriel,' of the former of these artists: a performance, of which it may be said with justice, that it breathes the very soul of Milton, striking the soul back upon itself in the fearfulness of sublimity, and charming the attention by the exquisite tone of fancy which breathes throughout. The Titanian form of 'Hell's mighty Paramount,' and the angels 'severe in youthful beauty,' are delineated and grouped with exquisite felicity, and the colouring and chiaroscuro of the piece are accordant to the strain of sublimity which ennobles it. The figures of the mortal Dramatis Personæ have, perhaps, hardly enough of the beau ideal to bring to our recollection the state of unalloyed happiness before the fall. 'Jack Cade entering London,' by J. Cawse, is a spirited and effective piece; it brings back to our remembrance all that 'soul of him' which characterises the story as told by our own beloved Shakespeare. The bonnet rouge forming the standard of the ragged and tumultuous troop; the mock majesty, and down-glancing dignity of the ignorant and upstart demagogue; the 'hail Mortimer,' and doffed bonnet of his obsequious companions, are all represented with an infinite vein of humour, which cannot be traced but by ocular scrutiny. There is, perhaps, not quite enough of the disgusting concomitants which are met with in scenes of this nature; it is more like a representation of such an occurrence in a masque of the Elizabethan age, where the characters are supported with all the humour and animation necessary, yet without infringing on those rules of decorum, the absence of which would have converted the palace of a maiden queen into a parallel with the precincts of Thames Street. The 'Quarrel between Pistol and Pym' needs no stronger commendation than merely observing, that it is by the same artist, and well worthy of him. We could not but be delighted with Mr. Hayter's 'Cleopatra'; it is a very pleasing production, and is possessed of much more of mixed excellence than his 'Venus and Mars.' The style of beauty is perfectly national, though of such a nature, that no person could wish it less so; we did indeed 'see Helen's beauty in a bow of Egypt,' understanding the words, however, in a different sense from what was intended by the great master from whom the expression is extracted. For the eye which gives the great fascination to this exquisite painting, we must say to the reader—

'Go, gaze on that of the gazelle,
It will assist thy fancy well.'

Enchanting, however, as is Mr. Hayter's Cleopatra, she is not the classical Cleopatra of antiquity; she is not the Cleopatra, whose style of beauty has been transmitted to us on the imperishable medal; we miss 'the Lion Port, the awe-commanding face,' before which the unconquered soul of a Cæsar could bow in vassalage, enchain'd by a sublimity of beauty worthy of his own nobility of spirit, and not by the luxurious glance of an engaging syren. The Queen of Egypt and the enslaver of the world's enslaver was, we believe, the Cleopatra of Shakespeare, of Beaumont and Fletcher, and not the Cleopatra of Dryden. Having now gone through most of the best pictures in the British Gallery, we shall take our leave of the Institution, merely observing, that with all its excellencies, and with all the good which we know it has been the means of producing in the professional world, we could have wished that it had been rather more exclusively confined to the higher branches of painting. W. H. PARRY.

EXHIBITION OF ENGRAVINGS

BY

LIVING BRITISH ARTISTS.

WHATEVER difference of opinion may exist as to the state of the Fine Arts generally in England, it must be acknowledged, that in the particular branch of Copper-plate Engraving, we have, during the last half century, made the greatest advancement, if not reached the highest pitch of which it is capable. This improvement has diffused itself universally, and its advantages are felt, not only in perpetuating prints from the best paintings, but even in all works where embellishment or ornament is wanted. Our magazines no longer contain heads of individuals 'curiously engraved,' as they were formerly announced, but good portraits, finished in a style which was then quite unknown. Impressed with this conviction, we have long felt that while the painter and the sculptor had galleries in which their works were exhibited, there was no place where the engraver could display the productions of his talents, save in the window of a print-shop. This defect is now remedied, by the public-spirited exertions of Mr. Cooke, who has opened a splendid gallery in Soho Square, where upwards of four hundred of the best productions of living artists are displayed. We have not, at present, room to notice the prints separately, which we defer to a future number, but we most warmly recommend the exhibition to every amateur and patron of the Fine Arts. We quote an extract from the address prefixed to the catalogue, and have much pleasure in adding, that the exhibition is under the immediate patronage of his Majesty:—

'The degree of perfection which the Art of Engraving has attained in this country, will, it is presumed, fully sanction any attempt at bringing the productions of living British engravers more immediately under the notice of an enlightened and generous community.'

'The professors of this interesting and highly useful art, have long felt the necessity of establishing some means of direct communication with its patrons and admirers, and have to regret the little opportunity hitherto afforded to the members of the profession in general, of becoming acquainted even with the nature, much less with the merit and excellence of numerous contemporary works, the display of far the greater number of their productions being necessarily confined to the libraries of the affluent, the folios of the collector, and the private studies of the artist.'

'Impressed with these feelings, the engravers, whose names are herein mentioned, have united for the purpose of bringing their works more immediately before their patrons and the public at large, and have invited their brethren in the profession to co-operate with them, by sending their works to be exhibited.'

M. BELZONI'S EXHIBITION.

M. BELZONI, to whose enterprising exertions we are indebted for some curious and highly interesting discoveries in Egypt, has prepared an exhibition of a very novel character, which represents two of the principal chambers in the Egyptian tomb, in which he was the first European that ever penetrated. Having been invited to M. Belzoni's private view, on Friday, we cannot, though at so late a period, pass it over without a slight notice, promising to resume the subject. The two apartments M. B. has selected for representing, give a grand idea of the splendour of the whole sepulchre. The figures are cast in plaster of Paris, from impressions taken on the spot, and painted with great exactness and fidelity, from drawings made at the same time. In examining this curious monument, it is as impossible not to observe the rudeness of the figures, as it would be unjust and unreasonable to compare the paintings which have decorated its walls for nearly three thousand years, with the finer specimens of modern art. We cannot now enter into details, but one of the finest painted groups in the whole sepulchre, consists of four figures, and represents the reception of some distinguished personage, by Osiris, the great divinity of the Egyptians. Osiris is seated on his throne of state, supported by pillars, on feet; he holds a book in each hand, and in his left the flail also. King Psammis, with his name on his belt, is presented to him by the Egyptian Apollo Areuris, who has the head of a hawk. Behind Osiris is a female figure, supposed to be the goddess Buto, with a cage and bird over her head.

The whole tablet is surmounted by the winged globe. But the most remarkable feature of the whole embellishment, is a procession of captives; consisting of red men, white men, and negroes. The red men are supposed to be Egyptians, the black-bearded men as Jews, and the tattooed as Persians. Among the Egyptian curiosities, of which M. B. has collected a large quantity, are varieties of idols of stone and wood; a mummy, opened in England a short time ago, and which is the most perfect that has been discovered—the mummy of an Egyptian priest; and a manuscript on Papyrus, measuring twenty-three feet. These are a few of the varieties in this very interesting exhibition, which affords ample conjecture to the curious, elaborate research and study to the antiquary, and abundance of moral reflection to the philosopher.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—With a promptitude 'honourable to the industry,' at least (as the play-bills term the production of the new melo-drama) of this establishment, Lord Byron's tragedy of Marino Faliero was produced at this theatre, on Wednesday night. Those who have read his lordship's preface or our notice of the play, will have seen the wish of his lordship, that his tragedy should not be acted, and may, perhaps, judge of his feeling when he hears how very soon his declared wishes have been frustrated. The circumstances to which this has given rise are, we believe, new in the history of the drama, and are likely to afford much occupation to the Lord Chancellor and the gentlemen of the long robe. The question is, whether a published play can be legally brought on the stage without the consent, or rather in defiance, of the author. We are unwilling to anticipate the decision of the law, but we suspect that it may be acted, although the acted play cannot certainly be published without an invasion of copyright. At an early hour on the evening that the tragedy was produced, hand-bills were plentifully distributed through the theatre, of which the following is a copy:—

'The public are respectfully informed, that the representation of Lord Byron's tragedy, The Doge of Venice, this evening, takes place in defiance of the injunction of the Lord Chancellor, which was not applied for until the remonstrance of the publisher, at the earnest desire of the noble author, had failed in protecting that drama from its intrusion on the stage, for which it was never intended.'

The circulation of this bill excited considerable surprise, and the fact which it disclosed tended to account for the lateness of the hour at which the curtain rose. The plot of the tragedy has been so amply detailed in our review, that we have now no occasion to re-state it. It has been much criticised for the stage; and the curtain-movements have not been judiciously made. The manager seemed to be aware of this, as in the bills of that and preceding evenings, there was the following apology:—

'Those who have perused "Marino Faliero," will have anticipated the necessity of considerable curtain-movements, aware that conversations or soliloquies, however beautiful and interesting in the closet will frequently tire in public recital. This intimation is due to the ardent admirers of Lord Byron's eminent talents, and will, it is presumed, be a sufficient apology for the great freedom used in the representation of this tragedy on the stage of Drury Lane Theatre.'

It has not been merely to conversations and soliloquies that the pruning knife has been confined, but the tragedy has been much shorn of its poetical beauties. The following is a list of the dramatis personæ:—

Bertuccio Faliero, his Nephew, Mr. Thompson
 Marino Faliero, the Doge, Mr. Cooper
 Lioni, a noble Patrician and Senator, } Mr. Foote

Benintende, Chief of the Council of Ten,	} Chief Conspirators,	Mr. Powell
Michael Steno, a young Patrician,		Mr. Willmot
Israel Bertuccio,	}	Mr. Wallack
Philip Calendario,		Mr. Bromley
Dugolino,		Mr. Meredith
Bertram,		Mr. Barnard
Angiolina, wife of the Doge,		Mrs. W. West
Marianna,		Miss Smithson

We have seldom regretted the loss of Kean so much as on the present occasion, for the character of the Doge is as much in his peculiar line as if it had been written for him, and in his hands would have created a powerful effect. Mr. Cooper, however, sustained it very creditably, and displayed considerable judgment in the part; in many of the scenes he merited and received much applause; and in the delivery of one passage, the cheers were three times repeated; we are, however, aware that this was principally owing to the sentiment; the passage we allude to was in the last scene, when the Doge is brought to execution, and he is reproached with his unheard-of crime; he replies—

—'There's not a history
 But shows a thousand crown'd conspirators
 Against the people; but to set them free—
 One sovereign only died, and one is dying.'

Mr. Wallack, as the chief conspirator, played the character well, and gave some of the fine passages of the noble bard with good effect. Mrs. West supported the character of Angiolina very ably, and displayed much pathos in the scene before the senate, where she pleads for the life of her husband. Messrs. Barnard, Bromley, and Thompson, were also entitled to praise; indeed, all the performers exerted themselves to the utmost. The tragedy was not received with the enthusiasm we had anticipated, and there was some slight disapprobation. We almost suspect this was owing to our national prejudices, for which we have been so much reproached, that of having murders and executions exhibited before us on the stage, while, in other countries, they are always done behind the scenes. In this tragedy, the curtain falls when the executioner has raised his sword to give the fatal blow. At the conclusion, Mr. Russell came forward and addressed the audience as follows:—

'Ladies and Gentlemen,—In respect of certain legal proceedings now pending, this property abstains from the pleasure of announcing this tragedy for performance to-morrow evening, but hope very soon to have the honour of announcing its repetition.'

Here the matter rests at present, and most rest until the Lord Chancellor decides the question, which we hope he will soon do, as it involves a question of the utmost importance as to literary property.

On Tuesday, a new drama in three acts was produced, entitled 'Mother and Son,' from the pen of Mr. Moncrief. It is founded on a very trivial incident, and is not rendered very interesting in the way in which it is managed. Harley had a bustling character, which he, of course, played well, and Miss Smithson gave a good support to the piece, which was well received.

COVENT GARDEN.—One of the most splendid melo-dramatic spectacles we have ever seen was produced at this theatre on Monday evening. It is entitled Udine, or the Spirit of the Waters, and is founded on a German fairy romance of that name, by the Baron de la Motte Foque, which has been translated by Mr. Soane. The following is an outline of the story:—Udine is a Naiad, whom Kuhlborn (Farley), the King of the Waters, had stolen from her father's care in her infancy, and placed in the cottage of a fisherman. There she grows up to be a blooming beauty, apparently 'born to blush unseen,' for Kuhlborn, by his power, fills the surrounding forests with spirits and goblins, which deter all access. Sir Huldibrand, a chivalrous knight, however, penetrates the forest, and, after various adventures, arrives at the cottage, where he beholds and loves the fair Udine. He succeeds in rescuing her from his thralldom, in spite of the exertions of the Water King and his chief goblins, and conveys her safe to the castle. The subject affords a fine opportunity for the scene painter, and Grieve and Pugh made the most of it. The submarine grotto of Kuhlborn, the colonnade of the palace, and the chrystal palace itself, which is afterwards converted into a temple of the free philosophers, are matchless efforts of scenic art. The characters were well sustained by Farley, Abbot, Grimaldi, Mrs. Davenport, and Miss Dennett; the piece was received with the loudest approbation.

In the course of the evening another novelty was exhibited; that of the Sieur Davoust, who presented the audience with a March Aurienne, traversing the cone of the proscenium with his head downwards. In performing this extraordinary feat, Davoust seemed perfectly at ease. He threw a line down on the stage, and then drew up a drum, on which he played a tune; he also took up, by the same means, a table, two flags, a basket containing a bottle, and a glass. The two last articles he placed on the table, helped himself to a couple of glasses of wine, and then drank the remainder from the decanter. He then waltzed, and, with the most perfect self-possession, kept time with the music. He finished by placing the toe of one foot in his mouth, while suspended from the top of the proscenium by the hook and staples which attached his other foot to it. In this fearful exploit he received much applause, not unmixed with dread and anxiety.

SURREY THEATRE.—Mr. Dibdin commenced his summer campaign on Monday; and, although the house has only been closed three weeks, yet he has been so industrious, as to have entirely changed its face, by elegant and chaste decorations. The proscenium presents a beautifully reeding balustrade, supporting trophies which surround the royal arms, backed by a bright horizon.—The ceiling forms the concave of a perforated dome, through which a clear sky apparently lights the whole structure; the prevailing hues of which are pale violet, stone colour, blue, and silver, with a light-blue drapery round the side of the galleries.—The upper boxes and gallery-fronts are embellished with alternate fancy patterns of trophies, scroll work, and Arabesque ornaments.—The dress circle is elegantly fronted with groups, in relief, of stone colour, hatched with silver, executed in a masterly and classic style, expressing in compartments en-suite, the stories of Venus and Adonis, Hypomenes and Atalanta, Pao and Apollo, Judgment of Paris, Daphne, Acteon, Phaeton, Dancing Nymphs, Satyrs, &c. The spandrels of the dome and architecture of the ceiling are also relieved with silver hatchings. These, however, are not the only attractions of the Surrey Theatre, which has always had superior patronage, even when its inferiority as to decoration was manifest. The performances of the evening were the terrific and eventful melo-drama of 'Fifty Weddings and Nine and Forty Murders,' an interesting melo-dramatic spectacle, intitled 'Alonso the Brave and the Fair Imogene,' and founded upon Monk Lewis's celebrated poem. After which, a new comic burletta was produced, intitled 'The Two Gregories,' in which Fitzwilliam, Mr. Watkins, who has been re-engaged at this theatre, and Miss Copeland, displayed their comic powers to much advantage. Several novelties are said to be in preparation, among which is included, a novel melo-drama, founded on Lord Byron's tragedy, which, from the known talents of Mr. Dibdin, we doubt not, he will dramatise very successfully.

ASTLEY'S ROYAL AMPHITHEATRE.—The performances at this theatre, on its opening, were of that popular cast which are well calculated to ensure a continuation of the patronage it has long enjoyed. The house has been splendidly decorated, and opened with two new pieces and the much admired melo-drama of the Secret Mine.

SADLER'S WELLS commenced its season on Easter Monday, with three new dramatic pieces: the first, a ballet, Leon and Lisette, does much credit to the taste of Mr. St. Albiu; the dances were elegant and chaste, and executed with graceful skill by the performers. The second piece, a melo-drama, called The Mountain Hut, or the Tinker and his Son, translated from the French, excites a lively interest, and is well sustained by a very competent company, many of them from the theatres royal. The third, an extravaganza, called Easter Hunting, or the Johnny Newcomes at Epping, is a very laughable burlesque upon cockney sportsmen. The company is too numerous for individual remark, yet we cannot pass over in silence Mr. Keely's Clemmy, a pauper apprentice, which he played with much truth and most divertingly. Mr. G. Smith, Mr. Paine, and Miss Johnstone, are among the vocal performers, and the very great exertions of the new manager, Mr. Egerton, in every department, merit, and will, no doubt, receive the support of the dramatic public.

COBURG THEATRE.—This house, which has also received considerable decorations during the recess, opened with new pieces, which appeared to give much satisfaction to the audience.

TO READERS & CORRESPONDENTS.

The length to which we have extended the review of Lord Byron's tragedy, and the Bishop of Winchester's Life of Fiat, must be our apology for the omission of several articles prepared for the present number.

A G. on the Plagiarisms of a popular living poet, 'Mr. Pury's Criticism on Miss Dance,' and 'Portraits of Living Dissenting Ministers,' No. III. in our next.

The favours of L., J. R. P., G. A. N., and others, have been received.

The review of Ruding's Coinage will be resumed.

Review of New Books.

A Journal of a Voyage of Discovery to the Arctic Regions, in his Majesty's Ships Hecla and Griper, in the years 1819 and 1820. By Alexander Fisher, Surgeon, R. N. 8vo. pp. 320. London, 1821.

THE public has waited with no small degree of anxiety during the last three months for the long-promised account of the last Voyage of Discovery, from the pen of Captain Parry, the enterprising commander of the expedition. Of the reasons which have delayed that publication, we know as little as we do why Surgeon Fisher's twelve shilling volume has stolen into the world, as, except for such persons as ourselves, it would steal out of it,—without notice. In the whole course of our critical labours, we never met with a work so likely to create disappointment as this journal, which appears to be a diary of all the circumstances unworthy of notice that occurred during the voyage. In trifling and silly remarks it strongly reminds us of the cocknies' journal on the first of September; and did we not learn from the title and introduction, that the author is a 'Surgeon, R. N.,' who accompanied Captain Parry in his voyage, and that he is gone out in the new expedition, we should have taken him for a dandy amateur of science.

With the nature and object of Capt. Parry's expedition our readers are already sufficiently acquainted, and were they not, the information is not to be gained from the work before us. The author, whose minuteness about trifles is as ridiculous as his negligence in noticing the most important facts is censurable, sets out with telling us, that the ships left Deptford at half-past eight o'clock, on the 4th of May, 1819, and reached Northfleet at half-past twelve, by the aid of the Eclipse steam-boat. He then tells, what of course is quite new to us, that the country along the banks of the river was, at this time, extremely beautiful, particularly on the right side; he next gives us a wood engraving of Morven

Hill in Banffshire, which just conveys as correct an idea of it, as the Queen's portrait at the top of a half-penny ballad does of the features of her majesty. As he proceeds, he makes new discoveries, in the sagacity of a whale going down tail foremost, when, if it had gone otherwise, probably its tail would have been entangled in the ice. On getting to Baffin's Bay, he is quite delighted to find that arctic foxes are cunning, but that the one which was caught in a trap was not likely to escape for all 'his wily tricks,' and he promises that if Reynard displays any peculiarities deserving of notice, he shall take an opportunity of mentioning them hereafter. The fox, however, did escape before Mr. Fisher could learn any more of his 'wily tricks.' A work in the form of a journal is most convenient, as it enables an author to display so much sagacity. This is done, first, with suggesting an idea, then, a few pages afterwards, being strengthened in the opinion, and, lastly, discovering its reality, on which the author congratulates himself for the pre-science he has displayed.

Most gladly would we wish to give our readers some account of this important voyage, but we despair of doing it from Mr. Fisher's work; we will, however, try what can be done. We have already stated that the expedition sailed on the 4th of May from Deptford; at seven o'clock on the 4th of September, Captain Parry accomplished the first portion of the discovery of the north-west passage in crossing the meridian of 110° of longitude west of Greenwich. The day following, Captain Parry told the ship's company of their success, and congratulated them on it, as they were thus entitled to the Parliamentary reward of 5000l. On the 23d they got within three quarters of a mile of the entrance of Coppermine Harbour, and, after cutting through the ice of a canal, a distance of two miles and one-third, which occupied three days, the ships were warped to the top of the canal, when the men, in the usual way in which British seamen express their joy, gave three hearty cheers! This place was selected for wintering, and was called 'Winter Harbour.' On the 3d of November, the first number of a weekly Newspaper was commenced, called 'The Winter Chronicle, or New Georgia Gazette;' and, three days after, notwithstanding the thermometer outside the ship stood at zero, and within as low as the freezing point, yet two hours were spent very happily on the quarter deck in witnessing the performance of the force of 'Miss in her Teens' by the officers. The theatre was opened by an appropriate address, written by Mr. Wakefield, and two songs by the same gentleman were sung in the evening. An attempt was made to construct ice guns, but they were all shattered to pieces on the first fire. Mercury was frozen into a solid mass, by being four hours exposed in the open air, at the temperature of 36 degrees below zero; and four parus- lenze, or mock-moons, were discovered in the evening of December, each at the distance of about 21° from the moon. On the 21st of December, Mr. Fisher says—

'This being our shortest day, or, more properly speaking, the day on which the sun is farthest from us; several of the officers went out on the ice at noon with books, to determine whether it was possible to read by the twilight, and, surprising as it may appear, yet we found that the smallest print could be read by it. The book that I took was a small (pocket) Common Prayer-Book, (which was the smallest print I could find,) and, by facing it very towards the south, I could read it very distinctly. As the portion of it that presented itself by chance on this occasion contains a good moral lesson, I hope it will not be considered an idle or impious thing to quote the sentence that happened to be the subject of experiment. It was the first verse of the forty-sixth Psalm: God is our hope and strength; a very present help in trouble. In addition to what has been said, I ought also to mention, that the weather at the time was rather cloudy, so that very few stars could be seen, and the moon's declination was about 15° S., consequently below the horizon; therefore the twilight was the only source from which we could receive any light at the time. My object in being so minute in detailing this circumstance is simply to give an idea of the degree or quantity of light that we still receive from the sun. It must not be understood, therefore, that I mentioned it as any thing extraordinary or unexpected; for even if such were my design, I should be only exposing my own ignorance, since it is known to every person that the twilight does not cease until the sun is eighteen degrees below the horizon, or passed the imaginary line called the crepusculum.

Two days afterwards, the officers performed 'The Mayor of Garrat,' and a new piece, written by Captain Parry, called the 'North West Passage, or the Voyage Finished.' This play was a great favourite with all the crew, who extolled its merits loudly; and the boatswain said, that it was 'in fact real philosophy.' So intense was the cold, that brandy, on being exposed on deck, congealed in half an hour, to the consternation of Hénay; and, on the 15th of February, our author says,—

"As I considered this day to be one of the coldest that we are likely to have this winter, I made an experiment, which, although trivial, deserves to be mentioned, as it exemplifies, in a very simple manner, the rapidity with which water is frozen in such a temperature, as we have had to-day. The experiment in question is thus: I took a quart bottle, full of fresh water, to the main-top, and there poured it through a small cullander, when it was found, that by the time the drops of water had fallen to the roofing over the ship, they had congealed into irregular spherical masses. The height between the main-top and the place on which they fell was forty feet eight inches."

On the 3rd of February, the ship's crew saw the sun after an absence of ninety-two days:—

"During the time the sun was above the horizon, a vertical column of a beautiful red colour extended from it towards the zenith; the colour of it was most brilliant near the sun, and diminished gradually as it went upwards. It was observed also, that it was not always of the same brilliancy, but that it twinkled so that the upper part of it vanished altogether for a moment; it then instantaneously brightened up as splendid as before: this twinkling went on in quick succession, during the whole time the column appeared. Its breadth was about equal to the sun's diameter, and its height, or altitude, when in its greatest splendour, was between four and five degrees."

Of the severity of the cold, we have other instances. The house on shore caught fire, and was materially injured, but—

"Considerable as the fire was, its influence or heat extended but a very little way, for several of the officers and men were frost-bitten; the two men in particular, who were in the house at the time the fire commenced, suffered very severely; one of them, indeed, is in great danger of losing some of his fingers, for, notwithstanding every effort was, and is still making to restore them to life, most of them are, as yet, without the least sensation. Some idea may be formed of the state they were in when he came on board, from this circumstance, that when they were immersed in a small tub of cold water for the purpose of thawing them, the cold they communicated to the water was so great that a thin film of ice was immediately formed on its surface. This may appear to some to be so extraordinary, as to be almost incredible, and I have no doubt that I should be apt to disbelieve it also, had I not been an eye-witness of the thing myself; but this was certainly one of the coldest days I ever experienced, for it blew very fresh, and the thermometer was at the time we were out at 43° below zero; what must, therefore, be the effect such a cold on a man having his bare hands exposed to it for an hour, as was the case with the man in question?"

And a few days afterwards,—

"One of the men, who was frost-bitten when the house was burnt a fortnight ago, had a part of three fingers of the left, and two of the right hand, amputated to-day, in consequence of what he suffered at that time, having destroyed life in the joints that were removed. Whatever the process is that destroys vitality by means of cold, its effects on the parts that are destroyed are very different from that produced by sphacelus, or mortification of any other kind, that I remember having ever seen; for neither the size, nor the texture of the parts in question, were in the least altered, except that the skin and nails came off a few days ago."

"The destruction of the skin, or rather the detachment of it, has almost invariably taken place in every case of frost-bite that has occurred since the beginning of the winter. Of the mode of treating them, although our practice has been very considerable, I am not aware that we can throw any additional light on the subject. Friction, with snow at first, and afterwards immersion in cold water, until sensation is restored, appears to be the best applications to begin with; and when cold applications did not subdue in a short time, the inflammation that afterwards occurred, I always observed that cataplasms were the most efficacious remedies."

On the 1st of June, the land expedition, consisting of five officers and seven men, set off to explore Melville Island, and returned on the 16th. In the course of their travels, little of interest occurred. Several reindeer were seen, and some ptarmigans were shot. Small pieces of granite, quartz, and felspar, were frequently met with, and vegetation was in a flourishing condition. On the 15th, says Mr. Fisher,—

"After taking a few hours' rest, we all turned (at two o'clock) to build a monument on the top of 'Table Hill', which we finished by six. It is of a circular form, ten feet in diameter at the base, and about eleven feet high. In the centre of it we deposited an empty Doukin's meat-canister, containing a slip of parchment, on which was written the same brief notice that was on the pieces that we left at the other places that I have already mentioned, viz.:—"This was deposited here by a party from his majesty's ships Hecla and Griper, who wintered on this island in 1819 and 1820."

On the 30th of June, William Scott, the boatswain's mate, died, and he was interred on a plain, between two and three hundred yards from the beach. On a slab of sand-stone an inscription was cut, and the stone placed at the head of his grave. Many relics were placed in Winter Harbour, and its geographical position has been determined accurately:—

"The latitude of the spot where the ship lay since the 20th of September, 1819, 74° 47' 13" N."

"Longitude of ditto, by lunar observations, 110° 48' 30" W."

"Variation of the compass, as found on shore, clear of the ship's attraction, 13° E."

On the 1st of August, the vessel quitted Winter Harbour. A manxox was killed, of which the following is a description:—

"The hair on different parts of the body was of different lengths, and of various colours: the prevailing colour, however, was black, and the longest hair was, as above stated, on the rump and hind quarters. He had a thick mane extending from the head to the top of the hunch; the colour of it was of a pale russet. Immediately behind the hunch there was a saddle, or bed, of short hair, of a yellowish white colour, about a foot and a half in length, along the ridge of the back, and nearly of the same breadth. The legs, as far as the knee-joint, were of a dirty white colour, and the hair on them this far was no longer than that on an English ox. At the root of the long hair, there was a finer kind, of an ash colour, which was indeed as fine as any wool, and would certainly, if manufactured, make as fine cloth as any English wool. Mr. Pentan, indeed, mentions, in his description of the musk-ox, that a man of the name of Jeremie had stockings made of the wool, or hair, of that animal, which were equally as fine as

"As this hill is a conspicuous object at a very considerable distance, its geographical position deserves to be mentioned. It was obtained from observations made at the monument that we erected on the top of it, viz.:—Latitude, by meridian altitude, 74° 48' 33" N.; longitude, by chronometer, 23° 04' W. of the ships; variation of the compass, 13° 16' 0" E."

any silk stockings. It would seem, that the animal casts this fleecy covering annually, for, in the thick part of the mane, and on each side of the neck, there was a layer of this wool quite detached from the body of the animal, and only prevented from falling off, from being interwoven amongst the long hair. The hair on his forehead was all matted into small lumps with earth, and the roots of the horns were also covered with it, from which it would appear, that he was in the habit of tearing up the ground with his head; of this, indeed, we were ourselves eye-witnesses in one instance, for after we had surrounded him, so as to prevent his escape, he began rubbing his head against the ground, as if threatening us with destruction if we approached nearer, and I have no doubt, that to any animal that inhabits these regions, he would be a formidable antagonist, not excepting the bear itself. His flesh tastes a good deal of musk; but not so much so, as to be disagreeable; on this point, however, I ought to pay some deference to the opinion of a few persons amongst us who think differently. With regard to the heart and liver, it was agreed by all parties, that they were not very palatable; and those who ate the kidneys say, that they tasted more musky than any other part. To conclude the subject, I have no doubt that people living a little more sedentary than we have been for some time past, would not relish the best part of it very much at first, but it is a taste which, like many others, I think might easily be acquired.

The musk-ox measured six feet ten inches from the snout to the tail, was four feet eight inches high, and weighed seven hundred and fifteen pounds. In the month of October, the vessels reached the Shetland Islands, having lost but one man during the voyage.

Mr. Fisher concludes by saying, that if they have not discovered the North West Passage, they have at least proved its existence. That such may be the case, we will not deny, but we have no evidence of it in his volume, which is as meagre and contemptible a production as has issued from the press for many years. The author's notice of the few objects of natural history that were met with is tediously minute. This is confined to an account of walrus, a white bear, narwhals, and white whales. Two maps, one showing the course of the ships from Baffin's Bay, and the other tracing the routes of the land expedition on Melville's Island, are the only things worthy of notice, and we almost take shame to ourselves for having devoted any portion of our time to a work which has so ill requited our labour.

Memoirs of the Mexican Revolution; including a Narrative of the Expedition of General Xavier Mina. To which are annexed, some Observations on the Practicability of opening a Commerce between the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans, through the Mexican Isthmus, in the Province of Oaxaca, and at the Lake of Nicaragua. By William Davis Robinson. 2 vols. 8vo. pp. 717. London, 1821.

ALTHOUGH there have been several volumes published on the South American revolution, and the events that have occurred are in general very familiar with the public, yet this has not been the case with the revolution in Mexico, the most important of the Spanish possessions in the new world, whether considered with respect to the extent of its fertile territory, the richness of its mines, its population, or its advancement in the arts of civilized life. The melancholy fate of the unfortunate patriot, Mina, who, after contributing to the liberties of his parent country, embarked in the cause of emancipating South America, is known; but we are little aware of the feeble tenure by which Spain retains possession of Mexico. Mina, with a small band, at no time exceeding three hundred and eight in number, advanced from Soto la Marina; fought his way into the interior of Mexico, beating on different occasions large bodies of troops sent to oppose his advance, and succeeded in forming a junction with one of the revolutionary bands. Though this romantic achievement was not crowned with success, yet it must be read with interest, even though the time since it took place has deprived it of the freshness of actual news.

The author of these volumes, Mr. Robinson, is a merchant and citizen of the United States, and a violent partisan of the insurgents in South America; his narrative must, therefore, be received with the due allowance always necessary to be made for an historian who is a party-man. There are, however, other grounds on which we would receive this narrative with caution,—we had almost said suspicion,—and these are furnished by Mr. Robinson's account of himself; an account which, although he appears to attach much importance to it, is of no further general interest than in enabling us to judge of his claims to the title of a faithful historian. We shall not go to Grotius, Vattel, or Puffendorf, to know the laws of belligerents, or how far an intriguing non-combatant may evade the laws of nations; but we will take Mr. Robinson's own avowal, and leave our readers to judge whether he was a partisan of the insurgents or not. It appears, then, that Mr. Robinson landed on the Mexican coast in 1816; that he accompanied the Insurgent-General Terán, in his enterprise against Guasacualco, which failed; our author retreated into a small thicket, where he remained six days, when, exhausted by hunger and fatigue, he delivered himself up to the Spanish officers,—was condemned to death,—but, pleading the benefit of the indulto, his Catholic Majesty's pardon was granted. That he was afterwards sent to Spain by the Governor of Vera Cruz, who recommended his close confinement for life, on account of the information he possessed relating to Mexico, but that, after a confinement, in all of about two years and a-half, he was liberated. Such are the facts as stated by Mr. R. respecting himself, and he complains loudly of his treatment, because he was a neutral: what sort of a neutral, will appear by the following extract from his own statement:—

If the fact of his having visited New Grenada, Caracas, and Mexico, during the political commotions of those countries, for the purpose of ascertaining their actual condition, and of procuring the revolutionists, as a neutral merchant, by all fair and honourable means, renders him an enemy to Spain,—then is he her enemy. If cherishing those sentiments, and a determination to persevere in promoting the independence of South America and Mexico, by every means in his power, consistent with his duties as a citizen of the United States, proves him to entertain criminal intentions towards the Spanish government,—then, indeed, is he criminal.

Dismissing the author, we shall now proceed to his work, which contains a detailed narrative of the Mexican revolution; a biographical memoir of Mina,—his enterprises in old Spain,—and his last unfortunate adventure in the new world. There are also some interesting notices respecting Mexico,—the country—population—state of society, &c. We shall not follow our author in his narrative, which contains many heart-sickening details of the ferocious and sanguinary character of the war in Mexico. Indeed, the whole history of the South American revolution is but one unmixt scene of bloodshed and carnage, and the conduct of both parties in the contest would have disgraced even the savages of New Zealand. Mr. Robinson is of opinion, that had Mina landed with 1500 or 2000 men, instead of 270, in any part of the Mexican kingdom, he could have marched direct upon the city of Mexico, and overturned the Spanish government almost without a struggle. That a man of Mina's character and talents might have done this, we will not deny, but in the whole of the contest in South America, there must have been great apathy, or very bad management, when General Morillo, with very slender resources, was able so long to maintain the contest. Mina, soon after he landed in Mexico, encountered the enemy at Poetillos; and, although their numbers quadrupled his, yet he gained a complete victory, achieved by his own personal bravery, and the gallant example he set to his followers. The following circumstance, connected with this engagement, is related by the author:—

“During the action, a trumpeter was made prisoner by a major of the enemy's cavalry. The major immediately forced him to dismount, and then gave him his carbine to carry. The trumpeter soon ascertained that it was loaded, and when he found that the enemy's troops were in a state of confusion, he suddenly presented the carbine at the major, and peremptorily ordered him to dismount; he did so, and the trumpeter jumping into the saddle, ordered the major to march before him, observing to him, “As you are obliged to walk, sir, I'll not trouble you to carry the gun. So much pleased was the major with the manner in which he was treated, that, although Mina gave him his liberty, he subsequently joined a division of the patriots.”

“The alarm was given; the troopers of Mina, finding themselves cut off from their horses at pasture, mingled with the infantry, whose first impulse was to save themselves by flight. If thirty infantry only had united at that juncture, such was the situation of the ground, that they could have repelled the whole force of Orrantia, or at least could have held him in check, and made good their retreat. But officers and soldiers thought of nothing but their own safety; in the utmost disorder they rushed forward to gain the summit of the hills, and thence escape by the barrancas in the rear. Mina, awakened by the noise and tumult of his flying troops, started from the floor, and rushed out of the house in the same apparel in which he had passed the night, without coat, hat, or even his sword. Regardless of his person, the first object was to attempt the rallying of his flying troops;

but all his exertions were unavailing, for he soon found himself alone. He beheld the enemy pursuing and cutting down his flying comrades, and attempted, when too late, to secure his own safety; but the enemy were upon him. In the act of hallooing to the fugitives to halt and form, he was seized by a dragoon, and having no arms whatever, resistance was perfectly useless.

“If Mina, on first leaving the house, had attempted to escape, he might have succeeded with as much ease as many others; but such a thought, we believe, never entered his mind. His favourite servant, a coloured boy of New Orleans, after the general left the house, saddled his best horse, and went in pursuit of his master, carrying likewise his sword and pistols; but unfortunately he found him not.

“The dragoon who captured Mina was ignorant of the rank of his prisoner, until informed of it by the general himself. He was then pinioned, and conducted into the presence of Orrantia, who, in the most arrogant manner, began to reproach him for having taken up arms against his sovereign, and interrogated him concerning his motives in thus becoming a traitor, insulting him, and lavishing upon him the bitterest criminations. Mina, who on the most trying occasions never lost his presence of mind and characteristic firmness, repelled to these interrogatories in so sarcastic a strain, and with such strong expressions of contempt and indignation manifested in his countenance, that the brutal Orrantia started from his seat, and beat with the flat of his sword his disarmed and pinioned prisoner. Mina, motionless as a statue, endured this indignity; and then, with a crest brightened by conscious greatness, and an eye glowing with the fires of an elevated spirit, looked down upon his conqueror, and said, “I regret being made a prisoner; but to fall into the hands of one regardless of the character of a Spaniard and a soldier, renders my misfortunes doubly keen.” The magnanimity of Mina filled every man present with admiration, and even Orrantia stood confounded with the severity of his rebuke.”

“Orrantia, after the disgraceful scene we have already noticed, inquired the force of the patriots in his neighbourhood; Mina informed him; when, conceiving, perhaps, that a desperate effort might be made to rescue the general, he immediately retreated upon Silao, with his prisoner, who was treated with every indignity. This ungenerous treatment was borne by Mina with his characteristic fortitude; the situation of his companions engrossed his reflections, and while on the road, his endeavours to cheer them were constant.

“On reaching Silao, he was put into irons by his savage conductor. Thence he was removed to Irapuato, and, finally, to Llan's head-quarters, in front of Tepeaca, at Los Remedios, where he was committed to the care of the regiment of Navarra. His treatment there was such as a brave man deserved; every humane attention being shown him, and his situation made as comfortable as circumstances would admit.”

“Upon the arrival at Mexico of the express which had been dispatched to announce the capture of Mina, couriers were sent by the viceroy to every part of the kingdom, to convey the cheering intelligence. Te Deums were chanted in the churches; salutes of artillery, illuminations, and rejoicings, took place in every town in the possession of the royalists; and such was the general joy among them, that they hailed the capture of Mina as the termination of the revolution. These demonstrations, on the part of the government and its adherents, are in themselves no common eulogium on the character of Mina.

“In the city of Mexico, a great anxiety prevailed to behold Mina, and had he reached that place, much interest would have been made to save his life; but the viceroy, fearing the consequences that might ensue should he be brought thither, and being in constant dread lest he should escape, dispatched an order to Llan for the immediate execution of his prisoner.

“When this order was communicated to Mina, he received it without any visible emotion. He continued to resist all overtures, for the purpose of drawing information from him, but regretted that he had not landed in Mexico one year sooner, when his services would have been more effective. He likewise regretted quitting life so deeply indebted to certain individuals, who had generously aided his enterprise.

“So anxious was the government that his death should be confirmed, that Llan was instructed to detach a surgeon from each European regiment, and the captain of each company, to attend the execution, who should certify that Mina was dead, and, moreover, describe the manner in which the balls entered his body, and note the one that caused his death. This was done, and the singular document was afterwards published in the Gazette of Mexico.

short but brilliant career entitles him to a distinguished place on the list of those heroes who have shed their blood in bold and generous exertions to break the tyrant's sceptre, and to extend the blessings of freedom among the human race.

We shall not pursue the narrative farther, but select a few desultory passages; and, first, of the massacres of the belligerent parties:—

Massacres by the Royalists.—Of the extent of those barbarities, some idea may be formed, when we state, that within the last nine years, it appears, from Spanish official documents, that there have been sacrificed, in cold blood, by hangings, shooting, and other modes of execution, eighty thousand prisoners, in those three provinces. We must bear in mind, that in these eighty thousand victims are not included many thousand others, who were put to death by a brutal soldiery, whenever they visited a village, the sentiments of whose inhabitants they suspected to be favourable to the insurgents. How many inoffensive men, women, and children have been slaughtered, of whose fate no further notice has been taken, in the official dispatches of the royal commanders, than in the following words:—"The town or pueblo of —, with all its inhabitants has disappeared from the face of the earth!"

In June, 1816, the Spanish General Morillo, entered the city of Santa Fé de Bogotá, then called the capital of New Grenada. In one of his despatches from thence, which was intercepted in its passage to Spain, he boldly describes the measures which he had pursued, in the following words:—"Every person, of either sex, capable of reading or writing, were treated as rebels. By thus cutting off all who could read or write, he hoped effectually to arrest the spirit of revolution." The authenticity of such an extraordinary official communication, might admit of some doubt, if the monster who penned it had not in reality executed the savage deeds therein announced. All persons in Santa Fé and in Carthagena, who had been distinguished by their learning or eminence in science, or who had held stations in the provincial administrations, and in the congress with their wives and daughters, were thrown into loathsome dungeons. Six hundred of them were hanged or shot, and their bodies exhibited on gibbets. All the females who were accomplished in literature, of which there were many, suffered the same fate. The learned and benevolent Mutis, of whom Humboldt has spoken in terms of admiration; Lozano and Caldos, who were his disciples in philosophy; a distinguished chemist, and several other men of science, who had not borne arms; nor held any public trust, were put to death by order of Morillo. Some of the females were indebted for the preservation of their lives merely to the fatigue of the executioners; these women were afterwards exiled. Nearly the whole population of Santa Fé supplicated Morillo to spare the life of the venerable Mutis; but the savage was inexorable, openly avowing, that learned Creoles were more dangerous enemies than the insurgents in arms.

The brief view we have taken of the murders of unfortunate Creoles, in the three provinces before mentioned, we are well convinced, embraces but a small part of the numbers which have perished; and were we to say, that one hundred and fifty thousand, instead of eighty thousand, have been deliberately slaughtered by the royalists, we conceive that we should still be short of the actual number of victims.

Massacres by the Insurgents.—Bolivar dispatched an order to the governor of the city of Caracas, to execute every European Spaniard who was confined in that city, or at La Guayra. This dreadful order was carried into literal and prompt execution, and not more than twenty or thirty of the European Spaniards, who were prisoners, were saved from the terrible sentence.

The author of this work, as well as many other foreigners, was present at the execution of above eight hundred of these victims at La Guayra. They were taken out of the dungeons, and conducted in pairs a short distance from the town, and there shot; after which, their bodies were burned. Many of these unfortunate beings, who knew that their sacrifice was the result of the unfeeling obstinacy and cruelty of the Spanish government and its officers, deliberately conversed on the subject while walking to the place of execution, and several of them uttered the most horrible curses against the authors of their calamities.

Mexican Clergy.—The Mexican clergy are far less numerous than is generally supposed. According to a late enlightened traveller, M. de Humboldt, the secular clergy and regulars who wear the cowl, do not exceed ten, and including the lower orders attached to the convents, fourteen thousand; being about three for every thousand inhabitants. The kingdom is divided into one archbishopric and eight bishoprics. The revolution has materially reduced their incomes; but, prior to that event, the dignitaries received the following immense annual revenues:—

	Dollars.
Archbishop of Mexico . . .	130,000
Bishop of La Puebla . . .	110,000
— Valladolid . . .	100,000
— Guadalajara . . .	90,000
— Durango . . .	35,000
— Monterey . . .	30,000
— Yucatan . . .	20,000
— Oaxaca . . .	18,000
— Sonora . . .	6,000

The canons receive from seven to nine thousand dollars, and the sub-canons, from two to four thousand dollars, each.

The revenue of the church was derived principally from tithes. Its lands were in value about two and-a-half millions of dollars; and it held mortgages to an immense amount, about forty millions of dollars.

Costume of Mexican Officers.—The grotesque figure of the colonel surprised the division. He wore a threadbare roundabout brown jacket, decorated with a quantity of tarnished silver lace, and a red waistcoat; his shirt collar, fancifully cut and embroidered, was flying open, and a black silk handkerchief was hanging loosely round his neck. He also wore a pair of short, loose, rusty, olive-coloured velvet breeches, also decorated with lace; and round his legs were wrapped a pair of dressed deer-skins, tied under the knee by a garter. He had on a pair of country-made shoes; and on each heel was a tremendous iron spur, inlaid with silver, weighing near a pound, with rowels four inches in diameter. On his head was placed a country-made hat, with an eight inch brim, ornamented with a broad silver band, in the front of which was stuck a large picture of the Virgin of Guadalupe, inclosed in a frame, and protected by a glass. He was mounted on a fine horse, and armed with a brace of pistols, a Spanish Toledo, and an immensely long lance. His men were equipped much in the same style; but were principally clad and armed with the spoils taken from the enemy. Though these Mexican Cosacs were thus singularly and rudely equipped, they were robust-looking fellows, accustomed to hardships and severe privations, and full of courage.

The Peasantry.—At the vast estates of the Marquess of Jalisco, extending over upwards of two hundred miles in length, the miserable labourers exist, as is customary throughout Mexico, almost entirely on tortillas and chile. No part of the earth exhibits such striking, and such monstrous contrasts of wealth and misery, as well in the country as in the cities, as Mexico. We behold the proprietor of a hacienda, decked in a style of the most costly but awkward grandeur. He has on a pair of country made boots, which cost from fifty to a hundred dollars; large spurs, inlaid with gold and silver; a superb horse, with a bridle and saddle which cost from a hundred and fifty to three hundred dollars; a cloak or mantles, richly embroidered, and full of gold or silver buttons, laces, and fringe. He lives in a spacious house, within whose walls every luxury is to be found that the country affords; but when he sallies forth, he is lost amidst a group of half-dressed, badly-led wretches, whose only dress is sheep-skins, if in the country, or if in town, their shoulders are covered by an old blanket or a sheet, serving them for a partial covering by day, and a bed at night. No species of attention is ever paid by the lord of the soil to the comfort or wants of his tenants or servants, and a more wretched race of cultivators does not exist under the canopy of heaven.

than the Indian labourers on these estates, and in the mining districts. Twenty-five cents, or two reals, are the daily wages of a labourer; out of which pittance he has to clothe and feed himself and family, and to pay the government and parochial extortions. No wonder, therefore, that he rarely tastes of animal food. In fact, the situation of a Georgia field-negro, is superior, notwithstanding all the royal writers say to the contrary.

The last chapter of this work contains an examination of the different routes to the Pacific Ocean, and fixes on the Isthmus of Tehuantepec as the narrowest part of America, and the most favourable for forming a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. There is much sound reasoning in the author's disquisition on this subject, and on the commercial advantages of such a communication. He says,—

From the River Mississippi, a steam vessel could, with ease, perform a voyage to the port of Guasacualco, in six days. Allowing seven days for the transportation of property across the Isthmus, and eighty for the voyage to China, it will be seen that by steam navigation, a voyage could be performed from the United States to China, in eighty-three days. This will be more clearly evinced by the following actual computation of the distances.

The ordinary route from Philadelphia to Canton.....	16,130
By steam-boat navigation and conveyance through the Isthmus of Oaxaca, from and to the same places.—
From Philadelphia to Guasacualco.....	2,100
Passage over to Tehuantepec, by land and water.....	120
From Tehuantepec, by the islands lying nearly in the direct course to Canton.—
To the Sandwich Islands 3,835
Ladrones do.....	3,900
Canton.....	2,080
	9,815
	12,035

Actual distance saved..... 4,115

From Philadelphia to Columbia River, by the usual route of Cape Horn..... 18,261
From the same to the same, by the proposed route.—

We consider this by far the most valuable part of Mr. Robinson's work, and containing much information on a subject highly interesting; for, although America would be most benefited by the proposed communication, yet the advantages to Europe, and to England in particular, would be very considerable.

On the promotion of Lord Shelburne to the head of the Treasury, in 1782, Mr. Pitt was appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer, although he was then little more than twenty-three years of age. He did not, like other eminent statesmen who have begun their career in the House of Commons, previously pass through the routine of subordinate office, nor did he wait until that period of life which has generally been considered as necessary to mature the judgment and to qualify even men of the most brilliant talents for the higher departments of the executive government. Mr. Pitt had not been long in office, when the new ministry wished to gain some additional strength; he positively objected to any offer being made to Lord North, but waited on Mr. Fox by appointment, to invite him to return to office:—

As soon as Mr. Fox heard the object of Mr. Pitt's visit, he asked whether it was intended that Lord Shelburne should remain first lord of the Treasury, to which Mr. Pitt answered in the affirmative. Mr. Fox immediately replied, that it was impossible for him to belong to any administration of which Lord Shelburne was the head. Mr. Pitt observed, that if that was his determination, it would be useless for him to enter into any further discussion, "as he did not come to betray Lord Shelburne;" and he took his leave. This was, I believe, the last time Mr. Pitt was in a private room with Mr. Fox, and from this period may be dated that political hostility which continued through the remainder of their lives.

The "very extraordinary and unnatural coalition," (as it has been justly termed,) of Lord North and Mr. Fox, and the result of two divisions in the House of Commons on the subject of the peace, induced the new ministry to tender their resignations. The King proposed to Mr. Pitt to succeed Lord Shelburne, as first Lord of the Treasury, with full power to nominate his colleagues; but this offer, so dazzling to a young man, was, on mature deliberation, refused; and, in March, 1783, he resigned the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Fox and North administration succeeded, and continued until, says our author, "the rejection of Mr. Fox's India Bill by the House of Lords, afforded his Majesty an opportunity of removing ministers, whom he had been compelled to admit into office, but to whom he had never given his confidence."

At this important juncture, Mr. Pitt readily accepted from his Majesty the offer of being at the head of the Treasury. Lord Temple became Secretary of State, but popular clamour compelled him to resign, three days after his appointment. This is said to be the only event of a public nature that his biographer ever knew to disturb Mr. Pitt's rest. Early in 1784, the clerkship of the Pells, a lucrative office in the gift of the first lord of the Treasury, fell vacant, when Mr. Pitt gave a noble instance of his disinterestedness. He had been urged to keep it himself, nor, considering that he was a younger son, without fortune, and held his situation very precariously, could he have been censured if he had availed himself of this opportunity to secure a permanent and adequate income; but—

He neither accepted the office himself, nor conferred it upon a relation or friend; nor did he dispose of it with a view of increasing his political influence—he gave it to Colonel Barré, upon condition of his resigning a pension of 3,000*l.* a year, which was nearly equal to the value of the office; and thus a saving to that amount was made to the public.

This act of patriotic disinterestedness excited no surprise in those who knew Mr. Pitt intimately; but upon other conduct, so widely different from the practice of former ministers, could not but make a strong impression. It was frequently mentioned in both houses of Parliament, with high admiration and applause; and it certainly contributed, in so small degree, to raise his character in the public estimation at a most important moment. Lord Thurlow, in speaking upon this subject in the House of Lords, acknowledged, that he had been shabby enough to advise Mr. Pitt to take this office, as it had so fairly fallen into his hands; and he believed he should have been shabby enough to have done so himself, as other great and exalted characters had so recently set him the example; and he was so shabby as to think, that there was no occasion for him to tower above his noble predecessors in office, and to aspire to higher acts of disinterestedness and spirit. But Mr. Pitt, with notions of purity, not only very uncommon in these degenerate days, but scarcely paralleled in the purest times of Greece and Rome, had nobly preferred the public to the consideration of his own interest. Lord Colonel Barré soon after this office was made to him, and nothing could exceed the warm terms in which he spoke of it in a public view: "Sir, it is the act of a man, who feels that he stands upon a high eminence in the eyes of that country which he is destined to govern."

Mr. Pitt began his new administration very inauspiciously, but he appears from the commencement of his political career, to have had the confidence of his Majesty, as will be seen by the following facts:—

'On the first day he [Mr. Pitt] appeared in the House of Commons, after his re-election, he was left in two minorities, the one of thirty-nine, and the other of fifty-four; and five hostile motions were carried against him. The most reproachful terms, which disappointed ambition and political animosity could suggest, were applied to his principles and his conduct; and he was denied those common civilities which had been hitherto invariably shewn to the minister of the crown. Having written to the King, at Windsor, a general account of these proceedings, he received the following answer:—"Mr. Pitt cannot but suppose that I received his communication of the two divisions in the long debate, which ended this morning, with much uneasiness, as it shews the House of Commons much more willing to enter into any intemperate resolutions of desperate men, than I could have imagined. As to myself, I am perfectly composed, as I have the self-satisfaction of feeling I have done my duty. Though I think Mr. Pitt's day will be fully taken up in considering with the other ministers, what measures are best to be proposed on the present crisis; yet, that no delay may arise from my absence, I will dine in town, and consequently be ready to see him in the evening, if he should think that would be of utility. At all events, I am ready to take any step that may be proposed to oppose this faction, and to struggle to the last period of my life; but I can never submit to throw myself into its power. If they, in the end, succeed, my line is a clear one, and to which I have fortitude enough to submit."

In another letter to Mr. Pitt, his Majesty, referring to a dissolution of Parliament as a necessary measure, thus expresses himself: "The opposition will certainly throw every difficulty in our way; but we must be men, and if we mean to save the country, we must cut those threads that cannot be unravelled. Half measures are ever puerile, and often destructive." The systematic opposition made to the new ministry in the House of Commons, and the various attempts that were made to overturn it, gave the King much uneasiness. In a letter to Mr. Pitt, written on the day that an address was to be moved in the Lords, to the King, for a change of ministers, his Majesty writes,—

"I trust the House of Lords will this day feel, that the hour is come, for which the wisdom of our ancestors established that respectable corps in the state, to prevent either the crown or the commons from encroaching on the rights of each other. Indeed, should not the Lords stand boldly forth, this constitution must soon be changed; for, if the two only remaining privileges of the crown are infringed, that of negating bills which have passed both houses of Parliament, and that of naming the ministers to be employed, I cannot but feel, as far as regards my person, that I can be no longer of utility to this country, nor can with honour continue in this island." From this extract, coupled with the conclusion of his former letter, as well as from other authorities, it is evident, that the King had, at this time, serious intentions of retiring to Hanover, in case Mr. Fox and his party should prevail.

In consequence of the eagerness so often expressed in both houses of Parliament for a union of parties, Mr. Pitt advised the King to propose an interview between the Duke of Portland and himself, (Mr. Pitt,) for the purpose of endeavouring to form an administration:—

'This suggestion was received by his Majesty with considerable surprise and agitation; and the next morning he wrote to Mr. Pitt the following letter, dated Feb. 15th, 1794:—

"Queen's House, 30 m. past 10 a. m.

"Mr. Pitt is so well apprised of the mortification I feel at any possibility of ever again seeing the heads of opposition in public employments, and more particularly Mr. Fox, whose conduct has not been more marked against my station in the empire, than against my person, that he must attribute my want of perspicuity in my conversation last night, to that foundation, yet I should imagine it must be an ease to his mind, in conferring with the other confidential ministers this morning, to have on paper my sentiments, which are the result of unremitting consideration, since he left me last night, and which he has my consent to communicate, if he judges it right, to the above respectable persons.

"My present situation is, perhaps, the most singular that ever occurred, either in the annals of this or any other country; for the House of Lords, by a not less majority than near two to one, have declared in my favour; and my subjects at large, in a much more considerable proportion, are not less decided; to combat which, opposition have only a majority of twenty, or at most of thirty, in the House of Commons, who, I am sorry to add, seem as yet willing to prevent the public supplies. Though I certainly have never much valued popularity; yet I do not think it is to be despised, when arising from a rectitude of conduct, and when it is to be retained by following the same respectable path, which conviction makes me esteem that of duty, as calculated to prevent one branch of the legislature from annihilating the other two, and seizing also the executive power, to which she has no claim.

"I confess I have not yet seen the smallest appearance of sincerity in the leaders of the opposition, to come into the only mode by which I could tolerate them in my service, their giving up the idea of having the administration in their hands, and coming in as a respectable part of one on a broad basis; and, therefore, I, with a jealous eye, look on any words dropped by them, either in Parliament, or to the gentlemen of the St. Albans Tavern, as meant only to gain those gentlemen, or, if carrying farther views, to draw Mr. Pitt, by a negotiation, into some difficulty.

"Should the ministers, after discussing this, still think it advisable, that an attempt should be made to try, whether an administration can be formed on a real not a nominal, wide basis, and that Mr. Pitt, having repeatedly, and as fruitlessly, found it impossible to get even an interview on what opposition pretends to admit is a necessary measure, I will, though reluctantly, go personally so far as to authorize a message to be carried, in my name, to the Duke of Portland, expressing a desire that he and Mr. Pitt may meet to confer on the means of forming an administration, on a wide basis, as the only means of entirely healing the divisions which stop the business of the nation. The only person I can think, from his office, as well as personal character, proper to be sent by me, is Lord Sydney; but should the Duke of Portland, when required by me, refuse to meet Mr. Pitt, more especially upon the strange plea he has as yet held forth, I must here declare that I shall not deem it right for me ever to address myself again to him.

"The message must be drawn on paper, as must every thing in such a negotiation, as far as my name is concerned; and I trust, when I next see Mr. Pitt, if, under the present circumstances, the other ministers shall agree with him in thinking such a proposition advisable, that he will bring a sketch of such a message, for my inspection.

"GEORGE R."

A message was sent to the Duke of Portland from his Majesty, expressing his earnest desire, that his grace should have a personal interview with Mr. Pitt, for the purpose of forming an administration, on fair and equal terms. The Duke objected to the word 'equal,' and Mr. Pitt refusing to explain it except at a personal interview, the negotiation was broken off.

While the House of Commons was debating, resolving, and addressing, night after night, for the purpose of driving Mr. Pitt from his office, the City of London voted him thanks for his conduct, with the freedom of the city.

Mr. Pitt dined with the Grocer's Company, and was addressed in an excellent and flattering speech by Mr. Wilkes:—

When Mr. Pitt returned at night, he was attended a considerable part of the way, by many respectable persons, besides an immense concourse of people. As the populace were dragging the coach, in which were himself, Lord Chatham, and Lord Mahon, up St. James's Street, opposite to a club-house, frequented by his political opponents, they were suddenly attacked by men, armed with bludgeons and broken chair poles, among whom were distinguished several members of the club; some of the mob made their way to the carriage, forced open the door, and aimed several violent blows at Mr. Pitt, from which Lord Chatham, at his own risk, was very instrumental in protecting him. At length Mr. Pitt and his companions, with great difficulty, made their escape to a neighbouring house, without any material personal injury to themselves; but their servants, and several persons who came to their assistance, were much bruised, and the carriage was nearly demolished.

One of the most important and interesting features in these volumes, is the correspondence of his late venerable Majesty with Mr. Pitt; and we are anxious to select such points, as best illustrate the character of our revered sovereign, and shew his opinion of his ministers. In one of his Majesty's letters to Mr. Pitt, therein the following just remark:—

"I cannot conclude without expressing my fullest approbation of the conduct of Mr. Pitt on Monday; in particular his employing a razor against his antagonists, and never condescending to run into that rudeness which, though common in that house, certainly never becomes a gentleman; if he proceeds in this mode of oratory, he will bring debates into a shape more creditable, and correct that, as well as I trust many other evils, which time and temper can only effect."

We shall pass over the India bill, and the financial plans of Mr. Pitt for the reduction of the national debt, which are discussed at too great length, and shall conclude for the present with noticing one of Mr. Pitt's speeches in Parliament. Mr. Fox had been returned for Westminster, and Mr. Adams, in the House of Commons, spoke of the circumstance as being a glorious check to the career of ministers. Mr. Pitt, in reply to Mr. Adams, said,—

The ingenuity of the learned gentleman had found out, that the right honourable gentleman's (Mr. Fox's) election was almost unanimous, although they had that day been inquiring why no return had been made, and had learnt, that many thousands voted for two other candidates. But, said the learned gentleman, the success was wonderful, considering that the right honourable gentleman had to contend with the powers of public office, with the powers of the East India Company, and with what the learned gentleman was pleased to term, popular phrenzy. "The right honourable gentleman," said Mr. Pitt, "has to lament, that he had to contend with the powers of public office, because he endeavoured to subvert government. He has to lament, that he had to contend with the East India Company, because he endeavoured to seize upon their property, and to violate their most sacred rights, sanctioned by charters, and secured to them by statutes. And he has to lament, that he had to contend with what is termed popular phrenzy, because the people at large have seen and condemned his conduct. But what allies the right honourable gentleman had to fight for him, is not noticed. The degree of influence used in his favour has not been observed upon; nor any respect paid to those charms, which alone can supersede every other consideration among us all, and command unanimity, when nothing else could command it." Having pursued this vein of mixed sarcasm and ridicule, Mr. Pitt took notice of Mr. Fox's glories not being confined to Westminster, but extended to the extremest corner of the island, to which the right honourable gentleman's partialities had not formerly gone:—

• Via prima salutis,

Quod minime reris, gratia pandetur ab urbe.
His success at Ross and Kirkwall ought not, he thought, to be denied its share of praise; it was well entitled to—"Pursue the triumph, and partake the gale."

(To be concluded in our next.)

A Tour through the Southern Provinces of the Kingdom of Naples, to which is subjoined a sketch of the immediate circumstances attending the late Revolution. By the Hon. Richard Keppel Craven. London, 1821. 4to. pp. 449.

PROPOSING to ourselves to despatch Mr. Craven and his work in one notice, and presuming that his name is already familiar to the public, as the Vice Chamberlain of her Majesty, we shall not long detain our readers with critical remarks, but endeavour to select such parts as are most novel and interesting. Mr. Craven appears to be a gentleman of polished manners, and an excellent classical scholar. With these advantages, Naples afforded him a good opportunity for observation: and he has detailed the result, in an elegant and well-written itinerary. The tour was commenced in April, 1818, and was continued during the spring and summer of that year. The author kept a journal during the whole of his tour; and about half of the present volume was written in its present state, but without any immediate view of publication. We now proceed to our extracts.

Mr. Craven reached the city of Foggia, just after the Vardurelli band had been newly exterminated. This band, so named from their chief and his brothers, had for about two years committed great depredations in Apulia, until at last they were allowed to form a regular corps, still commanded by the same leader, who received a monthly salary, and engaged to serve the provinces which he had so long ravaged, from all similar attacks for the future. The remains of this band had presented themselves to the general commanding at Foggia, and had an altercation with him:—

The general finally commanded the two leaders to repair to his own apartment to speak to them; this they objected to do without their arms, which they declared they would never part from, and it is supposed that the language they made use of in the course of their argument so exasperated the officer, that he roughly pushed one of them back, who was using threatening gestures, on which the other fired his musket at him, but having missed his mark, was shot dead on the spot by the sentry at the gate; this was the signal for an attack from his companions, that was immediately answered by a round of musketry from the troops who were drawn out close to them, which killed several and spread consternation among the crowds of town-people who had assembled on the spot. Four of the band, who had presence of mind to spring upon their horses, escaped in different directions out of the town, though followed by cavalry and fired at as they fled. Another portion were made prisoners; but a third division sought security in a cellar, the first place of refuge which offered itself, and which, having one very low entrance, afforded them a defensible asylum for some time; the depth and darkness of this receptacle made it difficult to attack them with success, for they killed a soldier, and wounded several others who had ventured too near the aperture. Of this last desperate set, four, however, gave themselves up, and made known the number that remained. In order to bring as speedily a termination as possible to the dismay and agitation which this event had spread throughout the city, two of those who had been last taken were sent in to their companions, with their hands tied, to persuade them to surrender, and to inform them that if they persevered in a resistance, which, from the local nature of their retreat, must be unavailing, a straw fire would be lighted at the office, as the only means of hastening their compliance or destruction. The unfortunate men never returned, and no answer being given, this threat was put into actual execution, and the aperture blocked up with stones. Imagination pictures their situation as most horrible; but its terrors were eluded by the last resource of despair. Two hours after, the cellar was entered without opposition, and their lifeless bodies covered with wounds, indicated the death they had received at each other's hands.'

At Polignano, our author visited the fine cave mentioned by Swinburne, and of which the Voyage Pittoresque gives a very beautiful plate:—

'It is an immense cavity, hollowed by the hand of time and the equally unceasing attacks of the waves in the rock on which the town is built, and the sea is admitted to it through two stupendous natural arches. Some steps, hewn in the stone, lead to a causeway constructed considerably above the level of the water, on the projecting masses of the limestone, forming the buttresses of one of these apertures; and which being furnished with a stone balustrade and seats, admits the traveller to a distinct inspection of the interior. It derives its principal beauties from the combinations or rather contrasts of light and shade cast on the rich colour of the impending vault, or reflected in the deepest recesses of the transparent semicircular pool of sea water below. Towards the north the eye catches the windings of the shore, which, without any pretensions to a bold or picturesque outline, are sufficiently broken and diversified to add considerably to the beauties of this extended sea view.'

In the description of Ostuni, Mr. Craven gives an account of a celebrated duel, which took place in that town about the year 1664. At that period, the management of the sword was not only considered as the most fashionable and manly accomplishment, that a nobleman could possibly possess, but was generally practised by all ranks; for it is noted that even at a less remote era, the fishermen of Taranto, after their daily labours, were wont to meet in the evening, and resort to the recreation of fencing. The following details are strongly indicative of the temper and manners of the times:—

'The Count of Conversano, called also Duke of Le Noci, of the family of Aquaviva, and the Prince of Francavilla, of that of Imperiali, were the two most powerful lords in lower Apulia: the former boasted of his ancient descent, his numerous titles, and his great domains, and numbered among his predecessors a succession of nobles whose tyrannical and violent disposition had designated them as a race dreaded by their inferiors, and hated by their equals. The Prince of Francavilla was of Genoese extraction, but his family had been settled in the kingdom from the time of Charles the Fifth, and he emulated the Count in pride, while he surpassed him in wealth. Their territories joined, and the constant litigations arising out of their inordinate but ill-timed jurisdictions, were thereby superadded to the long list of mutual injuries recorded by both families. Their animosity broke out at Naples, on some trifling occasion, when they were each in their carriage, and, after a long contest of words, the Count of Conversano challenged the Prince of Francavilla to decide their difference by the sword; the latter declined this mode of combat, as ill suited to his age and infirmities, but consented to the duel if the arms might be exchanged for pistols. His antagonist, who was esteemed the best swordsman in the kingdom, insisted on his first proposal, and excited the Prince to accede to it by the application of several blows with the flat side of his weapon. An insult so grossly offered in the public streets authorised the existing government, carried on through the administration of a Viceroy, to suspend or check the consequences likely to arise, by placing the aggressor under arrest for a time, and subsequently ordering them both to retire to their respective estates. But the feelings of unsatisfied hatred and of insulted pride in the other, were not likely to be allayed by this exclusion from the world: and in a short time the Prince of Francavilla proposed a champion in his cause, in the person of his sister's only son, the Duke of Martina, of the house of Caraccioli. This young man was but just returned from his travels, and his education was not completed, so that although the Count of Conversano admitted, with a brutal anticipation of success, the substitution of this youthful adversary, it was agreed that a year more should elapse previous to the final termination of their differences, and the field of battle was fixed at Ostuni, the jurisdiction of which town had been previously claimed and disputed by both noblemen. The eyes of the whole kingdom were directed with anxious and fearful expectation towards this spot; but the wishes of the majority were entirely on the side of the Duke of Martina, whose youth, accomplishments, and amiable disposition called forth the interest of all ranks. His uncle, actuated more by the apprehensions of shame in the event of defeat, than by feelings of affection for his relative, endeavoured to insure success by the following stratagem: A gentleman, who had been some time, as was the custom in those days, a retainer in his family, left it abruptly one night, and sought the Count of Conversano's castle, into which he gained admission by a recital of injurious treatment and fictitious wrongs, heaped upon him by the tyrannical and arbitrary temper of the Prince of Francavilla. A complaint of this nature was always the passport to the Count's favour and good graces, and he not only admitted this gentleman to the full enjoyment of his princely hospitality, but having found that he was an experienced and dexterous swordsman, passed most of his time in practising with him that art, which he soon hoped would insure the triumph he valued most on earth. A few days previous to that fixed for the duel, the guest, under pretence of paying a visit to his relatives, withdrew from the Count of Conversano's territories, and secretly returned to those of his employer; where he lost no time in communicating to his nephew all the peculiarities and advantages repeated experience had enabled him to remark in the Count's manner of fencing. The Duke of Martina was thereby taught that the only chance of success which he could look to, was by keeping on the defensive during the early part of the combat; he was instructed that his antagonist, though avowedly the most able manager of the sword in the kingdom, was extremely violent, and that if he could parry the thrusts made on the first attack, however formidable from superior skill and strength of wrist and arm, he might perhaps afterwards obtain success over an adversary, whose person, somewhat inclined to corpulency, would speedily become exhausted from the effects of his own impetuosity. The Duke of Martina, furnished with this salutary advice, and strong in the conviction of what he deemed a just cause, awaited in calm anxiety the day of battle; and the behaviour of the two combatants on the last morning strongly characterizes their different dispositions, as well as the manners and habits of the age they lived in. The Duke of Martina made his will, confessed himself, and took an affectionate leave of his mother, who retired to her oratory to pass in prayer the time her son devoted to the conflict; while the Count of Conversano ordered a sumptuous feast to be prepared, and invited his friends and retainers after the fight; he then carefully bade his wife farewell, and brutally alluding to his adversary's youth and inexperience, remarked, Fado a far un capretto * . They met at the place appointed: it was an open space before a monastery of friars at Ostuni; but these good fathers, by their intercession and prayers, prevailed upon the combatants to remove to another similar plot of ground, in front of the Capuchin convent, in the same town: here the bishop and clergy, carrying the Host in solemn procession, attempted in vain to dissuade them from their bloody purpose: they were dismissed with scorn, and the duel began. It was of long duration, and afforded the Duke an opportunity of availing himself of the counsels he had received: when he found the Count began to be out of breath, and off his guard, he assumed the offensive part, and having wounded him, demanded if he was satisfied, and proposed to desist from any further hostility; but, stung to the soul by this unexpected reverse, the Count refused all offers of accommodation, and by blind revenge and redoubled animosity soon lost all command of himself, and received a second wound, which terminated the contest, together with his life. It appears that the Prince of Francavilla, whose principles were as little honourable as those of his adversary, and whose thirst of revenge was no less insatiable, had appointed a band of assassins to waylay and murder him on his way home, had he returned victorious from the conflict.

* I am going to kill a kid, or rather to make a kid.

At Brindisi our traveller was mistaken for the Crown Prince of Bavaria, who was expected there on his way to Greece; and, notwithstanding his attempts to undeceive the commandant, as well as the abbess of the convent, yet he was reluctantly compelled to receive the homage they considered due to royalty. At the convent he was shown large cases of relics, which he was told had been given by his great-grandfather and others of his progenitors. He says,

'Among the relics which were named to me, I remember some fragments of the veil and shift of the Virgin Mary, a thumb of St. Athanasius, a tooth of the prophet Jeremiah, and some of the coals which were used to roast St. Lorenzo. Many of these memorials were offered me to kiss, and the last-mentioned articles were accompanied by the observation that they had been the means of converting a sceptic by sticking to and blistering his lip; I own I felt a sort of momentary hesitation as they were presented to mine, and withdrew them with a degree of promptitude hardly compatible with a disbelief in their verity.'

While at Brindisi and Taranto, Mr. Craven endeavoured to obtain the most satisfactory information respecting the Tarantula spider, but the Brundisians differed from the Tarentines in the account of it, both however agreeing as to the existence of the disorder, or rather mania occasioned by the bite of the Tarantula, and the means taken to remedy it. As the latter is curious, we quote it—

'The expenditure of money and time attending the ceremonies observed in the cure of a tarantula, which attract the attention and form the diversion of a whole village, will account for the husband's objections to the neighbours' encouragement of them. These last, as well as the friends and relations of the party, are always apprized in due time, and invited to assist in their holiday clothes at the singular rites which are to be performed. Musicians, expert in the art, are summoned, and the patient, attired in white, and gaudily adorned with various coloured ribbons, vine leaves, and trinkets of all kinds, is led out, holding a drawn sword in her hand, on a terrace, in the midst of her sympathizing friends; she sits with her head reclining on her hands, while the musical performers try the different chords, keys, tones, and tunes that may arrest her wandering attention, or suit her taste or caprice. I heard some specimens of these preludes, which resemble unconnected pieces of recitative. The sufferer usually rises to some melancholy melody in a minor key, and slowly follows its movement by her steps; it is then that the musician has an opportunity of displaying his skill, by imperceptibly accelerating the time till it falls into the merry measure of the pizzica, which is, in fact, that of the tarantella or national dance, only that, in the composition of the tarantine air, greater variety and a more polished and even scientific style is observable. She continues dancing to various successions of these tunes as long as her breath and strength allow, occasionally selecting one of the bystanders as her partner, and sprinkling her face with cold water, a large vessel of which is always placed near at hand. While she rests at times, the guests invited relieve her by dancing by turns after the fashion of the country; and when, overcome by restless lassitude and faintness, she determines to give over for the day, she takes the pail or jar of water, and pours its contents entirely over her person, from her head downwards. This is the signal for her friends to undress and convey her to bed; after which the rest of the company endeavour to further her recovery by devouring a substantial repast, which is always prepared on the occasion.'

Among the singular effects of the earthquake at Terranova and Oppido in 1783, Mr. Craven, speaking of the former says,—

'I found a village formed of one straight street, containing 700 inhabitants, placed in the midst of ruins, which were those of a town of 15,000 souls. These present to the eye masses of masonry of immense size, scattered in all directions, and frequently retaining the forms they originally possessed, but inverted or transposed in the most extraordinary manner. A house situated 300 paces from a little river that runs in the ravine under Terranova, was slipped by the motion of the earth close to the edge of it, and though the roof and a portion of its walls fell in by the force of the shock, two of its inmates crept out unhurt. Another most singular feature in the views of Terranova is presented by one of the watch-towers of the baronial castle, which was precipitated off its base down the side of the declivity, and to this day exists in almost an entire state, with its battlements downwards. The ground sunk so much in some places that the circular shaft of a well, which was once entirely concealed by the soil, now rises to the height of six feet above the surface; its immobility during the universal commotion is attributed to the rock on which it is probably founded.'

In passing from Monteleone to Nicastro, our author deviated from the road to visit Il Pizzo, to visit the spot where the unfortunate Joachim Murat terminated his eventful life. The particulars of this event are familiar to the public; and we therefore pass them over, to quote the description of Murat's Court, in the time of his kingly power.

'The splendour of Murat's court, perhaps the most brilliant in Europe at the period I allude to, as greatly exceeded the rank he held among other sovereigns, as the appointment and numbers of his troops were disproportioned to the resources and population of the kingdom; and both were characteristic of that indiscriminately profuse disposition which could reward the merits of an opera dancer upon the same scale of liberality with the services of a general or a minister of state.

'His wife, with the same high notions of magnificence, was by no means so judiciously generous; and had they not both too blindly followed a system of debt, which, though sometimes successfully adapted to subordinate political negotiations cannot be applied with equal advantage to all times and exigencies, they might perhaps have preserved some remnants of that station to which fortune had exalted them, or at least have descended to the level of mediocrity by less perilous gradations.

'A celebrated statesman said of some intriguing diplomatist, 'Il croit qu'il trompe parqu'il ment;' and this conviction seemed nowhere so strongly rooted as in the habits of these individuals.

'On the evening that saw the departure of Joachim from the walls of Naples, which he was destined never again to behold, he ordered the publication of a constitution dated six weeks before; and at the moment he was entering the carriage of one of his attendants, for the purpose of secret escape, Madame Murat was gravely announcing to his confidential friends and advisers his determination to collect a few scattered troops still left in the capital, and make one last effort to arrest the progress of the enemy. When, a fortnight previous to this, the defeat of the Neapolitan troops at Macerata was already known in the metropolis, a bulletin, said to be written with a pencil by Murat's own hand on the field of battle, announced a complete victory, and the capture of several pieces of cannon.

'At the time that the Austrians were already in full march towards Naples, the queen regent, as she was called, reviewed the civic guard with extraordinary grace and spirit, and assured them that a few more days would liberate them from all the hardships and dangers attached to the discharge of their functions; and the last minutes she passed in the palace were employed in graciously requesting some favourites to attend her breakfast the following morning, an injunction which was followed by her immediate removal to the ship from which she never again stepped on the Neapolitan shore.

'The aspect presented by the interior of the royal residence on this day was as extraordinary as it was novel to a spectator, accustomed to see it only in its gala trim. The courts were full of servants.

tumultuously demanding the arrears of their wages, and taking earnest of future payment in the seizure of the horses belonging to the establishment. The long corridors and galleries, untenanted by guards and liveried menials, presented no obstacles to the few visitors whom interest or curiosity attracted towards the closing scene of this drama. The kingly apartment itself, still adorned with the ponderous spoils of Herculaneum and Pompeii, relieved by Lyons' embroidery and India muslins, was obstructed by large packing cases, and its mosaic pavements soiled by the dirty footsteps of porters and carriers, and strewn with wisps of hay or paper shavings. The ladies in waiting, accoutred in the usual costly garb of attendance, were gnawing a few chicken bones, the scanty remains of the day's single meal; and, lastly, the indefatigable occupier of the tenement, decked out in all the elegance and recherche of the last Parisian fashions, and preserving the careless smile of assumed complacency, strangely contrasted with haggard eyes and care-worn cheeks, was variously employed in packing up jewels, distributing money, dictating letters, and receiving or dismissing visitors with all the minute distinction of courtly etiquette.

Our limits will only permit us to give one more extract: it is the authors account of the much talked of, and it would appear much abused Carbonari.

'The late revolution has been ascribed to the persevering efforts of this sect; and their avowed co-operation towards promoting this ephemeral event, has been one of the principal arguments laid hold of by its opponents for the necessity of resisting its progress. That the efforts of this society have been directed to the attainment of a representative system of government, can no more be denied than that they have been eminently successful; but that in so doing they assumed an exclusive agency in the affairs of state, and must, therefore, be regarded in the light of a faction, is not admissible. It should, therefore, be observed, that if the Carbonari do not constitute the positive numerical majority of the Neapolitan nation, which is a matter of some doubt, they include in their ranks that portion of the population which, from their acquirements, property, habits, and relative situation in the body politic of the country, must ever give a decided preponderance to whatever part they assume.' 'The classes wherein this sect has made the least advancement are the higher divisions of nobility, and the most abject among the populace.' 'The description of individuals filling up the vast chasm between these two extremes, must be admitted to rank as a body, whose employments, labours, and local knowledge, contribute more largely to the welfare of the community; and of these I should not hesitate to affirm that the great portion are Carbonari.'

'This association may be compared to a chain, the links of which are so constructed, and well-fitted to each other, that, however totally they might be separated in their junction by accidental circumstances, re-union may be produced amongst any of their number. The several portions need only be brought in contact to insure adhesion, and a continuation of those energies inherent to its original formation. The mode in which these joints are connected may be exemplified in the following anecdote, the authenticity of which I can vouch for.

'Two itinerant traders in cattle were returning from the province of Abruzzo with the successful fruits of their speculations, and, within a few hours of their home, were stopped by a comitiva of five brigands; in the course of the short parley that preceded the delivery of their money, one of them happened by some fortunate signal, to betray himself as a Carbonaro to the captain of the gang, who immediately taking him aside, asked if his companion belonged to the sect, and being answered in the negative, thought himself at liberty to despoil the one of his gains, while, out of sympathy to the other, he limited his depredations to the sum of ten ducats. They parted; and the sufferer having observed the secret conference, which had ended so favourably for his fellow traveller, suspected the truth; and, after obtaining an avowal of it, determined on becoming a Carbonaro the moment an opportunity should present itself. This occurred that very evening. The sectarian easily found a sufficient number of initiated to form an assembly, possessed in number and rank with the authority competent to admit the proselyte according to the established rules of the body. He returned to his own house, so elated with what he deemed an unalloyed badge of security against all future attacks from robbers, that, in the moment of surprise and exultation, he heedlessly informed his wife of the occurrences of the day. Full of the prejudices purposely disseminated among the lower orders against this sect, the woman returned this mark of confidence with a volley of reproaches and lamentations, accusing him of having entered into a compact with the infernal powers, of having forsaken his God, and thereby subjected himself to excommunication in this world, and eternal punishment in the world to come. His endeavours to pacify her were for a long time ineffectual, nor would she be restored to tolerable composure, till, in expiation of his criminal imprudence, she had with horror thrown his breeches, containing the diplomas of his reception, and a catechism enumerating the duties of his new profession, into the fire. The next morning she determined to go to the justice of peace, and inform him of what had passed. Having found the fatal documents in the chimney, where she had probably caused them to fall from the pocket in which they were deposited before, the flames could destroy them, carried them with her as vouchers for the authenticity of her information. The justice of peace admitted her in private, and having heard the complaint, and received the fatal papers, told her that he would give her husband so salutary a remonstrance, that he would answer for his breaking off all future connexion with the hateful and impious sect to which he had so imprudently attached himself; and that he would moreover pursue the miscreants with all the severity their conduct deserved. This satisfied the wife, who having left the diploma and catechism in the hands of the justice, sent her husband to receive the promised admonition; but this consisted in a serious caution with regard to future discretion, and an offer to preserve the papers in his own possession, as himself holding one of the highest distinctions among the ranks of the society in question.

'It is evident from this narrative, that, notwithstanding the circumspection usually observed by the order, respecting the admission of fresh members, it is impossible that they should all prove as unexceptionable in point of character, as the general rule enjoins; but, though the recommendation of an initiated Carbonaro in favour of a proselyte cannot be rejected, unless upon objections the most unequivocal, a singular minuteness of investigation is followed with regard to the habits and dispositions of those whose merits point them out no valuable additions to the community. The arts practised to obtain the accession of such individuals, testify the importance attached to it; and bespeak a system of ingenious perseverance worth recording. Should any young man distinguish himself by regularity of conduct, sobriety of temperament, but more especially by superiority of understanding, he is as sure to attract the notice and call forth the attention of the Carbonari, as they are certain to succeed in the final attainment of their object.

'The nameless, but numerous, offices of good fellowship, which, in a life of early labour, are frequently required to smooth its difficulties and assist its progress, will never be withheld from such an individual. He will at all times readily find new implements to supply the place of those his industry has rendered no longer serviceable, assistance to complete his unfinished tasks, and protection, and even pecuniary aid, when he is in need of either. The hand of friendship and cordiality will be extended to him, and every ear will become the depository of his confidence, as readily as every lip will convey the consolations of sympathy, or the precepts of salutary counsel. Sometimes a different, but as efficacious a system is followed by purposely leading the object into temporary difficulties, and imposing everlasting obligation by extricating him from them.'

The Fall of the Angels. A Sacred Poem. 8vo, pp. 68. London, 1821.

WHATEVER opinion may be entertained of the merits of this poem, it must be admitted, that the author possessed no ordinary degree of courage when he ventured on a subject which has been consecrated by the immortal muse of Milton. We must, however, condemn it as one among the many instances we meet with of mis-directed ambition; and this poem, destitute as it is of poetical merit, labours under the additional disadvantage (if there can be any) of being subjected to a comparison with an epic, which has been the subject of universal admiration. The Fall of the Angels was scarcely greater than that of the subject from the pen of Milton to the hands of the present author, who has ventured on a theme to which his powers are totally incompetent. We are loath to make an extract, but we must enable our readers to judge of the truth of our remarks; we shall, therefore, quote the temptation of Eve, merely observing that the devil and the serpent must renounce all title to cunning and subtlety, if, united, they furnish no better evidence of their talents than our author has assigned them:—

A form glittering with scales of thousand lights;

Slowly its pointed head it lofty rears,
And thus with words deceives, with hope delights:

“O Mother of a race, that on the future throws
A spell and power o’er all thro’ which life ed-dying flows!

O first alike in beauty and in race!
God’s proudest work, decking the flowery earth
With what e’en heaven might adorn and grace!

Fairest enchantress! creature of light mirth!

“Why should you sigh and grieve alone below?

Is it because your lover stays away,
And seeks to pierce the hidden cause’s flow?
Then change at once your darkness into day.

This fruit, that seems, denying, half to woo the sight,

At once lifts up the veil that shuts his eyes from light.

That you might show your love unto your mate,

By dining ill to fall upon your head,
Made God forbid this tree; on you now wait
Your husband’s hopes; they soon for e’er are fled.”

The demon, lurking in the serpent’s coil, Spoke cheating thus; and Eve, with hurried pace,

Rush’d to the tree and fell within his toil.
Then flash’d his eye with pride, with joy his face.

“Now may the wondrous God, who boasts his sovereign power,
Own me his foe; nor let his brow contemptuously lower,

If I too boast, who’ve mock’d his kind intent
Of making us in human forms reside,
And there do penance and in tears repent,
For what we did when sitting by his side.”

The serpent’s hollow coil fell lifeless down.—
On Adam and on Eve’s mind sickening burst

The certainty of toil and sickness, shown
In a dead vision, where they seemed curst,
And where Envy, Revenge, and Malice sporting danced

Around a bloody form, that seem’d in thought entranced.

While, looking upon weapons black with gore,

Its silent finger beckon’d Love and Hate
To come and take from the red muddy floor
A dagger to fulfil the bitter fate.”

If, after this, our readers wish to see what has been made of such a subject, let them turn to the Paradise Lost; they will then think less of Eve’s weakness, when they see the matchless art by which Milton has made her assailed. The stanzas we have quoted are a fair specimen of the poem; we could have selected many worse, and we are not aware that there are any better.

BARRY CORNWALL.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—As a correspondent in a contemporary journal has lately favoured the public with some animadversions upon the writings of Lord Byron, and accused him of being guilty of plagiarism to a great extent, I trust I shall be excused in claiming the attention of your readers to a poet, if not of equal celebrity in point of talent, yet quite so in public attraction,—I mean Mr. Barry Cornwall. I have perused his tragedy of Mirandola within these few days, and herewith send you a few, out of the many similar instances of Plagiarism he has been guilty of.

In act 1, sc. 3, the duke says to Isidora,—

‘But we must play our part, my sweet one, in this silly world.’

And in Shakespeare’s Merchant of Venice, act 1, we have—

‘I hold the world but as the world, Gratiano,
A stage where every man must play a part.’

Also, in page 19, the Duke says to Isidora:—

Of day or dreaming night, but I am with thee.’

And we find in Trilussa and Cressida, act 4,—

‘O, Cressida! but that the busy day
Wak’d by the lark, hath roused the ribald crows,

And dreaming night, will hide our joys no longer,’ &c.

In act 3, sc. 2, Casti says to Julio, in the banqueting-room, speaking of a girl—

‘Like a young rose opening slowly,
Kissed by the breath of May.’

Milton, in his Ode on the Nativity, writes—

‘The winds, with wonder whist,
Smoothly the waters kiss.’

In act 4, sc. 2, the duke, on Isabella requesting an interview for Guido, says, inter alia—

‘We will meet—hereafter;
In the world, never—in the grave, perhaps.

‘ there, friends and foes
Meet without passions, and the sickly light That glimmers thro’ the populous homes of death,

Will be enough to find us,’ &c.

Blair, in his grave, says—

‘Here friends and foes
Lie close, unmindful of their former feuds.’

And again,—

‘The sickly taper
By glimmering thro’ thy low brow’d misty vaults.’

In act 5, sc. 2, in the interview in the garden, between Guido and Isidora, the former says,—

‘There is a period in the days of men,
Beyond which they never thrive. I have seen mine:

Now all is darkness and decay.’

And in Julius Cæsar, act 4, we read,—

‘There is a tide in the affairs of men,
Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune;
Omitted, all the voyage of their life
Is bound in shallows, and in miseries.’

After mentioning only these few plagiarisms, I hope I have sufficiently shown the originality of Mr. Barry Cornwall’s genius, as far as relates to Mirandola, and have also, I trust, brought forward an instance to the notice of the writer, who has with such violence attacked Lord Byron, that if we examine too closely the productions of poets of the present day, we shall be able to find but few who have not, either through accident or design, culled some little from the extensive field of poetry to adorn their own.

I have no wish to hurt the ‘fair fame’ of Mr. Barry Cornwall, and I beg he will not consider these remarks as invidious; if my Lord Byron has been dragged before the public on a charge of such weighty nature as plagiarism, surely Mr. Barry Cornwall, being likewise an author and a poet, cannot complain of appearing in a similar character in the present instance.

'Let my disclaiming from a purpose evil,
Free me in his most generous thought.'

Fine Arts.

PAINTINGS IN WATER COLOURS.

'With many fair and princely qualities,
That in his clear morn no attention drew;
Now ——— all men look to him.'

JOANNA BAILLIE.

THE quotation, (from perhaps the second dramatic writer that this country ever produced,) with which we have headed this paper, was suggested by the consideration of the rapid progress which the art of painting in water colours has, within these few last years, made in the estimation of the lovers of British talent—a progress which, urged, as it has been, by the most forcible principles of truth, is by no means to be considered in after ages as the evanescent blaze of fashionable enthusiasm, or the smoky embodying of popular delusion. Of the obstructing prejudices which were necessarily to be cut away before the march of this new or newly rising system,—of the ill-will which it was forced to encounter, before that victory could be obtained, which has placed it so high among the handmaids of the arts of design,—the public is already fully aware. It remains but to state, that an exhibition was, perhaps, never presented to the public, concentrating, in so bright a focus, the various excellencies of which this branch of painting is capable. An additional circumstance may also be adduced, which we are confident our readers will learn with pleasure; we allude to the resumption of the original intention of the society, in confining the exhibition to works executed in water colours alone. After premising thus much, we shall not any longer delay offering our opinions on some few of the pieces now laid before the public eye. Among the few productions of his pencil, with which Mr. Pugin has favoured us in the present exhibition, there are some of particular merit, especially his 'Guildhall,' No. 2; his 'Library, at Cashbury,' No. 48; and his view from the 'Quai de Louvre,' No. 26; in the last of which, however, we observed a want of solidity in the shadows, which may be met with, in a slighter degree, in the generality of this artist's works, though, in this instance, it probably arose from its intended publication through the means of the graver. We would not willingly pass over Miss Byrne's exquisite studies of 'Flowers and Fruits,' Nos. 40, 52, 56, and 167, which are fine specimens of colouring, shadowing, and tasteful arrangement. There are several pieces by Christall, some of which, the figures, display great talent; the landscapes are in his usual hard, yet ineffective style; indeed, his system seems to us to be fundamentally defective, bold without force, and rapid without effect, uniting the opposite extremes of hardness and washiness, of daring and insipidity, and soaring from the common track only to sink into puerility. In figure drawing, he certainly possesses great powers of excellence, and we think that his 'Unloading Peat,' No. 79; and his 'Second Study from Crabbe's Parish Register,' No. 128, would be of infinite service in the world of taste, if their success could induce him to adopt subjects of that nature in his future works. Several views, by Prout, pleased us highly, as they display, in a very favourable light, his rich and artist-like execution, as well as great discrimination in his choice of subjects fitted to his peculiar genius. We would, however, wish to see a greater attention paid to the aerial perspective, as well as a modification of that peculiar love for certain principles of the picturesque, which is too apt to lead him into exaggeration and a species of pictorial bombast. We allude to his excessive use of rich browns, and to the unmerciful breaking up of his objects to give them an air of ruin. These licenses must not be too frequent; and, like the use of antiquated words in poetry, their employment should be confined to what Burns, speaking of his Scottish Dialect, used to call a 'tender sprinkling,' and, on no account, to be scattered with such profusion as is observable in the performances of Mr. Prout, and a remarkable example of which, occurs in his 'Blore Church,' No. 19. Varley's composition from the 'Bride of Abydos,' No. 72, the picture which received the premium, is a performance highly creditable both to the talents of the artist and to the imaginative powers of poetry, with which he has entered upon his subjects, and by which he has been guided in this picture, where we find the embodied essence which he has extracted from the impalpable, yet delicious breathings of the lovely garden of poetic creation, which blooms in the concluding canto of Lord Byron's poem.

There are a considerable number of fine pieces by G. F. Robinson, in his very best style, and executed with all that brilliancy, yet chasteness of colour,—that breadth, yet transparency of shade,—that minuteness of detail, yet general effect,—that spirited delineation of the near objects, accompanied as it is by the most receding softness of the off-skip, which will ever place him among the first water-colour painters that this country has produced. A favourite misty effect has often been objected to him, but we confess we are not aware of any instance in which it has been improperly introduced, and we think that the instantaneous recognition of his works, which we invariably feel, arises not from any mannerism or objectionable peculiarity of style, but solely from his superior nature and fidelity in each branch of scientific delineation. His 'Lated Traveller,' from Shakespeare, No. 5, is, in our estimation, very superior to the same subject by Copley Fielding, No. 158, both in conception and in execution, which we do not think is in an equal style to many of his other paintings in this year's exhibition. We would particularly refer to his 'Scene in Greenwich Park,' No. 83, which, with a little too much profusion of browns in the foreground, may be ranked among the highest of water-colour paintings. We would also refer (our limits will not allow us more) to the 'Mill at Dolgelly,' No. 77; 'The Ground-swell in the Sea,' No. 86; 'Eastward Bay, with Shakespeare's Cliff,' No. 170, as fine specimens of Mr. Fielding's talents, and noble examples of the pitch of perfection to which this species of painting may be wrought. Many beautiful architectural drawings of C. Wild, form a prominent feature in the exhibition, and it is with sorrow we find that our limits at present will not permit us to do other than speak in general terms of their chasteness of colouring, their fidelity of perspective, their accuracy of detail, and their grand composition taken generally. No. 21, 'The Arrival of the Steam-Packet at Southampton,' by Gasteau, struck us as a beautiful and natural delineation of a common but seldom-attempted moonlight effect. 'A View at Stratford, and of the Church by Moonlight,' we find without a name in the catalogue of the exhibition; it is No. 183, and from its superior softness and delicacy, strengthened as it is by a proper admixture of the vigorous, as well as from its general execution, we conclude that it is by Robson. We will now conclude, with the wish, that the future opportunities we may have of marking the progress of this society, may be as much superior to the present in themes for admiration, as the present is to those exhibitions which preceded it. Let the society, successful as they have already been, recollect—

'That the lofty point which does appear

To him who stands below the mountain's top,
Is, to the daring climber who hath reach'd it,
Just a breathing place, from whence he sees
The real summit bright and heav'n illum'd,
Towering majestic grand above him, far
As is the lofty spot on which he stands,
To the dull plain below.' W. H. PARRY.

London was never so rich in Exhibitions, as at the present moment; and many of them present attractions, well worthy the notice and patronage of the public. Independent of Mr. Belzoni's curious facsimiles of ancient art, we have numerous splendid displays of living genius. Mr. Glover's exhibition of Oil and Water Colour Paintings, which opened on Monday, contains no fewer than ninety one pictures; the whole of these, with the exception of half a dozen, are from the prolific pencil of Mr. Glover, whose talents as a landscape painter, place him in the first rank of living artists. Mr. Ward has a large Allegorical Painting of the battle of Waterloo, thirty-five feet by twenty-one. It has been painted by order of the Directors of the British Institution, and is intended for Chelsea College. The Exhibition of the Royal Academy opens on Monday, with a larger collection than in any preceding year; and including some of the productions of our most eminent painters. Mr. Hoffman will also open his gallery next week, in which, among other pictures, is a large view of Richmond.—All these will have due notice, in our ensuing numbers.

Original Poetry.

NAPLES.

'Tis done—the struggle's past—the slaves released
Into their lurking holes, and o'er their hills
The tinkling toccin of their chains resound,
And echo tells it to the weeping world.

Oh Heaven! on what a proud, an exalted height
Of awful grandeur stood the patriot band, While Freedom o'er them spread her parent wings,

To guard them from the pouncing eagle's prey;
And Europe in the breathless silence stood
Of panting Hope, her lance half poiz'd in air,
Ready to strike Oppression's plundering hoards,
And lay them in the dust. But they retired,
Base trembling dastards, from the bloodiest fight;
Retired—the laugh, the scorn, e'en of slaves,
And left their names a mock-word to mankind.

Is there a cheek that boasts the beard of manhood,

But reddens into shame? Is there a heart
That feels the vital current warm its core,
But freezes at the thought? Is there an ear
But turns with horror from the sick'ning tale?
Rise, Etna! disembody your hottest fires,
Spread one wide waste of desolation round,
And make them perish; let no vestige stand
Of the base race, who, to preserve an hour
Of worthless life, slunk from the glorious war
Of freedom, and resigned their necks to chains.
Oh, had they stood—but one poor effort stood,
Their's was the praise of ages, and mankind
To latest times, the dread necessity Which made them yield would cease. The glorious sparks,

Electric playing round the sacred brow
Of Freedom's goddess, on the smiling hills
Which bound the Tago, would, with double lustre,

Blame their sky, and o'er their green sword graves,
The future patriot would, with holy zeal,
Sigh at their fate. G. A. N.

TO ELIZA.

With a Rose, on the First of May, the Sixteenth Anniversary of her Birth Day.

THE beauties of sixteen display
Of fleeting life the flowery May,
When roses bloom on beauty's cheek,
And smiling lilies clothe her neck,

And lozes ap! grapes round her ding
The choicest gifts of balmy spring:
Those flowers of life are thine, dear maid,
But flowers flourish but to fade—
The bloom of youth, the rose of May,
Alike soon wither and decay.

But there's a flower that never dies,
That blooms beneath all sorts of skies,
In frost, in sunshine, and in shower—
And virtue is that lovely flower—

Be thine, my fair, that flower that blows,
In vernal gales and winter snows,
And gives to age's wrinkled brow,
Beauties that youth could ne'er bestow,

THE FASHIONS.

To—

YOU may say what you please, in your letters to me,

About the black smoke with which London is crown'd,—

But where can a strapping such guile see O! where can such fashion and folly be found?

But fashion, you know, is excusable now, Since folly's a thing that but few are without:—

Hearings all his bells, and the music, I vow,
Has the charm to lead thousands, in London, about!

But talking of fashion reminds me, that I Made a promise to give you—Well, what?
you will say,—

Some hints about dresses,—'tis foolish to try,
For my masculine muse has no talent that way.

Well: the fashion was once—but the time is gone by—

For ladies to have their waists frightfully high;
Up under the arms, (which the ancients, alack!
Were so rude as to say was the top of the back),
And women, the wrong side of sixty, used then
To excite—in a veil—the delight of young men.
But now—what a change!—and some say for the best,

In the manner that ladies prefer to be dress'd,—
Almost to the hips have the waists slid'd down,
And age is becoming the charm of the town;
I mean in appearance—for all that I see,
Look as if they were verging on seventy-three!
And, then, on their heads such a mountain is tost.

Of bonnet and feathers,—the former so wide,
That the face in the spacious vacancy's lost,
Like a pebble that sleeps in the fatuousness tide!

You've seen a tree stand on the slope of a plain, Whose branches would cover an acre of ground?—

Well, then, on my life—as I hope to remain
In your friendship, which I such a treasure have found,

'Till time clips the wings of my muse—I declare,

The feathers that fashion says ladies must wear,
Are nearly as large, and they flutter and fly,
Like a pendant, in every breeze that goes by.

As Charles is a bit of a dandy, just say
That he, to look something like a day of the day,
Must get him a sort of a comical hat,
The brim of which all the way round should be flat—

Like one that has long been exposed to the wet;
And a coat—if he wishes a pattern to set.
To your town—should be long, very long in the waist.

And button'd so tightly, as if it were brass'd,—
With a collar as large as his posy has on,
When he in a gig a long journey is down,
I could tell you much more—but time presses me so,—

Aud I have a terrible distance to go:
I shall touch, on the parks, when I scribble
again,—

So, with many kind wishes—God bless you, till then. WILFORD.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—The Lord Chancellor, who has a great aversion to theatrical disputes, has referred the question respecting Lord Byron's tragedy to the Courts of Law: Mr. Elliston, in the mean time, being, by the consent of all parties permitted to perform it; it has been represented the first four nights in the week.

We confess we shall be glad to see this question of copyright decided, although, so far as relates to the tragedy of Marino Faliero, it will be of no consequence; for it has not attracted good houses, and has gone off heavily. It is a fine tragic poem, but it has neither been happily abridged for the stage, nor is this the time when tragedy can be expected to be very successful.

COVENT GARDEN.—The tragedy of Virginius was performed on Monday night, when the part of Virginia was sustained, for the first time, by Miss Beaumont, who, to great personal charms, united much good taste and fine feeling. If she did not equal Miss Foote in the dignity of the character, she gave to it more of feminine tenderness.

Lord Byron, in the preface to his tragedy, says, he never saw Miss O'Neil; having determined to see nothing, which should divide or disturb his recollection of Mrs. Siddons: this is an elegant compliment to both these distinguished females. Although we would not, like his Lordship, have foregone the pleasure of seeing Miss O'Neil, yet we would almost wish never to see another Juliet, as our recollection of her excellence in the character, almost unfits us for judging of any successor, by continually presenting to our minds that 'divine perfection of a woman.' Miss Dance appeared, for the first time, as Juliet, on Monday night; and played the part much better than that of Belvidera, although neither of them justify the expectations which her Mrs. Haller had created. In the garden scene Miss Dance was very successful, and in all those where tenderness and affection predominate. It can scarcely be expected, that much novelty could be given to a character so often represented; but there were some touches in Miss Dance's Juliet, of great natural effect. Mr. Charles Kemble played Romeo, with his usual spirit.

We did not make any remark on the marche armenienne of Sieur Davoust, considering it as only intended for the holidays, but we cannot avoid censuring the Managers, for another of their novelties, introduced this week, which would have been in its place at Greenwich or Bartholomew Fairs. The way in which the play-bills announced their new performance is curious. It was to consist of—'exercises of grace, strength, and agility, and attitudinal imitations of the most celebrated statues of antiquity, by the two Hercules of France, the Sieurs Decour and Ebrayat.' The two worthies, who were of very disproportionate size, certainly did exhibit proofs of strength, and some agility; but, as for 'exercises of grace,' heaven bless the mark! there was not the slightest portion, and the men no more imitated the celebrated statues of antiquity, than a village stone cutter could imitate the divine productions of Phidias or Praxiteles. The exhibition was a disgrace to the theatre.—The audience felt so, and condemned it.

ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.—Our good friend Mathews continues his travels in air, earth, and water, three times a-week, with the most triumphant success. He is a most amusing fellow, and we know of no one, of whom it can be so truly said, 'his life is laughter, and mirth is so mixt up in him, that nature might stand up, and say to all the world,—This is an actor.'

SADLER'S WELLS.—We are pleased at witnessing the popularity, which the performances at this theatre are rapidly attaining. Since our last notice, Mr. Wilkinson has appeared in the character of Popewye, in a burlesque, entitled More Frightened than Hurt; which his uncommon comic powers enable him to perform to the infinite satisfaction of the auditory.

EUROPEAN SALOON, King Street, St. James's. Miss Maquoley has resumed her entertainments with success, and has announced Morning Readings of the best plays of the elder dramatists, commencing with Massinger's Duke of Milan.

M. Alexandre, whose vocal illusions were a strong attraction at the Olympic, during the holiday week, is now exhibiting at the European Saloon, with the same success which has attended him in other parts of the metropolis.

LOCUTURUS.

Mutability of Human Greatness.

In the year 1504, the master of the ceremonies of Pope Julius the Second, ranked the powers of Europe as follows:—

- | | |
|-------------|-----------------|
| 1. Germany | 13. Bohemia |
| 2. Rome | 14. Poland |
| 3. France | 15. Denmark |
| 4. Spain | 16. Venetian R. |
| 5. Arragon | 17. Brittany |
| 6. Portugal | 18. Burgundy |
| 7. England | 19. Bavaria |
| 8. Sicily | 20. Brandenburg |
| 9. Scotland | 21. Saxony |
| 10. Hungary | 22. Austria |
| 11. Navarre | 23. Savoy |
| 12. Cyprus | 24. Florence. |

Since this memorable period, what is now the proud imperial city of Rome, whose frown spread terror and dismay throughout the civilized world? Scarcely a speck in the scale of nations. The same question with regard to a majority of the kingdoms and principalities, which, at that period, shone with splendour in the political constellation, and which have since bid 'farewell, a long farewell, to all their greatness.' Neither Russia nor Prussia appears upon the list; they were, at that time, of too little importance to assume a rank among civilized nations.

Longevity.—We are assured that the following remarkable instance of longevity has been authenticated by the parish register:—William Gilbert, born in the parish of Kingston, near Hereford, on the 8th of December, 1702, is now living and in good health. He worked for many years as a hedger.

Agriculture.—An eminent French writer has said very justly,—the agriculture of France, and that of every people on the globe, does not reach its proper point of improvement, until it produces, at the smallest expense possible, the largest useful crops in the year, without any naked fallows, except in some extraordinary cases of rare occurrence.

PERRY'S SYSTEM OF EDUCATION.

It having been intimated by several individuals, that some remarks in a recent advertisement by M. Duflot, are directly levelled at Mr. Perry; Mr. P. embraces this opportunity to declare, that there is no similarity whatever between his System and that of Mr. Duflot; and that, should there appear, when Mr. Perry's System is disclosed, any similarity whatever between it and Mr. D.'s, he will forego every advantage that may arise from teaching it—he will forfeit, in all instances, the required premium and all claim to originality.

Review of New Books.

Two Letters to the Right Honourable Lord Byron, in Answer to his Lordship's Letter to , on the Rev. W. L. Bowles's Strictures on the Life and Writings of Pope, &c. By the Rev. W. L. Bowles. 8vo. pp. 104. London, 1821.

WHEN we noticed the letter of Lord Byron to Mr. Bowles*, we principally confined ourselves to such parts of it as tended to vindicate the moral character of Pope, from the charges that had been made against him; and we then thought, as we still think, that his lordship vindicated him successfully. There was, however, another subject to which we alluded—the question, whether poetry be more immediately indebted to what is sublime or beautiful in the works of nature, or the works of art?—Mr. Bowles is the great advocate for nature. His lordship, in a succession of very fine passages, shows, that there may be a great deal of poetry in art. In the pamphlet before us, Mr. Bowles briefly dismisses the question of Pope's want of morality, a charge which he founds on the Letters of the poet to Lady Mary, and many of the ladies with whom he corresponded from youth to age, and proceeds to vindicate those principles of poetical criticism which he had termed invariable. It would lead us too far to follow the author through all his arguments in defence of his opinion; we must, however, observe, that he reasons temperately, and often acutely, and that we should love controversy better than we do, if it was always conducted in so gentlemanly a spirit. Mr. Bowles follows Lord Byron through all his arguments, seriatim, and combats them with considerable ability. He denies that he said Mr. Campbell's ship (which has been so long engaged in war, that we wonder there is any portion of it left,) derives all its poetry from nature, as his lordship states. He then enters into a long discussion, to prove how largely the ship is indebted to nature: and as this is a point on which we quoted Lord Byron, we shall also detach a few passages from Mr. Bowles's letter:—

'Mr. Bowles said, and says, "that poetical beauty in a ship depends not on art, but nature." ALL its poetry, he instantly admits, it does not derive from nature; but its poetical beauty depends upon nature; for the sails would not swell, the streamers would not flow, the motion would cease—its LIFE, which Mr. Campbell speaks of, would be extinct.

'But you say the poetry of the ship does not depend on the waves, &c. I think it does, for this reason,—that all this beauty, motion, and life, would be at once lost and extinct. True, nor can I for a moment think otherwise; thus seen, and thus associated, "the ship confers its own poetry upon the waters, and heightens theirs," BUT BEFORE the elements of nature have ENABLED IT TO DO SO; and, therefore, its primary poetical beauty depends on nature, not art.

'You say, take away the winds and waves, and there will be no ship at all! Then its very existence depends on them! And "take away the sun, and you must read Mr. Bowles's pamphlet by candle-light." Read it how or when you will, the sun will be more poetical than a candle; and the seas, that "speak in the east and the west at once," will not depend on the ship for poetical sublimity, (but the ship will on them,) any more than the sun will depend upon Lord Byron's poetry. And then I ask you, my lord, this question, (begging you to remember my principles only require that the works of nature, which are beautiful and sublime, are more poetical, abstractedly, than any works of art,)—whether the sun, the waves, and winds are, per se, more poetical without the ship, or the ship, per se, without the waves, &c. &c.? The poetry, therefore, is not reciprocal; for the ship can give no beauty till the elements of nature, on which its beauty depends, enable it to do so. Then it gives and receives. But, my lord, you must remember, that when I answered Mr. Campbell, (and I do not think either he or your lordship can make my good ship surrender,) he made no distinction at all, but coloured his rich descriptions with all the hues of nature, and then advanced to shew the poetical beauties of art.

'But the water is calm, and its monotony requires to be broken; and "calmness," which is one feature of this mighty element, may be contemplated at Wapping, in the London Dock, Paddington Canal, a horse-pond, or any other vessel!

'No! for though the water at Wapping, the London Dock, in the Paddington Canal, a HORSE-POND, or any other vessel, be calm, it is not poetical. But your argument is this. "The sea is calm; the water in a horse-pond, or any other vessel, is calm; therefore the calm water in a horse-pond is as poetical as the sea!" No, my lord: for the sea cannot be made unpoetical, and your great powers cannot make the water in a horse-pond, or ANY OTHER VESSEL, poetical: and I will conclude with Cowper's description of the calm sea, whom, however, you call NO POET, and whom I think an original, pathetic, and great poet:—

"Ocean exhibits, fathomless and broad, Much of the power and majesty of God! He swatches about the swelling of the deep, That shines and rests, as infants smile and sleep."

Vast art is, it answers, as it flows, The breathings of the lightest air that blows. Curling and whitening over all the waste, The rising waves obey the increasing blast."

'But we must stop before the storm comes on, for I wish only to show how this "monotonous" object can, in its calmest state, and without a single ship, or any accompaniments, be rendered poetical.

'In fact, it does not seem to me, that your lordship makes distinction between the sea in painting, and the sea in poetry.

"The sun is poetical," by your lordship's admission; and to our cast, you say, by the many descriptions in verse. To which sentence I do not accede, as we possibly might have lost some of your own most beautiful descriptions. But to follow your argument.

"If the waves bore only foam upon their bosoms; if the winds waited only sea-weed to the shore; if the sun shone neither upon pyramids, nor fleets, nor fortresses, would its beams be equally poetical?" Answer:—

"The sun would be equally poetical, let it shine on what it may. If the waves bore only foam upon their bosoms, the ocean would be equally sublime, far from every track of vessel, every intrusion of man."

"The ocean, I affirm, wants not the accessories of any thing human to make it sublime, and therefore poetical. It is poetical, though not equally picturesque or beautiful, with or without them. The ideas it excites of Almighty power, are those of sublimity, the highest poetical sublimity, which proudly rejects any associations or accessories of human art, or of human kind, to make it more so. "The deep uttereth his voice," is one of the most sublime of the many sublime passages relating to it in the scriptures. We have no occasion to make it more poetical, to say, "there go the ships;" but the ship, moving beautiful to the sight, and almost seeming, as it were, a creature of the vast element, and made doubly interesting, as an object of beauty, by those accessories of nature, without which it is nothing; a ship so seen adds to the picture of poetical beauty, but not to the more awful ideas of SUBILITY, which are far more poetical. In sunshine, in calm, in tempest, by night, by day, in its deepest solitudes, it wants nothing of art to make it sublime, as speaking every where. "in the east and in the west," in the north and the south, with one everlasting voice, "Infinite and Power." What can be more sublime than this verse of the Psalmist? "If I take the wing of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall thy hand lead me."

'To return: "if the waves bore only foam upon their bosoms;"—"if the winds wafted only sea-weed to the shore;"—"if the sun had neither pyramids, nor fleets, nor fortresses, to shine upon; if it shone upon none of the emmetts of earth, man, or his little works; it would be equally a supererogatory object, in the visible creation, per se, abstractedly, and equally sublime; and it would be poetical, equally poetical, whether it shone on pyramids or posts, fortresses or pigsties," a "brass warming-pan or a footman's livery," though neither pigsties or posts could be sublime or beautiful, with or without it.

'Pyramids, I repeat, are most poetical from associations; and fortresses also: but brass warming-pans are images of in-door nature, and footmen's liveries are images of "artificial" life; and to say, that, because the sun can make one object poetical, it must necessarily make another so, is not an argument worthy of Lord Byron; and I am afraid we must say of the "sun" shining upon your "warming-pan" and "footman's livery," as of the "hog in a high wind,"

"It grieves me much, replied the clerk again, Who speaks so well, should ever speak in vain."

'But how much genuine poetry is condensed in one line, where a ship is spoken of,—

"SAILING IN SUNSHINE, FAR AWAY!"

'As for the sun on Mr. Campbell's ship, if the ship did not want the sun, to give it a more poetical interest, why did Mr. Campbell think it necessary to introduce the sun [at] all? "But the ship gives, as well as it receives;" so seen, it gives beauty, animating beauty, to the seas, not to the sun. It gives back, indeed, and amply repays what it receives;

but does a brass warming-pan give back any poetical beauty?

"The sun shines white upon the rocks!"

'The sun shines white upon the warming-pan; and so the sun shines on Dr. Syntax's wig; but try the effect,—

"Pale on the lone tower falls the evening beam."

"Pale on my grey wig falls the evening beam."

Therefore Mr. Campbell introduced the sun needlessly, if it did not make the ship more poetical; but though the ship, (being itself especially adorned, as if it came and went Narvae's chief favourite and delight among the works of art) gives, as well as it receives, beauty; a footman's livery does not do so, my lord, any more than an old wig, upon which the sun equally shines, as on the Hellespont, or the crest of Hector.'

As the subject has been often discussed, and Mr. Bowles is only contending with a new opponent, and not engaged in a new quarrel, the extract we have made will suffice to show the spirit in which the pamphlet is written. Mr. Bowles pays a due tribute to the genius of Byron, and, in a note, expresses his opinion of the unfairness with which his lordship has lately been treated. He says,—

'An attempt has lately been made to rob your lordship of much of your originality as a poet. I have seen some extracts from a publication of this kind. Some of the examples are like the description of Monmouth. "Why is Macedon like Monmouth? because there is a river in Monmouth, and a river in Macedon." I thought of devoting a few hours in shewing the unfairness of some of these instances; but I know you would say, "What! Bowles, defending me! non defensoribus istis!" The beautiful image of the "ship," in the Corsair,— which would not be necessary for your lordship to add, unless an image from nature was more beautiful than any you brought in the description of a ship from art: this "living ship," however, has been traced to Wilson, who has also a "living ship of loveliness." I forget the words;

"That seems to walk the waves—a thing of life!"

* The imputed plagiarism to which Mr. Bowles alludes, is in the following passage:—

Lord Byron.

—Of a ship
She walks the waters like a thing of life,
And seems to dare the elements to strife."

John Wilson.

—Of a ship;
She sailed amid the loveliness
Like a thing of heart and mind."

Now there is quite as good reason for suspecting, that Wilson borrowed this very common image (and we know not one in poetry more common) from Mr. Bowles, as that his lordship borrowed it from Wilson. If, however, these three choose to dispute about it, we will soon bring new combatants into the field.

—REV.

but if the image is to be taken from your lordship vi et armis, I may as well make my demand: for, in the poem, which, together with its unfortunate writer, formed part of your Satire, is the following description of "a ship" on her way:—

"The tall ship,

That, like a stately vane, in conscious pride,
Breaks beautiful the rising surge, and throws
The gather'd waves back, and seems to move
A LIVING THING, upon its lucid way, Streaming in lovely glory to the morn."

'The idea is the same: I objected to the words "lovely glory;" but somebody persuaded me to let them stay. But I do not believe, that either your lordship or Mr. Wilson borrowed from me; albeit, though, to be so told, your lordship might smile.

'I believe no mind, inclined to poetry, ever saw a ship in full sail, but has felt the propriety of the image.'

We now take our leave of the once 'Pope and Bowles,' but now 'Byron and Bowles,' controversy; and must confess that we prefer the poems of both to their criticism; that they may take the hint, and return to that course from which neither should have deviated, is our parting wish.

On the Beauties, Harmonies, and Sublimities of Nature; with Occasional Remarks on the Laws, Customs, Manners, and Opinions of Various Nations. By Charles Bucke, Esq. 4 vols. 8vo. London, 1821.

THE writer of this work is already favourably known to the public, as the elegant author of the 'Philosophy of Nature,' 'Amusements in Retirement,' the tragedy of the 'Italians,' &c. His present production embraces a most extensive subject—the whole field of nature, with its relative associations. What has been said of Lord Bacon, might, with great truth, be applied to Mr. Bucke, that 'his feeling for nature was the main side on which his philosophy ran into poetry, and vented itself in a very graceful, as well as grand, enthusiasm, befitting one of the high priests of wisdom.' Indeed, the whole character of Mr. Bucke and his work seem embodied in the precept of the poet:—

'Heaven's study more in nature, than in schools;
Let Nature's image never by thee pass
Like unmark'd dust; but those unthinking fools
Despise, who spy not Godhead through her glass.'

There is an elegant simplicity in Mr. Bucke's style, which harmonizes with the subject, and renders it doubly interesting; he has a fine taste, a well-cultivated understanding, and displays extensive reading; his reflections are those of a moralist and a philosopher.

pher. Though many of the scenes described in these volumes were contemplated by the author, yet he modestly conceals himself under the name of Colonna, and in his excursions, is accompanied by friends, who, are shrouded under disguised names, but who, we doubt not, will, on seeing his work, be reminded of many happy hours and pleasing associations. We shall make one or two extracts from the volume before us, but no solitary flower can give a sufficient idea of a garden so extensive and so diversified as this of Mr. Bucke. Our first extract is from the National Love of Trees :—

‘So natural is the love for particular trees, that a traveller seldom fails to celebrate those by which his native province is distinguished. Thus the native of Hampshire prides himself upon his oaks; the Burgundian boasts of his vines; and the Herefordshire farmer of his apples. Normandy is proud of her pears, which she fancies equal to those that grew in Camoen’s Island of Venus :—

‘Ah! if ambitious, thou wilt own the care,
To grace the feasts of heroes and the fair;
Soft let the leaves, with grateful umbrage, hide
The green-tinged orange of thy yellow side.

‘Book ix.

‘Prorencia celebrates her olives, and Dauphine her mulberries; while the Maltese are in love with their own orange trees. Norway and Sweden celebrate their pines; and Syria her palms, producing a fruit, of which the Syrians make bread, wine, honey, and vinegar; and from its body a species of flax, which they convert into cloth. The Paphians were proud of their myrtles, the Lesbians of their vines; Rhodes loudly proclaimed the superior charms of her rose trees; Media her citrons; India of her ebony, and Idumea of her balsams. This tree furnished the Judeans with an odorous perfume for their banquets of milk and honey; a remedy for many of their disorders; and a preservative wherewith to embalm their dead. Its medicinal qualities are beautifully alluded to by Jeremiah, when bewailing the sins and misfortunes of the Jews. “Is there no balm in Gilead: is there no physician there? Why, then, is not the health of the daughters of my people restored?” And again, where, prophesying the overthrow of Pharaoh’s army at the river Euphrates, he says, “go up into Gilead and take balm, oh virgin, the daughter of Egypt: in vain shalt thou use many medicines; thou shalt not be cured.” The Druses boast of their mulberries, and Gaza of her pomegranates;—

“— whose soft rubies laugh,
Bursting with juice, that Gods might quaff.”
‘Enchanted Fruits, l. 240.

‘Switzerland speaks of her lime trees, Bairoir of her figs and bananas, and Damascus of her plums.

‘Equally vain are the Chinese of their celebrated tea tree; the leaves of which were totally unknown to the ancients, and for many years the martyr of prejudice in Europe: yet imported with so much benefit, expense, and profit, as at once to confound the physician and the merchant. But a few years since, and the name of this plant was so unknown in our hemisphere, that a voyage to China would have been esteemed as unproductive as a voyage to the Straits of Magellan: now its virtues engage more of our capital than all other articles of foreign commerce.

‘The inhabitants of Jamaica never cease to praise the beauty of their manchenillas; while those of Tobasco are as vain of their cocoas. The natives of Madeira, whose Spring and Autumn reign together, take pride in their cedars and citrons; those of Antigua in their tamarinds; while they esteem their mammee sappota equal to any oak in Europe, and their mangos superior to any tree in America. Equally partial are the inhabitants of the plains of Tahta to their peculiar species of fan palm; and those of Kous to their odoriferous orchards. The Hispaniolans, with the highest degree of pride, challenge any of the trees of Europe or Asia to equal the height of their cabbage trees; towering to an altitude of two hundred and seventy feet! Even the people of the Bay of Honduras have imagination sufficient to conceive their logwood to be superior to any trees in the world; while the Huron savages inquire of Europeans, whether they have any thing to compare with their immense cedar trees.

‘The natives of India have the greatest respect for the aloe; the heart of which they esteem more valuable than gold itself: the Chinese, the Cochinese, the Japanese, and the Siamese, have an equal value for it. Some of them insist, that the spots where it grows are guarded by inaccessible rocks and wild beasts; while the Mangolians believe, that it was a native of Paradise; and that it was swept over the boundaries of Eden by a flood. Xerxes is said, by some writers, to have made war upon Greece, in order to possess himself of her fig-trees; as one of the Greek emperors invaded Cyprus, that he might be master of a country, producing such excellent vines. The Dutch, on the other hand, are held in the utmost detestation, by the islanders of Molucca, for having rooted up all their clove trees, for the purpose of confining the trade to the island of Ternate.

‘So natural is this love of mankind, that the ancients conceived even their gods to be partial to one tree more than another. For this reason, the statues of Diana, at Ephesus, were made of cedar and ebony; that of Apollo, at Syboure, of box; while in the temple on Mount Cylene, the image of Mercury was formed of citron; a tree which that deity was supposed to hold in high estimation.

‘England may well take pride in her

oaks! to them is she indebted for her existence as a nation; and were we an idolatrous people, I should be almost tempted to recommend (in imitation of our druidical ancestors), that the oak should be received in the number of our gods. It is a curious circumstance, my Lelius, and not generally known, that most of those oaks, which are called spontaneous, are planted by the squirrel. This little animal has performed the most essential service to the English navy. Walking, one day, in the woods belonging to the Duke of Beaufort, near Troy House, in the county of Monmouth, Colonna’s attention was diverted by a squirrel, sitting very composedly upon the ground. He stopped to observe his motions. In a few minutes the squirrel darted like lightning to the top of a tree, beneath which it had been sitting. In an instant it was down with an acorn in its mouth, and began to burrow the earth with its hands. After digging a small hole, it stooped down, and deposited the acorn: then covering it, darted up the tree again. In a moment it was down with another, which it buried in the same manner. This the squirrel continued to do, as long as Colonna thought proper to watch it. The industry of this little animal is directed to the purpose of security against want in the winter; and as it is probable, that its memory is not sufficiently retentive to enable it to remember the spots, in which it deposits every acorn, the industrious little fellow, no doubt, loses a few every year. These few spring up, and are destined to supply the place of the parent tree! Thus is Britain, in some measure, indebted to the industry and bad memory of a squirrel.—

“— That leaps from tree to tree,

for her pride, her glory, and her very existence.

There is a charming article on the music of birds, from which we shall, however, only detach a few passages :—

‘What lover of music, but is charmed with the various modulations of our English singing birds? The sweetness of the thrush; the cheerfulness of the sky-lark; the mellowness of the thrush, building near the mistletoe; the imitative talent of the bull-finch; the varied and familiar language of the red-breast, endeared to us, from our childhood, by so many agreeable associations; the wood-lark, priding herself in being little inferior to the nightingale, and sheltering her home in high-ground, under large tufts of grass, to shelter her from the cold; the vivacity of the wren, forming her nest with dry leaves and moss, among hedges and shrubs, encircled with ivy; the solemn cry of the owl; and the soft note of the linnet, building upon heaths with roots, and among thorns with moss, and subject to the disorder of melancholy! Not one of these birds breathes a single note, that is not listened to with pleasure :—

"—— Happy commoners
That haunt in woods, in meads, in flowery gardens,
Ride the sweets, and taste the choicest fruits,
Yet accost to ask the lordly owner's leave."

Rosee.

'But what bird, lute, or harp, shall we compare with the notes of the fly-bird of America, or the nightingale of Europe and of Asia?—the favourite bird of Sophocles and Tasso, and the subject of many an Arabic and Persian allegory. Pliny has described the effect of this bird's exquisite note, with appropriate warmth; and Walton, a writer of genuine feeling and simplicity, has celebrated it in the truest measure of applause:—"He, that, at midnight, when the labourer sleeps securely, should hear, as I have heard, the clear air, the sweet descent, the rising and falling, the doubling and redoubling of her voice, might well be lifted above the earth, and say, 'Lord! what music hast thou provided for thy saints in heaven, when thou affordest bad men such music upon earth.'"

'Kircher, in his Universal Harmony, endeavours to reduce the notes of the nightingale to a musical scale. But no instrument can successfully imitate this bird; though the human voice is capable of intonations equally sweet, and equally touching. Signor Guadagni, who enjoyed a considerable share of fame in England about the year 1780, had tones as rich and as mellow as the nightingale. The effect of this singer over the mind, we are told, arose principally from his imitating an Eolian harp. Unlike other singers, who affect a swell, or Messa-de-voce, he diminished his notes, dying in soft murmurs from the beginning to the end; and, giving his last whispers all the effect of distance, they seemed to ascend, till the sound was totally lost in the ecstasy of hearing; and though no note was heard, the ear listened, as if it expected a return.

"Music of Paradise! which still is heard,
When the heart listens."

Flowers on Graves is another subject on which the author has dwelt historically, and has moralized with much feeling:—

'Perfumes, which administer such pleasure to voluptuaries, were once supposed to be peculiarly grateful to the dying and the dead. A Persian poet has an elegant stanza on the rings of his mistress:—"Should the air waft the odour from the hair of my love, the perfume, stealing over my tomb, would recall me to life, and render me vocal in her praise." And because a custom, so amiable and elegant, as that of decorating with flowers the graves of relatives, conduces to the gratification of some of the best feelings of our nature, no apology will be necessary for dwelling upon it at length.

'The Romans of condition were generally buried in their gardens, or fields, near the public road. This custom, Propertius does not seem to have approved;

since he desires his friends by no means to observe it, in regard to himself: lest his shade should be disturbed by the noise of passengers. Ausonius has a similar sentiment. The manner, in which the Romans took leave of their friends, was extremely affecting:—"Vale, vale, vale! nos te ordine quo natura permiscuit—cuncti sequimur!" Then, wishing the earth to lie lightly on their relics, they departed. The monuments were then decorated with chaplets, and balsams, and garlands of flowers. To this affectionate custom Virgil alludes, when he describes Æneas sprinkling his father's grave with purple flowers; and, in another passage, where he exclaims:—

'Heu miserande puer! si qua fata aspera rumpas,

Tu Marcellus eris.—Manibus date lilia plenis;
Purpureo spargam flores, animamque nepotis
His saltem accumulem donis, et fungar inani Munere.

'This practice has prevailed among many of the most celebrated nations. The Persians adopted it from the Medes, and the Greeks from the Persians; and Pythagoras introduced it into Italy. The tomb of Achilles was decorated with amaranth; and the urn of Philopomen was covered with chaplets: and, that the grave of Sophocles was embellished with roses and ivy, we learn from an epitaph written by Simonides. Ivy and flowers, also, were planted near the grave of Anacreon.

'Virgil decorates the body of Pallas with strewed leaves of arbutus and other funeral evergreens. The ceremony of laying the unfortunate youth upon his bier is extremely affecting; and the passage, where he is compared to violets and hyacinths, plucked by the hands of a virgin, highly natural, beautiful, and pathetic:—

'Qualem virgineo demissum pollice florem
Seu mollis virgine, seu languentia hystacis:
Cui neque fulgor adhuc, necdum sua forma recessit;

Non jam mater alit tellus, viresque ministrat.
Æneid. xi. l. 63.

'To this we may add, that few passages, in that fine poem, abound more in natural pathos, than that, where Andromache is represented, as raising green altars to the memory of Hector:—a passage, reminding us of several in Ossian, where he describes the monuments, which were erected to the heroes of remote ages. "Narrow is thy dwelling-place now! dark is the place of thine abode! with three steps I compass thy grave, oh thou, that wert so great before! four stones, with their heads of moss, are the only memorial of thee! A tree with scarce a leaf, long grass, which whistles in the wind, mark, in the hunter's eye, the grave of the mighty Morar." Songs of Selma.—"O lay me, ye that see the light, near some rock of my hills; let the rustling oak be near; green be the place of my rest; and let the sound of the distant torrent be heard."

'In the times of the ancient fathers of the Christian church, crowns of flowers were placed on the grave-stones of virgins; and baskets of lilies, violets, and roses, on the graves of husbands and wives.

'The savages of the Mississippi frequently retire to weep over the graves of their lost relatives; and there is a tribe in those wilds, whose women go every day to the graves of their infants; and with silent and pathetic eloquence, which shames all noisy grief, shed bitter tears, and press some milk from their bosoms upon the grass, that covers their remains. This milk they call by a name, signifying the sap of the human breast. The burying-places of the people of Morocco are generally situated in the fields; where every one purchases a spot of ground, which he surrounds with a walk, and plants with flowers. In Java, they scatter a profusion of flowers over the bodies of their friends; and the Afghans hang cornets on tombs, and burn incense; while the ghosts are believed to sit at the head of their graves, invisible, enjoying the perfume.

'In China, whence, it is not improbable, the custom originally passed into Media, Persia, and Arabia, the ceremony of planting flowers on graves still prevails. The mausoleums of the Crimean Chans are generally shaded by shrubs and fruit-trees; and the Indians of Surat, who have a great veneration for the graves of their saints, strew fresh flowers upon them every year. In Scotland this practice prevailed, in the time of Drummond, of Hawthornden; and, among the Catholic cantons of Switzerland, as well as in many parts of North and South Wales, it is still the common custom of the country. The graves, in those beautiful and romantic provinces, are decorated, on Palm Sunday, with leaves of laurel, cypress, and all the flowers, which are in blossom at that early season of the year. Their graves are surrounded by small white-washed stones. In these little inclosures bloom the polyanthus and the narcissus, thyme, balm, and rosemary. Shirley has a melancholy allusion to this custom in his tragedy of the Traytor: and Shakespeare similar ones in Hamlet, Winter's Tale, and in Cymbeline; where Arrivagus, contemplating the body of Fidele, promises to sweeten his grave with the fairest flowers of summer.

'It is impossible to walk in the churchyards of North and South Wales, without reflecting, with pleasure, on the respect, which is paid to the memories of the dead. The epitaphs, however, are generally poor and meagre: yet I remember to have seen three, which most highly gratify every person of taste:—

I.

'Hope, stranger, hope. Though the heart breaks, still let us hope.

II.

'Timon hated men; Ophelia hated women. I once loved one man and one woman. He cheated, and she deceived me. Now I love only my God.

III.

"On Mary Pegree.

"The village maidens to her grave shall bring
The fragrant garland, each returning spring.
Selected sweets ! in emblem of the maid,
Who underneath this hallowed turf is laid.
Like her they flourish, beauteous to the eye ;
Like her, too soon, they languish, fade, and die

"In some villages, children have snow-drops, primroses, violets, hazel-bloom, and swallow blossoms on their graves. Persons of maturer years have tansy, box, rue, ivy, and other evergreens. I have, also, occasionally seen on the stones of elderly men broken tobacco-pipes. There is, generally, a guardian, as it were, to each grave; and I once saw a rose, done up neatly in a white piece of paper, on which was written, "May'st thou flourish in Paradise like this rose!"

IN all the discussions which took place in the House of Commons on the conduct of Warren Hastings, Mr. Pitt acted with the strictest impartiality, supporting some of the charges and voting against others, as they appeared to him to have been proved or not. He, however, refused to be one of the managers of the impeachment, which then consisted entirely of the members of the opposition. On the great question of the regency, in 1788, the conduct of Mr. Pitt is well known; he opposed, strenuously and successfully, investing the Regent with the full powers of sovereignty; and, in the correspondence with the Prince of Wales on the subject, he displayed an unshaken but respectful firmness, notwithstanding all the reports to the contrary. And yet, from the moment Mr. Pitt was placed at the head of the Treasury, to the present time (1789), he had the mortification of knowing, that the influence of the Prince of Wales was exerted against his administration. In the discussions in a previous year, on the debts of his Royal Highness, Mr. Pitt had acted with equal independence and liberality.

Mr. Pitt opposed the repeal of the test and corporation acts, but gave his support to the measures for the abolition of the Slave Trade, which he declared to be 'contrary to every humane, every charitable principle, and to every sentiment which ought to inspire the breast of man.' On the subject of Parliamentary Reform,

Mr. Pitt changed his sentiments, and when the question was brought forward in 1793, he boldly avowed that change in one of the most brilliant speeches ever delivered on this much agitated question, and from which we shall make an extract. He said, speaking of a reform in the representation,—

"It is a question upon which I have thought attentively. I am unwilling to weary the house with many observations upon my own conduct, or upon what seems not exactly to correspond with what I professed in the earliest part of my public character, because I am convinced, that the question to be brought forward, will involve something more than the character, the fortune, the connexion, the liberty, or the life of any individual. It may affect the peace and tranquillity which, under the favour of Providence, this country has long enjoyed, in a superior degree, perhaps, to any part of the habitable globe. It may affect us, who, from the time of general darkness and bondage, to the present hour, have sat quietly, perceiving other powers struggling with tyranny and oppression, while we enjoyed our freedom; it may bring us into anarchy and confusion, worse, if possible, than if we had to contend with despotism itself.

"I think, that the country should know, what the opinions of public men are upon the subject now before us, and how they feel at this moment. I confess they have a peculiar right to know from me, my opinion relative to parliamentary reform. I could have wished, that a subject of this immense importance, had been brought forward at a time when I was personally more able to take an active part in a debate than at present, but, above all, on a day on which the house had no other matter to attend to. I wish, also, that the honourable gentleman would bring it forward in some distinct proposition stated to the house, that they might, early in the next session of Parliament, take the whole question into consideration; in which case I should, perhaps, have reserved myself until the day appointed for the consideration of the subject; but as this is a general notice, without any specific proposition, I must say, I feel no difficulty in declaring, in the most decisive terms, that I object both to the time and to the mode in which this business is brought forward. I feel this subject so deeply, that I must speak upon it without any reserve. I will, therefore, confess, that, in one respect, my opinion upon this subject is changed, and I am not ashamed to own it. I retain my opinion of the propriety of a reform in Parliament, if it could be obtained without mischief or danger, by a general concurrence, pointing harmlessly at its object. But, I confess, I am afraid at this moment, that if agreed to by this house, the security of all the blessings we enjoy, will be shaken to the foundation. I confess I am not sanguine enough to hope that a reform at this time can safely be attempted."

The commencement of the French revolution, rendered the conduct of a British minister one of considerable difficulty, and opinions will never, perhaps, be reconciled on the measures he adopted. Our author has taken a very comprehensive view of the subject, and has vindicated the conduct of Mr. Pitt with considerable ability. In his concluding remarks on Mr. Pitt's policy in regard to France, he says,—

"The wisdom of Mr. Pitt's conduct, indeed, clearly appeared from the effect it produced upon some of the former opponents of his administration. Nothing but a sense of the most serious public danger, and a conviction of the absolute necessity of strengthening the hands of government, could have induced those respectable members of both houses, who had for nine years acted with the most determined hostility against Mr. Pitt, to stand forward in his support, and to relinquish all connexion with the leader of their party; who, besides other distinguished talents, is known to have possessed, in an extraordinary degree, the faculty of personally attaching to himself his political adherents. The junction of the Duke of Portland and his friends with Mr. Pitt, on the present occasion, reflected equal honour upon both; and this sudden change in so large a body of men, whose characters precluded all suspicion, either of unworthy motive or of weak delusion, must be considered as an early and unequivocal testimony in favour of those principles, a perseverance in which is acknowledged to have been the means, under Providence, of saving this kingdom and all Europe, from the galling yoke of Jacobinical tyranny.

"Such were the proofs which Mr. Pitt gave, at an age which added greatly to their effect upon his contemporaries, and must ever render them more interesting to succeeding generations, of consummate ability, undaunted firmness, sound judgment, and honourable policy; and such were his numerous and eminent services to his country, in the first nine years of his administration, during a period of peace. From this time to the end of his life, we shall have to follow him in the wise and vigorous conduct of a war, attended with circumstances and difficulties unexampled in the history of the world; and which the prosperity, strength, and resources derived from his former measures, together with his salutary and effectual provisions for war, at the time of profound and apparently settled peace, principally enabled the nation to support, and at length to bring to a most brilliant conclusion."

The second volume of this work, though containing a very able view of the political life of Mr. Pitt during an important period of his administration, affords little opportunity for extract; we shall, therefore, content ourselves with only noticing the dismissal of the Lord Chancellor Thurlow, who had been a very able adjunct to the ministry; and an instance of his late Majesty's personal esteem for Mr. Pitt:—

'The extraordinary manner in which the Lord Chancellor opposed the Loan Bill, rendered it necessary for Mr. Pitt to take a step, which the common friends of those two distinguished persons had for some time seen to be inevitable. From the commencement of Mr. Pitt's administration, to the period of the King's illness, the Lord Chancellor had acted with the utmost zeal and cordiality as a member of the cabinet'; but during the proceedings in Parliament, to which that unhappy event gave rise, a great alteration took place in his conduct; to such a degree, indeed, that upon several occasions, Mr. Pitt felt by no means confident what part he would take in the debates in the House of Lords. In all the discussions, however, relative to the regency, he invariably, and with apparent sincerity, supported the principles and measures of Mr. Pitt; but not entirely without suspicion, at the moment of the greatest difficulty, of a disposition to pursue an opposite line, in consequence of his being admitted to frequent interviews with the Prince of Wales. Whether the amendment which took place in the King's health, had any influence in this respect, it is impossible to know. After his Majesty's recovery the same coolness and reserve towards Mr. Pitt continued, and gradually increased, although there was no difference of opinion upon any political question, nor did there appear any other cause for dissatisfaction.

'This was a matter of so great importance, that it was thought right to make the King acquainted with it; and his Majesty wrote to the Lord Chancellor upon the subject, towards the end of November, 1789, and received such an answer as led him confidently to hope, that Mr. Pitt would in future have no reason to complain of the Lord Chancellor. This, however, proved by no means the case; and Mr. Pitt, at length convinced that he could not rely upon Lord Thurlow's co-operation, submitted to the King, at the beginning of the following November, the expediency of advancing Mr. William Grenville, who was then Secretary of State, to the peerage, for the purpose of conducting the public business in the House of Lords, and of remedying those inconveniences which had frequently arisen from the waywardness of the Lord Chancellor. To this proposal his Majesty immediately assented; but though Mr.

'Mr. Pitt used to say, that he always found it useful to talk over any measure, which he had in contemplation, with Lord Thurlow, as he was sure to hear from him every objection to which it was liable.'

Pitt had now the satisfaction of feeling entirely at ease, as far as the support of the measures of government was concerned in the House of Lords, yet he still had the mortification of observing a continuance of the same unfriendly disposition in the Lord Chancellor.

'One of the members of the cabinet, who had been intimately acquainted, as well as politically connected, with the Lord Chancellor for many years, repeatedly remonstrated with him upon his present conduct towards Mr. Pitt, which he represented to be the subject of serious concern to all their colleagues, and earnestly pressed him, both for public and private reasons, to state openly and candidly his ground of complaint; assuring him, that no offence or neglect had been intended, and that Mr. Pitt was ready to enter into an explanation upon any point he might wish. This friendly interposition entirely failed. No explicit answer could be obtained; nor did the Chancellor mention a single objection to Mr. Pitt's public measures, or specify one instance of inattention to himself. He persevered in taking every opportunity of marking his personal dislike of Mr. Pitt, though constantly warned of the unreasonableness and unavoidable consequence of such behaviour; and at last his spleen broke forth in a violent censure of a bill, to which he knew Mr. Pitt annexed the greatest importance; and he actually voted against it without having given any previous notice of his intention. Mr. Pitt, who had shown more forbearance than any other man would have done under similar circumstances, had now no alternative. Neither the good of the public service, nor a regard to his own feelings and character, would allow him to submit to such an indignity; and on the following morning, he respectfully submitted to the King, the impossibility of his remaining in office with the Lord Chancellor, and the consequent necessity of his Majesty making his choice between them'. The King was in some degree prepared for this communication; and the Lord Chancellor was immediately acquainted, by his Majesty's command, that he must resign the seals. But as a change was not desirable so near the end of the session, and some time was requisite to bring business, depending in the Court of Chancery, to a conclusion, he did not actually give up the seals till the

'Mr. Pitt, at the same time, wrote the following letter to the Lord Chancellor:—

"Downing Street, Wednesday, May 16, 1792.

'My Lord—I think it right to take the earliest opportunity of acquainting your lordship, that being convinced of the impossibility of his Majesty's service being any longer carried on to advantage, while your lordship and myself both remain in our present situations, I have felt it my duty to submit that opinion to his Majesty; humbly requesting his Majesty's determination thereupon.

I have the honour to be, &c. W. PITT.'

day of the prorogation, when they were placed in the hands of three commissioners.

'This dismissal of the Lord Chancellor was not followed by a single resignation or change in any political or legal department; nor was it expected to affect the vote of one member in either house of Parliament—a clear proof of the opinion which was entertained of Mr. Pitt's conduct upon this occasion.'

On the death of Lord Guildford, in 1793, the wardenship of the Cinque Ports, worth about 3000*l.* a year, became vacant, and the King immediately offered it to Mr. Pitt, in the following pressing terms:—

"Windsor, Aug. 6, 1792.

'Having this morning received the account of the death of the Earl of Guildford, I take the first opportunity of acquainting Mr. Pitt, that the wardenship of the Cinque Ports is an office for which I will not receive any recommendations; having positively resolved to confer it on him, as a mark of that regard, which his eminent services have deserved from me. I am so bent on this, that I shall seriously be offended at any attempt to decline. I have intimated these, my intentions, to the Earl of Chatham, Lord Grenville, and Mr. Dundas.'

'His Majesty, knowing that Mr. Pitt was at Burton Pynt, on a visit to his mother, sent the above letter to Mr. Dundas, in London, adding, "Mr. Dundas is to forward it with a few lines from himself, expressing, that I will not admit of this favour being declined. I desire that Lord Chatham may also write, and that Mr. Dundas will take the first opportunity of acquainting Lord Grenville with the step I have taken."

Although we deem the Bishop of Winchester's Life of Mr. Pitt a very valuable work, yet we think it might have been rendered more interesting if some portion of his private life had been mingled with his public labours; but his biographer has declared his intention to keep them separate, and the private life of Mr. Pitt will form part of the subject of the third and concluding volume. The work is not written with the ability which marked some of the controversial productions of the author; but it is a plain, honest, and straight-forward narrative, in which 'The King had always expressed a great desire to make some provision for Mr. Pitt. In May, 1790, Mr. Pitt applied by letter to the King, for the reversion of a titheliop of the exchequer, in favour of Lord Anckland's son, to which his Majesty assented; and added, "had Mr. Pitt proposed some means of rendering it of utility to himself, it would have been pleasing to me, as I do not feel easy at not having had an opportunity of securing a provision for him, in case of my paying that tribute to which every one is sooner or later subject."

historical fidelity and a becoming liberality of principle are alike manifest.

The temperate manner in which the work is written, appears to be a sad disappointment to some of our journalists, if we may judge by the way in which they have mentioned it. The Morning Chronicle, not finding any better ground of attack, discovered a great want of fairness in the reverend biographer, in concealing from his readers, that Mr. Pitt, previous to a debate in the House of Commons, would drink a bottle of wine in tumblers! and rakes up some anecdotes of the bishop's avarice. The Times newspaper, which is less proverbial for its liberality or its critical acuteness, quarrels with the bishop on the darkness of his work, and states that it ought have been given in a single octavo volume; and the editor of the Monthly Magazine, disdaining all half-measures, and reluctantly compelled to admit that the author has 'produced an interesting book,' accompanies the acknowledgment with the following remark, which we quote on account of its truth and elegance: 'Tomline, Bishop of Winchester, tutor of the last William Pitt, has published his promised Memoirs of that statesman, but at a price which adapts it to the purchase only of those who realized fortunes under the corrupt system of his administration. As a scrivener would make a fair copy at a third of its cost, the utility of printing seems baffled, and the scrivener's occupation may soon be expected to revive.'

Now it happens that this very work, which is so condemned for its high price, is one of the cheapest that we have seen for some time, of the same form and size. It contains no less than twelve hundred pages in two 4to. volumes, printed on good paper, and the price is only 3l. 3s. Mr. Southey's Vision of Judgment, which consisted of only seventy-nine pages, (one third of which were not original,) was published at 13s., or at four times the price, in proportion, of the Life of Pitt. So much for the darkness of the work, and as to a scrivener writing a copy of it for £1, the folly of the assertion might be overlooked, but for its falsehood and malignity. We know not at what rate the editor of the Monthly Magazine pays his scriveners, but if he gets them to copy twelve hundred quarto pages, or even one hundred, or even fifty, for £1, he certainly ought to conceal the wretchedness to which he reduces those he employs, or avow himself at once a hard task-master.

We have deemed it an act of justice to the right reverend biographer, to notice the charges thus made against him, as well as to show the liberality of discover critics.

1. Sketches from St. George's Fields.
By Giorgione di Castel Chiuso.
12mo. London, 1820.
2. Sketches from St. George's Fields.
By the same. Second Series. 12mo.
London, 1821.

In the first one hundred and three numbers of the Literary Chronicle did not bear tolerable evidence of our critical industry, we should deem it necessary to apologize to our readers for having neglected the 'Sketches from St. George's Fields' until they reached a second series. The author, we understand, is a Mr. Bailey, and though we cannot but wish that so clever a satirist had chosen a nobler theme, yet 'misery,' says Shakespeare, 'makes men acquainted with strange bedfellows;' and the author could not, perhaps, have more laudably diverted the ennu of a constrained residence, than by so successful an exercise of his genius and talents. The Sketches are at once humorous, satirical, and spirited, and often accompanied by reflections that are creditable to the heart as well as the head of the writer. He appears deeply read in the knowledge of human nature, and describes with force and correctness, its workings under various circumstances. We shall quote but one passage from the first series, which is descriptive of the inhabitants of the prison:—

'Here ruin'd lawyers ruin'd clients meet;
Here doctors their consumptive patients greet;
Of one malady that mocks all skill,
Without the true specific,—golden pill.
Hence finish'd tailors, never to be paid,
Turn eyes on many a coat themselves have made;
And bailiffs, caught by their own arts at last,
Meet those their capias yesterday made fast.
There walks a youth whose father, for reform,
Has shut him up where countless vices swarm.
But little is that parent skill'd to trace
The springs of action,—little knows the place,
Who sends an ailing mind to where disease
Its inmost citadel of health may seize.
Paint are the calls of decency, when broad
And naked vice can show her front unaw'd;
Where thrives what'er the vilest of our kind
Can touch to brutify and sink the mind;
Where weary reason fails her watch to keep,
And the tir'd conscience finds a troubled sleep;
Where every check and barrier is removed,
Of countenance fear'd, and bosom lov'd;
Where bold and bad examples lead the way,
And every hour facilitates decay;
Where ferocious impatience fires the blood,
Dis temper'd by the maddening neighbourhood;

Where hope of some short joy the sanguine draws,
And vanity is fed by bad applause,—
The brute his wanted offal seeks, the fool
Falls with his weight, or push'd by ridicule.'

'See you pale wretch—observe his vacant stare—
His lustre-lacking eye and matted hair;
His squalid hands, his soil'd and tatter'd dress,
Symbols, at once, of want and low excess;
Two months ago he was an airy thing,
Light, crisp, and elegant, and free of wing,—
Graceful in manners, stylish in attire,
In converse full of wit, of zest, and fire.
Soon sank his spirits, faded every grace,
Before the withering influence of the place;
Not of that order of high minds was he,
Whose efforts rise with growing misery;
From wine he sought false courage, and the glow
That gave a hollow respite to his woe;
Soon larger draughts were needful, in the sleep
That knew no memory each sense to steep.—
Then vile rotations of pernicious trash
Were swallowed, Reason from his brain to wash—
Behold him, now, confirmed the perfect sot,
That knows no heaven beyond a porter-pot.'

The 'Second Series,' just published, is neither deficient in spirit, humour, nor moral reflection, to its predecessor; and, although the satirist wages a 'motley war,' it is only against vice and folly. It is true, that those who have the misfortune to know the arcana of the King's Bench Prison, he has portrayed; but in their general features they are so true to nature, that personal identity is not necessary to assure us of their correctness. We shall quote a few extracts; and, first, of a Table d'Hôte in the prison:—

'You raw-boned and red whiskered fellow note,
With clean cravat,—he keeps a Table d'Hôte;
And every day—'tis his peculiar boast—
Smokes on the board the solid boiled or roast:
And sometimes you may see above the flesh,
Fish of the cheaper kinds, nor yet too fresh—
Herrings, a savoury mess—with onions fried—
To sauce the palate, and the taint to hide;
Or fumes from fish of ancient salt ascend,
To which coeval eggs their flavour lend:
Sometimes on greasy soup will pepper float;
It feeds you—or it scarifies your throat.
And plate is there: of silver spoons a brace—
Or plated, perhaps—o'er powder holds their place.
Only the host inquires if sure you pay,
And, answered, welcomes you from day to day;
And you may eat with such assorted crew,
As never met, nor more will meet, your view.
That easy negligence which constitutes
The grace of some, yet others scarcely suits,
May here be learnt. Here sit not those who ask
The rites you think the toilet's slightest task;
Here—where with unwashed hands and unkempt hair,
Hot racket-payers to their meal repair,
Feeding like hogs, and washing down their food,
With heady draughts, their chief beatitude.
And here are some would win you from such crew, Inviting you to join—"a chosen few,"

Men who companions with due care select
All gentlemen of manners most correct."

The author's curse on knavish attorneys is very spirited. He has been describing the means by which they ensnare and plunder such as have the misfortune to come within their grasp:—

'Two such—and deeply I the knowledge rue—

Two dark confederates in guilt, I knew.
Well they agreed where'er they set their toils,
And quarrelled only when they shared the spoils.

Their love of plunder still their league renewed,
Still jealous greediness revived the feud.
At length a quarrel fiercer than the rest,
The caution burst of either guilty breast:

Each of his partner then such things revealed,
That I escaped them, ere my fate was sealed.

Whip, O ye strongest arms that e'er applied
The sounding lash to vile delinquent's hide,
Whip me such villains thro' each crowded street,

To Tyburn's distant turnpike from the Fleet!
Sharp be the lash, and burning be the smart
They feel behind the slowly moving cart;
And let their screams resound, that far and near
The heart of conscious guilt may quake with fear.

Yet, let the scourge their backs in furrows plough,

Let the red iron sear each hardened brow,
And mark for common scorn for many a day
The villains that upon the wretched prey,
Bring drier plagues upon the house of woe,
And heavier fetters round the captive throw.

Metaphors (if Gog and Magog at Guildhall Kesham's Amreet cup their own might call,
'Twere fate befiting these Attorneys twain,
In equal shares its beverage to drain)

Then each his body, red with fiercest glow,
Before the giant images should throw,
Each as a pedestal to serve, to feel
Of Magog this, and that of Gog, the heel;

That none might e'er approach the judgment seat,

But well should mark the fate for villains meet.

The thief that claps a pistol to your breast,
The midnight burglar that invades your rest,
The desperate forger, when compared with these,

Are culprits that the voice of Reason frees.
E'en those that spoil the maimed less move our ire,

Less those that rob the sufferers in a fire.
The Leech drops off when saturate of blood;
The Vampire flies, gorged with the crimson flood;

But these, when feasted, more in hunger rave,
And their foul food with fiercer fury crave,
Like Ghouls obscene, that in the darkest gloom,
(So shuddering Arabs tell) infect the tomb,
And still insatiate, thro' the night tho' fed,
Reluctant quit at dawn the mangled dead.'

Our last extract we select on account of the beautiful allusion to the death of the much-lamented Princess Charlotte. The author is describing the interior of the King's Bench Prison:—

'There, in the centre, is the chapel door,
With ever-changing notices upon the floor,
Whatever doctrines may within be taught,
With words of peace that door is rarely fraught:
For there, 'mid notices of beds for hire,
Of concerts in the State-house by desire,

Some ill-spelt scrawl demands the mighty debt
Of half a crown, with a ferocious threat;
Some traitorous agent is denounced; some spy,
That blab'd of gin, is hung in effigy.

Here angry fooks proclaim the petty jar,
And clumsy pasquinades provoke to war.

Yet even here, at times, such words have place,

As such a door may wear without disgrace.

On that dark day when all the nation's sighs
Rose for the light withdrawn from our sad eyes,
When Britain's fondest proudest hopes were cross'd,

And both the mother and the babe were lost,
Even here the blow was felt; and darkness fell,

With deeper shade on Grief's own citadel.

On that most mournful day the chapel door
A sad and solemn exhortation bore:

In simple but affecting terms it told
The loss, for which how ill we were consoled!

The virtues and the graces that are gone,
And left the throne no promise like them—none!

No witting 'ere the righteous tribute assem'd;
The hardened scoffer's folly disappeared;

But on the day when that untimely tomb
Closed 'ere the blossom snatch'd in its first bloom,

The prisoners met with one consent, to pray,
And own the power that gives and takes away;
That oft confounds the wisdom of the wise,
In ways that mock the ken of human eyes.'

In conclusion, we cannot but express our regret, that an author with such talents, should have been schooled in the misery that he portrays; we trust, however, that he has escaped the contagion it too often communicates, and that his future sketches will be from subjects on which he may dwell with more pleasure, and treat no less happily, than St. George's Fields. We ought to add, that each volume of the series contains several well executed wood-engravings, from original and appropriate designs.

On the ascension of Queen Mary to the throne, in 1553, she found the coinage nearly brought to a perfect standard by the wise counsel and exertions of her predecessor. She issued a proclamation, in which she held out the promise of bringing the silver to the old sterling, when, in fact, it was her determination to debase it. During her short reign, she had several coinages; and before her marriage, her title upon the coin was, 'Maria Dei Gratia Anglie, Francie, et Hibernie, Regina.' In July, 1554, she married Philip of Spain, who brought with him a vast quantity of wealth: seven-and-twenty chests of bullion, every chest being a yard and some inches long; and these were drawn in twenty carts to the Tower; after which came ninety-nine horses, and two carts loaded with coined gold and silver. The first money struck after the marriage, had the Queen's bust only; but a new die was soon cut, with the heads of both the King and Queen, with the titles, 'Philip et Mariæ Dei Gratia R. Anglie, Francie, et Neapolis Princeps Hispanie.' In some of the later coins, the titles of Naples and Spain, and in others, that of France also are omitted. The shield on the reverse has the arms of Spain impaled with England. The motto upon her silver coins, before her marriage, was 'VERITAS TEMPORIS FILIA.' Afterwards, 'POVI-MUS DEUM ADIUTOREM NOSTRUM.' On her gold money, both before and after her marriage, we find, A DOMINO FACTUM EST ISTUD ET EST MIRABILE IN OCULIS NOSTRIS. The obverse of the mint is to be found only upon the pennies.

The reign of Elizabeth is an important one in the annals of the coinage. She called in the base money by proclamation, and had it converted into sterling, at a separate mint in the Tower, in 1560-61. The quantity of base money brought into the mint in that year, was 631,930 lbs. from which 244,416 lbs. of fine monies were made, leaving no less than 387,514 lbs. of dross, which, Stowe informs us, was carried to foul ways, to lighten them:—

'A strange story is told of the workmen who were employed in melting these base coins; that most of them fell sick to death with the savour, and that they were advised to drink in a dead man's skull for their rescue. That, accordingly, a warrant was procured from the council, to take off the heads from London Bridge, and to make cups of them, out of which they drank, and found some relief, although most of them died.'

If there be any truth in this tale, which is related by both Agarde and Hearne, it is probable that the sickness arose from the fumes of arsenic with which the base metal was fluxed.

A medal was struck to perpetuate the memory of this event. On the obverse side it bore the Queen's bust, full-faced, with this inscription, 'ER ANGLIE GLORIA.' On the reverse, Justice, seated, bearing the sword and balance; with this legend, 'BENE CONSTITUTA RE NUMARIA.' The Queen seems to have prided herself much on the reformation of the coinage, as we find her frequently and publicly boasting, that she had 'conquered now that monster which had so long devoured her people.' It must, however, greatly detract from the Queen's merit in this respect, that she permitted, by several commissions, her master of the Mint to vary from the terms of his indenture, for the express purpose of coining the money of less weight and fineness.

The Queen's title on her coins, differed little from that of her sister Mary before her marriage, for she was styled ELIZABETH DEI GRATIA ANGLIÆ, FRANCIÆ, ET HIBERNIÆ REGINA. On some of the smaller pieces, however, that title was omitted, and they bore only E. D. G. ROSA SINE SPINA. Those pieces had the place of mintage on the reverse.

The mill and screw were first introduced into the Mint in the year 1561, but they were either imperfectly constructed, or, what is equally probable, the officers of the Mint were prejudiced against the use of them, and they were declared defective.

One of the first acts of James I. on his accession to the English throne, was to fix the value at which the Scottish coins should be current in England. The want of coins of small value, had driven private traders to issue farthing tokens of lead; but these illegitimate coins were abolished by proclamation, in 1613, and a coinage of copper farthings was then first commenced in the Mint. In the course of this King's reign, a good deal of money was coined of silver, refined from the lead of the mines in Wales, and the money was marked with the Welsh feathers, placed over the royal arms, upon the respective reverses.

The title of James was varied from that of all his predecessors, on account of the union of the two kingdoms under one imperial crown. On the coins which were first struck after his accession to the English throne, it ran thus, 'Jacobus Dei Gratia Angliæ, Scotiæ, Franciæ, et Hiberniæ, Rex.' This, in the second year, was changed to 'Jacobus Dei Gratia Magnæ Britanniæ, Franciæ, et Hiberniæ, Rex.' His earliest English coins had on the reverse, 'Exurgat Deus dissipent inimici.' But after his second year, all the inscriptions on the various reverses alluded to the union of England and Scotland, which he earnestly desired, but was unable to accomplish.

As we come down to the more recent period of our history, we shall not deem it necessary to be so minute, since the coinage then becomes more familiar to the public. The reign of Charles I. is memorable for the great improvement which took place in the workmanship of the coins. The merit of this must be ascribed to a foreign artist, Nicholas Briot, a native of Lorraine, who, quitting France in disgust, had great encouragement from Charles I. whose taste in the Fine Arts is universally admitted. Briot was made a denizen, by letters patent, in 1628, and authorized to frame and engrave the first designs and effigies of the King's image, in such sizes and forms as should serve in all sorts of coins of gold and silver. The various expedients to which Charles resorted to replenish his coffers in his necessities, are well known, and it is sufficient here to observe, that they were all injurious to the coinage. The great variety of the money coined by Charles the First, prevents us from noticing the several coins; for, besides the regular silver pieces, which were of a size and value well known as the currency of the kingdom, there were also others of irregular form and value, which the immediate want of money obliged the King to coin at various places. These are called siege pieces, or money of necessity; and were either coins of larger size than had ever been used before, as the twenty or the ten shilling pieces of silver or rude masses of plate; clipped off, and stamped with some hastily-formed device, and even retaining, in certain instances, the moulding of the salvers from which they were cut.

In the beginning of the Commonwealth, the House of Commons resolved that the inscriptions on the coins should be in the English tongue; that on the one side, on which the English arms should stand alone, should be this inscription—'The commonwealth of England;' and on the other side, which should bear the arms of England and Ireland, 'God with us.'

These coins were the subject of standing jokes with the cavaliers. The double shield on the reverse was called the 'breeches of the rump,' and from the legend they observed that God and the commonwealth were on opposite sides; another writer speaking of this coin said—

'May their success like to their coin appear,
Send double crosses for their single cheer.'

In the year 1656, Cromwell ventured to coin money with his own head and style; but there is no proof that he ever published it as the current money of England. The pieces were eminently beautiful, being the work of Thomas Simon, who was appointed chief engineer of the mint and medal maker, by whom they were coined with the greatest care and exactness by the mill and screw. Antiquaries have differed much as to the extent of this coinage, but, after all, it appears certain that it was never the current money of the kingdom.

It is not certainly known that Charles the Second coined any money before his restoration; but Mr. Folkes conjectured that some five shillings and two and sixpenny pieces were struck by him during the interval between his father's death and his own restoration. It is probable that these coins were struck in Ireland by the Marquis of Ormond, who proclaimed the king in all the places which owned his authority within a fortnight after his father's death. Soon after the restoration of the king, the currency of the coins with the stamp of the commonwealth was prohibited; and in the course of his reign a new coinage of gold, silver, copper, and tin monies was issued. His style upon the English gold and silver coins was the same as his father's, with the addition of the Roman numerals for distinction; but on his copper and tin money it was simply 'Carolus a Carolo,' and on the reverse 'Britannia.'

The short and unhappy reign of James II. was in no respect more disgraceful than in the state to which he reduced the coinage in Ireland. His English money, however, escaped violation, for he was forced to abandon that kingdom before his pecuniary necessities became very urgent. The base metal of which this king formed his Irish coinage is said to have been 'a mixture of old guns, old broken bells, old copper, brass and pewter, old kitchen furniture, and the refuse of metals melted down together and valued by the workmen in the mint at three or four pence the pound weight; but when coined into sixpenny, twelve-penny, and halfcrown pieces, and made current by arbitrary power, it passed at the rate of five pounds sterling the pound weight.' Of this base money there was coined and issued to the amount of 2,163,237l. 9s. the produce of 6,495l. the real value of the metal. In this wretched sort of money the Popish soldiers were paid their subsistence, and the Protestant tradesmen and creditors were obliged to receive it for their goods and debts; so that it is calculated that they lost above 60,000l. a-month by this iniquitous coinage.

On the accession of William III. to the throne, various useful regulations were made respecting foreign money, and for preventing the debasing of the English coin, which was then done to an alarming extent. A recoinage was completed in 1699, when nearly seven millions of silver money were coined.

The second splendid period in the annals of our mints is the reign of Queen Anne, for the beauty of her coinage is only exceeded by the admirable works of Simon, during the protectorate of Cromwell, and part of the reign of Charles II. In 1707 an alteration was made in the royal arms on both the English and Scottish coins. England and Scotland were then imaged in the first and third quarters, France placed in the second, and Ireland in the fourth. The coin was declared of the same standard and value throughout the united kingdom as it was at that time in England; and a mint was still continued at Edinburgh.

It was in this reign that Dean Swift delivered to the Lord Treasurer his plan for improving the British coin, and which, if adopted to its utmost extent, would have ennobled our coinage, and have elevated it far above the rank of a mere medium of commerce. Nothing more, however, was done, than the striking a few pattern farthings and halfpence. One of the former has Britannia under a portal, holding an olive branch in her hand; there is another with Peace in a car, and this inscription, PAX MISSA PER ORBEM; these are dated in 1713; and a third has a female figure standing with an olive branch in her right hand, and a spear in her left, and this legend, BELLO ET PACE, 1713. The halfpenny has a rose and thistle upon the same stalk, on the reverse, in allusion to the union. None of these were ever current.

Picturesque Tour of the Seine.

Part IV. May.

THE last number of this elegant work is equal to any of its predecessors, in point of decoration, and is more important in the nature of its subjects. It contains, among other things, a very interesting historical account of the Abbey and Church of St. Dennis, but it is too long for our insertion, and we shall, therefore, content ourselves with inserting what we believe is a well-merited tribute to the memory of the first wife of Napoleon, the Empress

Josephine, from the author's account of Malmison:—

'Having passed the bridge of Chatou, I perceived a mansion nearly concealed from view by trees. "It is Malmison," said my guide. This single word was sufficient to remind me of her who there terminated her career, and I resolved to survey the place more closely. She soothed the rigour of authority with her kindness and generosity, and the extent of her power was known only by that of her benevolence. Never did the wretched apply to her in vain: accessible to all, and especially to the unfortunate, they returned cheered from her presence; and at the moment when you would have expected her to be intoxicated with homage and adulation, she did not forget that she had been called the mother of the poor. While absorbed in reverie, chance conducted me to the church-yard, and into the church of Ruel. I inquired for her tomb, and was answered, "There she lies. I beheld, on the pavement, a flat stone, without inscription. What! not the slightest obstacle to protect her last abode, to preserve her ashes from being trampled under foot! Grace, beauty, power, all are laid here, and no mark apprises the wanderer that here reposes the benefactress of mankind. The indigent alone are but too well acquainted with this fatal spot, which has swallowed up all their hopes: there is nothing remarkable about this stone, but they know that hither they must come to weep over her who so often dried their tears. The sight of this humble grave, the depository, nevertheless, of such precious remains, plunged me into the most melancholy reflections. It was some time before I perceived an old man at my side, surveying me with attention. There is a natural sympathy between good hearts; though we had never spoken to each other, we were already acquainted. "My dear sir," said he, "who is better qualified than myself, to tell you of her whom we call the good Josephine? She fed me for eight years. How shall I describe to you the day we lost her? She was borne to this her last abode, by those whom she had supported, and followed by her afflicted servants, by the poor, and by women and children, who were now left destitute. Ah, sir! what tears, what cries of anguish, when the coffin was lowered into the grave. Believe me, the poor are not ungrateful; for six years past, I have come every morning to this spot to offer up my prayer." I pressed the hand of

* The house, though but one story high, contains spacious apartments. The park is one of the finest in the neighbourhood of Paris. Here Josephine formed a botanic garden, containing all the rarest exotic plants, either in the open air or in hot-houses; a complete menagerie of all the species of animals which can exist in the climate of the north of France; and an agricultural school. The Empress, who was attached to arts and sciences, had made other valuable collections at Malmison.

the aged speaker, and left the church, blessing the memory of her who deserved such a funeral oration.'

LETTER FROM W. B. L. TO THE PUBLIC.

GENTLE READER,—With downcast eyes and a sheepishness of face, we address ourselves unto thy most compassionate clemency. Our pen fluttereth within our finger points like unto the foliage of the aspen-tree, and our heart assuredly paineth us nigh unto choking. Of our trepidation thou mayest conclude when we assever, that, for four mortal hours have we essayed to prelinimize, and have, as yet, progressed but thus far. Most sweet and silver-hearted reader, (oh! that our adjectives be propitious) we tremble; for have we not (though thereunto compelled) launched our frail and untarred bark upon literary waters! We quail at every movement of our quivering scull; verily, there seemeth within the 'Fives-Court' of our bosom, a pigmy race of Randalls and Mendozas, so outrageously do our internals beat against our fair and fleshy frame.

We are (assist us, O divinities!) we are to make known unto thee, that in the absolute compliance with our desires, (particularized in a certain epistle, the which, though destined for sole and confidential purposes, to our utter dismay, hath been revealed unto the world twice seven days ago—) on Tuesday, the first day of May (instant), our very excellent friend, to whom thou and I are under an eternity of obligation, with PARRY, and (to the total discomfiture of Betty House-maid) SAM SPRIITAIL (honest Sam), en suite, dropped from the density of a metropolitan atmosphere into the purer regions of rurality; but whether—and here, reader, most delectable and dear, here's the rub!—whether from the suddenness of the transition, or from divers hilarious and revellous proceedings, we nothing surmise; yet, natheless, so it fell, that upon the second morn of our festivities, be, our friend aforesaid, recognized sundry internal symptoms of a nature squeamish and peculiar, which appeared unto his discernment, fit studies for the lacerations of our neighbour, Nicholas Nickum, M. D.*

* We may be allowed to note, that from the never-failing success which attends this worthy man's endeavours in depopulating the vineyard of which he is the glory and the pride, we have every reason to surmise, that, if spared for a few

It becometh not at this moment requisite to discuss the precise malady of our friend, but rather, excusively, to state, that, regardless of bodily infirmities, and with an eye to this his beloved offspring, deeming it advisable its temporary superintendence should devolve upon our well known-sagacity, (so was he pleased to compliment our poor ability,) furnished us with manifold and explicit instructions, touching the conduct thereof. Could we refuse our humble efforts? we somewhat suppressed the agitation of our breast, and throwing ourself into the right-hand corner of our carriage, bade Stephen (our coachman,) direct our course towards town.

We had pledged ourself to indite as tolerable a paper as possible, on some trite subject, which might compensate to the many hundreds of whom we are conned, for the absence of our poor friend's masterly cogitations; but, alas! little did we think of the performance of that pledge—else had we indubitably plunged into the first river we had met, and submissively have yielded up the ghost.

Oh! reader, it is surely one thing to read and another to write. Yea, wonderfully pleasant is it to pore upon an exquisite periodical—with what a goodly feeling of impatience do we await the coming of our newsmen—how anxiously are our eyes directed a-down the shrubbery, over the little white bridge, just across the green meadow, and then into the violettéd lane, whose very fragrance seems to court his coming—how impatient are our ears of all sounds, which disturb the melody of his taper horn—and when his tired and tedious steps, have borne him to our door, with what a holy eagerness do we wreath our fingers amid its pages, still moist with its own peculiar bloom, how quickly do we assume our pebbled optics, (power, No. 5.) and glut our senses upon the delicious and delighting herald. Were our mind and imagination less hurried, we could have upon several beautiful stanzas (Spenserian) thereupon.

Yea, all this is prodigiously sweet, but turn the cups, and—lo!

Behold the plodding author at his toil—and reverse. See him, reader, see him in his study, (i. e. a garret, ten feet five inches per seven feet three inches,)—look at that haggard eye—that pallid cheek—that distracted gaze yean, (which heaven grant,) will stand a prominent illustration of the hypothetical absurdities, both of Godwin and Mathews.

—that hesitating and undetermined step—he pauses—starts—rushes to his chair (always providing he have one)—and pauses again—and, anon, he grasps a pen—but ah,—his hand creeps towards the standish as though it blashed for the brain which impels it.

Reader, (barring the garret,) thou hast here a portrait of myself, and so strongly were we possessed with an author's struggles, that we found our (naturally inventive) faculties expand, and suddenly acquire strength, breadth, and colour; our goose quill (we pray you mistake not our meaning) sped with a velocity absolutely astonishing (albeit, we ken well our admirable capacities when cool,) to ourself. Three columns and odd, (type liliptian,) by a saving computation, were wrought in sixteen minutes and three seconds—mere transcription time—sentence followed sentence, and paragraph paragraph, of deep and dolorous detail; but, at the very moment we were breaking into eloquence, the devil (we mean, of course, our own peculiar imp,) broke in upon us like unto a thunder clap, squeaking out, that Mr. Flagherty O'Shaughnessy O'Rourke (our foreman,) was waiting for 'copy,' that the press was at a stand, and that three columns would complete the paper. Three columns! three pages would not have sufficed for what we had written; but, what was to be done? we journeyed round our chamber sixteen revolutions; and then, in the deepness of our desperation, did we dispatch the whole unto Mr. O'Flagherty O'Shaugh—something; and thus placed ourself into his discriminating judgment.

Therefore, sweet reader, take we our leave for the present week, hastily promising much mirth for the coming.

Thine, in good faith,

W. B. L.

Postm. We propose an essay on chop-houses in our next, and expect it will be excellent and savoury.

SOME ACCOUNT OF EVERYBODY.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—As I have been, for a long time, a subscriber to your journal, which, whatever may be your modesty, you cannot but know that Everybody reads and admires, it fell to my lot to peruse the 'Life and Adventures of Nobody,' contained in one of your late numbers. And I could not but give my assent to those wonderful adventures with which 'Nobody's' career has abounded, and which it would be vain for Everybody to attempt to rival. However, although I cannot pretend that my life has been equally prolific with marvels, I still think that, when I have thrown together some few passages of it, you will be disposed to exclaim, with one of my favourite poets,—

‘Hænos erit huic quæque pono!’

After what I have just said, to stumble in limine, or at the first step of my journey, may appear somewhat ominous; but with a due regard to that veracity to which Everybody at all times pretends, I must admit, that I have no very high claims on the score of genealogy. For, while I am ready to grant, that 'Nobody' can carry his family higher than Adam, I must, at the same time, acknowledge that Everybody cannot boast of that enviable distinction, although it is equally certain that his family must have originated with the great sire of mankind. However, as I have not the honour of belonging to the stock of the renowned Arthurs and Cadwaladers, those redoubtable champions of Wales, I have no ambition to speak of the merits of my progenitors. In this respect, if you will pardon my pedantry, I will adopt the words of the Roman poet, and say—

Fis ex nostra uoce!’*

From my ancestors I pass, then, to that more interesting topic—myself, on which Everybody is so well known to delight to dwell. And here I am bound to confess, that, in a general view, my character is neither more nor less than a perplexing and contradictory compound of negatives, which it is impossible to fix to any one point. For, it is universally allowed, that Everybody is not virtuous, that Everybody is not vicious, that Everybody is not an idiot, and that Everybody is not a sage; while, on the other hand, I can never be said to be gifted with any one positive quality, good, bad, or indifferent. It is impossible, therefore, that even 'Nobody' himself should present a greater riddle of contrarities and incongruities, than I do in these my negative characteristics.

But, notwithstanding that my virtues and vices are thus neutralized, there are some points on which I am not quite so unfortunate; and one is, my reputation as a critic. Thus, although I have not the presumption, Mr. Editor, to vie in critical dignity with yourself, while wasted, as you may be at this moment, in your chair of Aristarchus, I am still allowed to have the nicest and most just discrimination of what is really excellent in an author. Hence I have never failed to appreciate and admire the sublimity of Homer, the eloquence of Demosthenes and Cicero, and the sound sense and luminous philosophy of Bacon and Locke; not to mention a host of writers, of all nations and all ages, whose characteristic excellencies, ever since they wrote, have, it is well known, been the delight and admiration of Everybody. But, on the other hand, I have often, much to my injury, had the credit of applauding works which I never opened,—as in those instances which 'Nobody' has so truly particularised in your late number. Thousands of modern authors have, in this manner, been made to derive their fame from my liberality, while to have bestowed it in such cases would have proved me a mere Tyro in these matters, which, I need not affirm, Everybody is not. And I must add, that I have to charge publishers and authors themselves, with taking these unwarrantable liberties with my good name and reputation, which they do sometimes vide voce, and, at others, through that notorious vehicle of delusion—an advertisement. What more common than to hear or read upon these occasions, such expressions as the following:—'Everybody reads it'—'Everybody talks of it'—the work is in Everybody's hands—'Everybody admires it,' while it is a matter of notoriety, that the book in question, if read at all, must have been read by—'Nobody,' to the justice of whose feeling lamentation on this very point I most heartily subscribe.

Among the marvellous singularities of 'Nobody's' life, as recorded in your journal*, are included his immortality and his ubiquity. Now, far be it from me to set up in opposition my own pretensions on these points, especially the first, since it is well known, that Everybody must die as well as that Everybody has been born; but, on the score of ubiquity, it may appear a little remarkable, that although I occupy the whole of this immense globe, which alone could contain Everybody, I am still never the inhabitant of any particular country. For who, for instance, ever heard, that Everybody had been in England, in Italy, or in Germany? Nay, even when at the close of the late war, France became the grand focus of attraction, and when the public prints had the assurance to assert, that Everybody was at Paris, I was no more there than I was, at the time, in Otaheite, Algiers, or among the Chickataw Indians.

Now, while I am on this point, I cannot help preferring a serious accusation against two arrant impostors, who have, from time immemorial, committed, on my credit, the most shameless forgeries on the credulity of the public. One of these fellows is an Englishman, and goes by the name of 'All-the-World;' and the other, who is a rascally Frenchman, is well known as Monsieur 'Tout-le-Monde.' It would be impossible to enumerate all the impositions these two swindlers have practised to gain a disgraceful livelihood at my expense, extorting frequently from their dupes, sums to a large amount, and yet, to the reproach of public justice be it said, hitherto with impunity. It is London and Paris that this brace of worthies have usually selected as the theatres of their exploits, and where, accordingly, you will often find, that 'All-the-World,' or 'Tout-le-Monde,' patronized such a play—applauded such an opera—was present at such an exhibition—or bought this or that newly-invented article, et sic de similibus; thereby insinuating, that Everybody had done all this, and so inducing the credulous and misled public to part with their wits or their money, and often with both together, on the strength of my well-known character for critical discernment, to which I have already advertised. All this, Mr. Editor, is, you will perceive, neither more nor less than a gross cheat; and I wish you would announce it as such. And in particular I wish you would warn your readers, or the public, (which is the same thing,) that when they hear of 'All-the-World' being at Almacks—at Lady C—'s rout,—or at the Marchioness of H—'s masquerade, they are not to infer Everybody was there, since, by so doing, I should consider myself grossly defamed. For never will it happen, I hope, that Everybody shall hold his character so lightly as to frequent such places of immorality and dissipation. And, besides, to say the truth, I cannot well see how I could be present at any of those scenes of disorder, without first undergoing the torture of the bed of Procrustes, or, to adduce a more apposite allusion, without assuming the attributes of Milton's Devils, when assembled in Pandemonium, and when, according to the poet, they

* Reduced their shapes immense, and were at large,

Though without number, still within the hall Of that infernal court.'

I might swell this epistle to a very inconvenient bulk, were I, Mr. Editor, to insist upon all the honourable mention that hath been made of me by the most celebrated writers, ancient as well as modern, under the various appellations which have been bestowed upon me in different countries. At one time, hath been recorded my compassion for the injured and oppressed; at another, my indignation against the tyrant and oppressor. One writer describes me as the enemy of vice; another, as the unshaken friend of virtue and morality. In a word, my character has, for the most part, been painted, though it ill becomes me to say with what justice, in the most flattering colours, and which has been the reason why so many have been, in all ages, desirous of cultivating my friendship and good opinion. And I can assure you, Mr. Editor, in conclusion, that as long as you continue to conduct your journal in the manner you now do, it cannot fail to be read and admired, as it now is, by EVERYBODY.

MEDIA RES.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—I should feel, as in duty bound, infinitely obliged to any of your classical correspondents, that would inform me, whether the following passage,—which I extract from an antiquated hebdomadal journal, published about two centuries ago by a juno of bibliopoliasts, and entitled Longueuranne's Cennage Abderigier,—be strictly according to Hoyle. The passage occurs in the review of an ancient work, yclept Takpuges, or the Life of a Collegianne, whereof I have seen no other notice than in the aforesaid journal.

'There is a chaste humour,' quoth the critic, whose language I shall take the liberty to modernize, 'in some of the more striking sketches, which differs as much from the broad caricature as it does from the beau ideal; it is in media res, and forms almost a peculiar style, partaking intimately of the ridiculous and the natural.'

It will readily be seen, even through my modern emendations, that the reviewer hath, in his English, approached pretty near the language of the present day, which, all circumstances duly considered, cannot but be deemed marvellous; but I wish some of your erudite readers would satisfy me whether he hath been equally felicitous in his Latin. How the expression, medias res, may have been construed when the learned writer flourished, I am not sufficiently skilled in black letter lore to determine, but I have ever understood that, in our times, as in the days of Horace, the phrase in question hath implied 'the middle or marrow of a subject,' or of any other thing, and not, as used by our critic, an intermediate state between two extremes. It is hardly necessary for me to refer to the well known line of Horace, in his celebrated recipe for making a genuine epic, as an authority for my opinion. If, therefore, I am wrong, I shall, at least, have the satisfaction of being wrong in the best company, So, Mr. Editor, vice et vale!

FRENCH CRITICISM.

LA HARPE, who hated England and English literature, and who pretended that the language was so poor, that even the conditional tense could not be expressed without a periphrase, undertook, nevertheless, to criticize our English poets; what he made of it may be gathered by the way in which he prints his extracts:—

'Sass roll to waft me.'

'Feel at each thread and lives a long the line.'

'Be pleased with nothing, is no blessed with all!'

'Tis ne where to be found of everwhere.'

We are sure our readers wish to know from what poem these extracts are taken:—from the Essay on Man. We need scarcely add, that M. La Harpe examines, most critically, the beauties of these 'extracts,' and pronounces accordingly.

Original Poetry.

FRAGMENT FROM OSSIAN, VERSIFIED.

Cuchullin having retired to rest, the ghost of Calmar appears to him; Cuchullin addresses the spirit.

'Sow of the cloudy night,' began the chief,
'Why dost thou bend on me thine eyes of grief?
Ghost of the car-borne Calmar, would'st thou fright

The soul of Semo's son from Erin's fight?
Thy hand was never known in war to tire,
Nor did the words of peace thy tongue inspire.
How art thou chang'd!—if this thy purpose be—
To urge the chief of Erin's race to flee,
Calmar, I never fled, I never fear'd
In war, or when the desert ghost appear'd;
Small strength or knowledge have the airy kind—

Their hands are weak, they dwell upon the wind;
No dread of them Cuchullin's soul can feel,
His heart rejoices in the clang of steel;—
I heed thee not, retire thou to thy cave,
Thou art not Calmar's ghost, for he was brave;
His bosom glowed at battle's loud alarm,—
His eye was fire, heaven's thunder was his arm!

SAM SPIRITRAIL.

TO A FRIEND,

On the Death of his Two Infant Children.

MOURN, mourn, thine offspring taken hence,
Weep o'er their vernal bier;
Tears are affection's eloquence,
To speak a loss severe.

Sooth with the kindest sweetest balm,
And best marital care,
Thy valued partner's heart, and calm
Her grief,—her anguish share.

But having wept, oh! dry again
This dew of kindred love;
Would'st call them to a world of pain,
From cherub-seats above?

With thy young frames did sickness sore
A deadly contest keep;
They fell,—one gasp—and all was o'er—
For both were hushed in sleep.

Twins stars of light! where now ye shine,
Sorrow is never found;
Ecstatic joy and bliss divine
Reign in an endless round.

Weep for this early-blighted twin,— Affection's surest test;—
Then quickly dry the tear again;—
They are supremely blest! L.

TO HARRIET.

AND dost thou, then, think my often-told tale
Of affection, is like a fair flower,—
Which, relentlessly torn from its dear native
vale,

Droops, withers, and fades in an hour?
Ah! believe not this bosom could ever forget
The faith thou confided to me,
Or that lingering absence could cause no regret.
For the moments that keep me from thee.

Thou' friends may forsake, and stern fate prove unkind,
And the world it might slanders prove,
Still thy tender caresses would more firmly bind
My heart and my soul unto love.

J. W., JUN.

THE CAPTIVE.

(From an unfinished Poem.)

'T WAS not the tiger-grasp of hate
That drew him from the verge of fate;
Nor the rough arm of hireling pow'r
That sav'd him in that lonely hour:
Nor was that half-suppressed shriek
The tone that from a foe would break:
Nor could the 'hush!' that reach'd his ear
Betoken aught but friendly fear.

Now all is darkness: yon black cloud
Hath wrapt the night-orn in its shroud!
And now, if aught thou hast to say,
Spenk, while yet Darkness holds the sway!—
Such were the thoughts that seemed to trace
Their lines upon his anxious face:—
And lo! with breathless fearful tread,—
Like superstition o'er the dead!

That steps,—and stops—then moves with fear,
As if some demon sprite were near,—
That sentinel steals thro' the gloom,
As if he held the captive's doom;
And so the captive seem'd to feel,
As still he hoped,—yet doubted still.—
And now his burning feverish palm,
Rests on the captive's powerless arm:
Now nearer,—nearer still he seeks—
Another moment,—hark! he speaks—
Away! 'tis light! the clouds have rang'd—
The world is giv'n! the watch is chang'd!
That dastard cloud hath fled its post,
And ev'ry hope of succour's lost!

Oh Night! that, with thy shielding black,
Dost hide the stealing murderer's track,
Should'st thou not wear a deeper shade,
When injur'd virtue claims thy aid!—
And thou, fair Moon, whose silvery ray
Beam'd forth in smiles, but to betray,
Why dart thy lovely lustre forth,
To rivet chains on patriot worth!
Why bright ray'd hope, and plunge in night
The ray that lent its inward light,
And pointed to a desperate chance,
The iron'd captive's anxious glance!—
Away! away! thou dost connive,
When worth desponds, and villains thrive!

See! see! how that one word hath mov'd
His thoughts of something fear'd or lov'd!
For there are tones, once heard, will dwell
For ever in the heart's deep cell!
For years unscen, unsoft, unknown,
'Till chance shall re-produce their tone;
Till kindred sounds the chord shall press
Which bore them to that deep recess,
And vibrate o'er their long repose,
A dreaming scene of joys or woes!—
Events of bright or clouded hue
May pass life's varying rainbow view:
From light to dark; from bliss to woe;
For ever changing as we go:
Friends may prove false; and Love a sprite,
An unsubstantial meteor light!
An arch, with a second smile
That turns and mocks the other's guile!
States be o'erturn'd; and blood be shed;
And maniac riot o'er the dead;
Seas may engulf, and earth devour,—
Still o'er our souls such sounds have power!—

A DRAMATIC SKETCH.

Scene—A CAVERN ON THE SEA SHORE.

Enter Alfred and Julia.

ALF. Look up my sweet—for lo! the storm is past,
And heaven again, in all its loveliness,
Smiles on the waveless ocean. See how fair:
The prospect 'pears around us—come with me,
And let us tread the bench, and search for shells
The struggling waves have cast upon the shore,
To string thy neck withal!—Why tremblest
thou?
What hast thou, love, to fear? The bird of day
On yonder hawthorn bough, swells his little throat
In melody, to chase away thy gloom.—
Aye, now thou art a brave one, and I'll kiss Thee for that smile—come, come,—What!
shrink from me!—
What dost thou gaze at thus?
Jul. Methought I saw
Yon cloud, that hangs suspended o'er the deep,
Emit a vivid flash!
Alf. Thine eyes, my love,

Have been so used to darkness, where thou'st been

Deep buried in the cave, that 'tis their light,
Not heaven's, that flashes and deceives thee!
You shrink again—what now?

Jul. Did'st thou not hear
The distant thunder?

Alf. Thou'st deceiv'd again!

The warning tumult of the heavens has numb'd
Thy sense of hearing, and thou think'st at that
The storm—like twilight—lagers. Learn from me,

That when the brain receives a ringing sound,
'Tis there secreted for a little space;
Then, like a bubble, bursts, and we believe
The sound has twice saluted us.

Jul. Well, then,
I will forget my fears, and walk with thee,—
For I must love to wander up and down
Where curls the splashing wave upon the sand,
Clear as the pearl that's bursting from the rose,
When she her bosom bears to meet the day.
Look here what I have found?

Alf. A prettier shell

These eyes have never seen—these spots how dark—

But, oh! how pure the white ones are, my sweet!

And even as this shell is, so art thou,
When fear or anger on thy brow looks dark:
That art as like the first, as sea to sky—
When summer basks, and not a breath is felt
Of power enough to shake the tremulous aspen.
But when thou dost a smile upon thy lip—
And oh! how lovely then those blushing cheeks—

Those eyes that are like daggers to the heart,
That in their lustre slay—Oh! then thou dost
The white spots look most like, and make me dream
Forget their woe, dazzled at sight of thee!
Sigh for thy sunny charms—and wonder how
So much of heaven is concentrate in one!

Jul. Nay, now you flatter me.

Alf. Trust me, Julia—no;

I am thy friend, and—

Jul. Then 'tis a rhapsody.

Alf. I see that thou art merrily disposed,
And I am in a humour not to damp
The pleasure it doth give thee. O! my life—
My earth's heaven—beautiful Julia! by Jove
I cannot, in my heart of soul, find words;
So powerless are they, that half express
The love I have for thee!—Without the sun
Would vegetation shrink before the blast,
And die as soon as born; and without thee—
Who art the nourisher of this weak plant—
Its brighter sun—should I, a desolate
Unhealthy thing—be like a rock, from whose Blank sides the hurricane has torn—tree, shrub,
And all that flourish'd there! You tremble still—

Why clasp me thus?

Jul. Behold yon cloud, that casts

A death-like darkness o'er the ocean's breast—
I fear the storm again is gathering there!

Alf. Fear not, my sweet, those clouds that shift
And pass

Each other now—like wand'ring men, whose

Have drunk the honied sentences of one Whose powerful eloquence has charm'd them into

Silent admiration—gather, as 'twere,
To ponder on the past! But let us leave—
I see you are not well, or much in fear—
Our cavern is secure against the storm;
And day may bring us hope, as well as light—
Then cheer thee, my beloved—come, come.

[Exeunt. WILFORD.]

Fine Arts.

ROYAL ACADEMY.

THERE is not, perhaps, any event in the reign of George the Third, more calculated to render it immortal, than the establishment of the Royal Academy and the remarkable progress of the fine arts in consequence. 'A nation,' says a modern writer, 'may be considered great by its achievements in arms or in commerce; but can never be said to be truly polished, till it fosters the polite arts, the acquisition of which sinks every other pursuit in comparative insignificance. They open a sixth sense upon every one who successfully cultivates them. The savage eats his food and falls asleep; the man of mere wealth does little more; but in those who seek pleasure in cultivating a taste for the fine arts, the pleasures of sense hold but a subordinate part.'

Before the Royal Academy was instituted, we had no native artists of celebrity either in painting or sculpture, Hogarth alone excepted in the former; indeed, some writers had very gravely asserted, that the English climate was incapable of fostering or maturing genius; no sooner, however, was the patronage of the sovereign extended to the fine arts, than a general feeling in their favour pervaded the whole kingdom: every order of the state was ready to encourage them; and the impulse thus given, produced great statesmen and great generals. When we contemplate the wretched state of the arts in England half a century ago, and contrast it with the proud pre-eminence they have now attained, we cannot but feel an increased veneration for a sovereign who, while he was the father of his people, was the foster parent of the fine arts.

We are well aware, that even the Royal Academy is not without its enemies; and that in this, as in all public institutions, there may exist some abuses. Some little favouritism, not only in accepting, but also in disposing of the pictures, is known to have been manifested. These, we confess, are blemishes which we should wish to see remedied; but, when we consider the advantages which the institution affords to the young as well as the matured artist, and the love of the arts which it has generated, and continues to create and preserve, we must be severe censors indeed, were we not to be to 'its faults a little blind.'

The fifty-third exhibition of the Royal Academy opened on Monday last. The number of pieces in the exhibition are 1165, being upwards of ninety more than last year. Of these, 1165 are paintings, (including, however, a few medallions,) and ninety-three are sculptures. As in all former exhibitions, and as will ever be the case, where opulence is so diffusive as in England, portraits predominate. We certainly are fond of historical painting, and wish it was more encouraged, but we do not despise portrait-painting, which is another branch of the art, and which has attained such excellence in England; of which the splendid productions of a Reynolds and a Lawrence bear most ample testimony.

As this is intended as the first of a series of articles on the exhibition, we shall only take a general view of it at present, pointing out some of the most prominent subjects, and reserving detailed critical remark to our future numbers.

We may observe, that nearly the whole of British artists at all distinguished for talents, are contributors; and many promising young artists are found in the list of contributors. The President of the Royal Academy, Sir Thomas Lawrence, has eight pictures, including portraits of the Marquis of Londonderry, the Princess Charlotte, Sir Humphrey Davy, and the late President of the Royal Academy. Those of the noble Marquis and the venerable President, are almost matchless productions, and though of large size, are finished with all the delicacy of miniatures.

Sir William Beechey has a delightful portrait of a lady, in the character of Una, and four other pictures, three of which are portraits. Wilkie has only two paintings, the 'Newspapers' and 'Guess my Name,' which, though not equal to some of his former productions, are still admirable. A. E. Chalon has six pictures; one of them, the portrait of a lady, is one of the most exquisite and lovely miniatures we ever witnessed. Fuseli has three paintings, on subjects well suited to his sombre but powerful pencil. The venerable Northcote has four pictures, two of which are historical. Gaudy has sent three pictures. Howard, four; Mulready, only one; Stothard, three; and James Ward, three. Allan has only one, the 'Murder of Archbishop Sharp.' Jackson has seven pictures, among which are portraits of Miss Wilson, of Drury Lane Theatre; of Mr. Macready, in the character of Macbeth, and of Mr. Northcote; and Phillips, has seven pictures. Several other eminent artists have contributed liberally, whose productions we shall have occasion to notice.

Mr. Bone has not less than eight enameled; among which, we observed portraits of her late Majesty, of Canova and of the Marquis of Stafford. Miss has three enameled, two of them delightful portraits of Mr. Northcote and the late President of the Academy.

In the gallery of Sculpture, Chantrey has eight pieces, including busts of Sir Walter Scott, Mr. Wordsworth, and the Marquis of Londonderry. Westmacott, Turnerelli, Rossi, &c. are also contributors. With this hasty sketch we conclude, and shall resume the subject more at length in our next.

The Drama.

In the present depressed state of the drama, when melodramas, rope-dancers, grimacers, and every species of buffoonery, are successively but not successfully tried, we are happy to see the legitimate drama gaining an illustrious patron in the person of his present Majesty, who has again honoured the two great theatres with his presence. The visits of royalty to the theatres, have for some years been like the visits of angels, 'few and far between.' We hope, however, that as his Majesty has set the example, we shall soon revert to the example of those good old times, when the theatre was a favourite and fashionable place of amusement, and when we might frequent them without having all our 'seven senses' outraged by degrading and disgraceful exhibitions.

COVENT GARDEN.—On Monday night, his Majesty, accompanied by the Duke and Duchess of Clarence and Prince Leopold, visited this theatre, to witness Goldsmith's comedy of She Stoops to Conquer, with the afterpieces of London Slars, and A Rowland for an Oliver. We are no court chroniclers, and therefore we shall pass over all the preparations made for his Majesty, only observing, that he was received with that enthusiastic joy which the presence of the sovereign never fails to excite. The comedy was admirably performed: Mrs. Davison, an old favourite, sustained the part of Miss Hardcastle with admirable spirit, feeling, and humour. Fawcett and Mrs. Davenport displayed their wonted humour in the parts of Mr. and Mrs.

Hardcastle, and Liston's Tony Lumpkin, though very different from what Goldsmith intended it, possesses so much originality and happy simplicity, that it is impossible not to be pleased with it.

DRURY LANE.—On Wednesday night, the King visited this theatre. Mr. Elliston, on being apprised of the honour intended him, had made very splendid preparations to receive his Majesty, who was accompanied by the Duke of Clarence. The entertainments were Colman's clever comedy of the Heir at Law, and the whimsical farce of Modern Antiques, which was a great favourite with his late Majesty. The comedy was admirably cast, and we should look in vain for better representatives of Dr. Pangloss, Cicely, and Ezekiel Homespun, than Harley, Miss Kelly, and Knight. In the farce, Munden's Cockletope was as it has always been, a master-piece of comic acting. His Majesty appeared highly pleased with it, as well as with the whole evening's amusement. The national airs of God save the King and Rule Britannia, were sung, as usual, by the whole strength of the company.

Although we would not wish to extend the penalties of Lord Ellenborough's 'cutting and maiming act' to the managers of the theatre, yet we should be happy that some means were adopted to prevent the productions of our best dramatists from the mutilations which unskillful operators are perpetually committing upon them. We have more than once had occasion to censure the conduct of the Covent Garden managers for their mangling of Shakespeare, and we have now to condemn an equally sacrilegious outrage at this theatre, on Cibber's sterling comedy of She would and She would not, which has been cut down to three acts, and produced under the title of the Kind Impostor. Now, Mr. Elliston had no necessity to do this; his comic company is excellent, and he could have played the comedy admirably; but he has done it for the sake of introducing some, though not his best operatic performers. The music is chiefly by Messrs. Horn and T. Cooke, with some selections from Mozart. The characters have been sadly mangled: Harley was stripped of all the mirth and vivacity in Trappanti; and Munden trusted more to himself than to what was 'set down for him,' in Don Manuel; Madame Vestris was graceful and lively in Hypolita, and Miss Porey, Miss Cubitt, with Mr.

Horn and Mr. T. Cooke, did their best. The comedy was received with applause, and will, no doubt, run a few nights.

Mr. Braham and Miss Wilson, who have been re-engaged, have appeared in the operas of Love in a Village and Artaxerxes, with their accustomed success.

SURREY THEATRE.—The very excellent company at this house has received an accession in Mr. Woolf, from one of the theatres royal, who has played the part of Macheath, in the Beggar's Opera, frequently, in the course of the week. He has a fine voice, and played with much spirit. Mr. Diddin, taking the hint from Lord Byron, who, in the preface to his Doge of Venice, has called Horace Walpole's Mysterious Mother 'a tragedy of the highest order, and not a puling love play,' produced it on Thursday night, with those curtailments indispensably necessary in the present state of the drama. That it possesses great dramatic effect, every person who has read it must allow, and Mr. Huntley, Mr. Burroughs, and, in particular, Miss Taylor, exerted themselves in the principal characters with great success.

Literature and Science.

A New Diving Machine.—A new diving machine, called a dolphin, has been invented by M. F. Farkas, an Hungarian. The continental papers have described some of the advantages of the instrument, but not its construction. An experiment was made with it at Vienna, in the military swimming-school at the Prater. Count Joseph Esterhazy de Galanthy, Count Forgus de Ghynes, the acting chamberlain, Nemes Slagod, and several Englishmen and persons of distinction were present. The servant of the inventor plunged with the dolphin in twenty-four feet water, and walked upon the bottom over the whole square of the swimming-school. To prove that there could be not want of light, the inventor sent down a lantern, and when it was taken up again the light was still burning. After the man had remained one hour under water, he returned to the surface without assistance; not because he wanted air, but because all who were present were satisfied with the success of the experiment, and directed that the man might ascend.

Division of the Circle.—A curious discovery lately made in pure mathematics, we owe to M. Gauss, of Gottingen, who has shewn, contrary to the opinion that has prevailed from the most ancient times, that a regular polygon of seventeen sides, may be inscribed in a circle, without having recourse to any other principles than those admitted in the plane geometry.

Captain Parry's Journal of the Voyage for the Discovery of a North-west Passage, will be published on WEDNESDAY next.

The Hecla and Fury discovery ships, and the Nautilus transport (the first commanded by Captain Parry), sailed from the Nore on Tuesday morning, with a fine breeze from the S. S. W. The best wishes of their own countrymen, and of the friends of science everywhere attend them.

The Literary Fund annual commemoration took place on Thursday at the Free Mason's Tavern. Of all the institutions in the metropolis professing a benevolent object, this is the most languid. The Earl of Chichester was in the chair, and the meeting though respectable, was not sufficiently so for a country so distinguished for its literature. The company underwent the usual penance of Mr. Fitzgerald's recitation of his own bad verses, with Christian patience and resignation.

CAPTAIN PARRY'S VOYAGE.

Journal of a Voyage for the Discovery of a North West Passage from the Atlantic to the Pacific; performed in the Years 1819-20, in His Majesty's Ships Hecla and Griper, under the Orders of William Edward Parry, R. N., F. R. S. and Commander of the Expedition. With an Appendix, containing the Scientific and other Observations. Published by Authority of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty. 4to. pp. 489. London, 1821.

It has been the good fortune of Captain Parry, in his late voyage to the Arctic regions, to prove one grand exception to a maxim of the hard who "was not for an age but for all time," when he says,—

"The ample provision that Hope makes
In all designs began on earth below,
Fails in the promise's largeness."

We believe there are few persons in the least acquainted with the subject, who have read a narrative of the various voyages undertaken, under every possible circumstance, to discover a north-west passage, and who have seen that Captain Ross fixed an impenetrable barrier in the very place beyond which it was desired to penetrate, could have expected discoveries so important, and success so complete, as Captain Parry has achieved. The publication of his work has been looked to with the utmost anxiety, and although it has been long delayed, yet we think that its perusal will, in this instance, confirm the assertion of a dramatic poet* of no great eminence, that—

"Hopes long desired bring the greatest joy."

The narrative of Captain Parry is all that we could wish: it is well written—circumstantial without being tedious, explicit without being commonplace, and interesting without the least art or attempt at effect.

His object has been to give a plain and faithful account of the facts which he collected, and the observations which were made by himself and his officers, in the course of the voyage, leaving to others to make their deductions from those facts. The narrative is taken principally from the official journal kept by Captain Parry, on board the Hecla, and always, (as he tells us in his introduction,) written within twenty-four hours after the occurrence of the event recorded in it. In several instances, however, he has availed himself of the journals or reports furnished by the other officers, in all which cases the obligation is acknowledged, and the individual mentioned who has supplied the account.

To the readers of the Literary Chronicle it cannot be necessary to enter into any account of the discoveries made in the arctic regions previous to the expedition of Captain Parry, as these have been already detailed in our preceding numbers, to which we must refer*. The official instructions to Captain Parry, (a copy of which he has prefixed to his work,) were, that he should make the best of his way to Davis's Strait, and, when the ice was sufficiently open to admit his approach to the western shores of the strait, that he should advance to the northward, as far as the opening into Sir James Lancaster's Sound; explore the bottom of that sound,—pass through it, if possible, and get to Behring's Straits. Should he fail in making a passage through this sound, he was to examine Alderman Jones's Sound, and if he could not pass through it, then to try Sir Thomas Smith's Sound, in every part of it. Should he fail here also, he was to return to the southward, down Baffin's Bay, and endeavour to make way through Cumberland's Strait, or any opening that might lead him to the seas adjoining the eastern or northern coast of America, and pursue his voyage along that coast, to the northward or westward, to Behring's Straits. Although this was the order in which the various attempts were recommended by the Admiralty to be made, yet Captain Parry had the discretionary power to make them in such order as appeared to him most advantageous. We may observe, en passant, that Captain Parry, following the orders of the Admiralty, first attempted to pass through Lancaster Sound, and succeeded. If he had accomplished his passage through Behring's Strait, he was then to proceed to Kamtschatka, and send from thence, through the Russian governor, a duplicate of his journals to London. From Kamtschatka, he was to proceed to the Sandwich Islands or Canton, or any other place he might think proper, to refit the ships and refresh the crews, and then to return to England, by such route as he might deem most convenient. Captain Parry was also allowed to winter in the arctic regions, if he deemed it necessary. He was directed to make such observations as might tend to the improvement of astronomy, geography, and navigation; and to collect and preserve such specimens of the animal, mineral, and vegetable kingdoms, as he might meet with. The Lords of the Admiralty, relying with a just and liberal confidence on the well-known zeal and talents of Captain Parry, left much to his discretion and judgment.

Such being the objects of the expedition, we shall now proceed to notice the most important circumstances that attended it. The Hecla and Griper, the first commanded by Captain (then Lieutenant) Parry, and the latter by Lieutenant Liddon, had been prepared with great attention for the voyage; and every thing that could be necessary, either for the scientific objects of the expedition or the safety and comfort of the crew, were liberally provided. The number of persons engaged on board both vessels were ninety-four.

The seamen had, most of them, been in Captain Ross's voyage; and every individual had double the ordinary pay of his Majesty's navy. The two vessels sailed from the Nore on the 10th of May, 1819; and, on the 18th of June, when about latitude 58° 52', and longitude 48° 12', they fell in with the first

'stream' of ice, and soon afterwards they saw several icebergs. On the evening of the 24th, some curious effects of atmospheric refraction were observed, the low ice being at times considerably raised in the horizon, and constantly altering its appearance. The next day, the ice through which they had been towing, closed together so rapidly, that the crews had scarcely time to hoist up the boats before the ships were immovably beset. 'It is impossible,' says Captain Parry, 'to conceive a more helpless situation than that of a ship thus beset, when all the power that can be applied will not alter the direction of her head a single degree of the compass.' Some of the gentlemen walked a mile or two from the ships, and imagined they saw marks of a sledge on the ice, but in this, Captain Parry thinks they were mistaken. The ships remained locked in the ice until the 30th, when they were able to move them a little. 'A southerly swell dashing the loose ice with tremendous force against the bergs, sometimes raised a white spray over the latter, to the height of more than one hundred feet, and being accompanied with a loud noise, exactly resembling the roar of distant thunder, presented a scene at once sublime and terrific.' On the 4th of July, the Hecla attempting to push through the ice, was for some time at the mercy of a swell of the ocean, which drifted her fast towards the bergs, but she was, fortunately, brought back into clear water. They were now near the middle of the narrowest part of Davis's Straits, and had the opportunity of confirming the accuracy of that celebrated and able navigator. Streams of the purest water were often found flowing from the icebergs, and from this time to the end of the voyage, snow-water was exclusively made use of on board the ships for every purpose. During the summer months it was found in abundance in pools, upon the floes and icebergs, and in the winter, snow was dissolved in the copper for their daily consumption. On the 20th of July, the ships crossed a stream of ice, of which the breadth scarcely exceeded three hundred yards, and which occupied them constantly for five hours. The next day they drifted towards an iceberg, which was one hundred and forty feet high, and which, from the soundings made near it, must have been a-ground in one hundred and twenty fathoms, so that its whole height was about eight hundred and sixty feet. Of this iceberg, Captain

Parry gives a view, which is awfully grand, from a sketch by Lieutenant Beechey. In the course of the voyage they frequently had to saw through masses of ice; but they sometimes ran through 'hay-floes, which were from four to six inches thick, ploughing up the ice before the ship's stem, at the rate of five miles an hour.'—

If they were not very broad, the Hecla did not lose her way in passing through them. Frequently, however, she was stopped in the middle, which made it necessary to saw and break the ice a-head, till she made another start, and having run a short distance in clear water, was again imbedded in the same manner. We (says the author) passed one field of ice about ten feet in thickness and many miles in length, as we could not see over it from the mast head.

On the 28th of July, the ships had passed every impediment which obstructed their passage into Sir James Lancaster's Sound. The breadth of the barrier of ice, which occupies the middle of Baffin's Bay, and which had never before been crossed in this latitude at the same season, was eighty miles in a N. 63° W. direction. Captain Parry expresses it as his opinion, that, by taking advantage of every little opening that is afforded, a strong built vessel, of proper size and weight, may, in most seasons, be pushed through this barrier. Sir James Lancaster's Sound was now open to the westward, and the two best months in the year, for the navigation of these seas, were yet to come.

On the 1st of August Captain Parry entered Lancaster's Sound, which has obtained much celebrity from the very opposite opinions which have been held with regard to it. To him it was particularly interesting, as being the point to which his instructions more particularly directed his attention. On the 2nd, they sounded with the deep sea clamma, and found 1050 fathoms by the line; but as, where the soundings exceed five or six hundred fathoms, there is some uncertainty, Captain Parry supposes the actual depth to have been from eight to nine hundred fathoms. Sir George Hope's monument, which had been thought an island in the former voyage, was now discovered to be a dark-looking and conspicuous hill on the main land. On the 30th, the Hecla had gained somewhat on the Griper, and was in lat. 74° 25' 31," long. 80° 04' 30". Of the enthusiasm which now animated the crew, Captain Parry thus speaks:—

'Being favoured, at length, by the easterly breeze which was bringing up the Griper, and for which we had long been looking with much patience, a crowd of sail was set, to carry us with all rapidity to the westward. It is more easy to imagine than describe the almost breathless anxiety which was now visible in every countenance, while, as the breeze increased to a fresh gale, we ran quickly up the sound. The mast-heads were crowded by the officers and men during the whole afternoon; and an unconcerned observer, if any could have been unconcerned on such an occasion, would have been amused by the eagerness with which the various reports from the crew's net were received; all, however, hitherto favourable to our most sanguine hopes.'

On the following day, they came near two inlets, in lat. 74° 15' 53", N. long. 80° 30' 30"; these they named Burnet's Inlet and Stratton Inlet. The cliffs on this part of the coast present a singular appearance, being stratified horizontally, and having a number of regular projecting masses of rock, broad at the bottom, and coming to a point at the top, resembling so many buttresses raised by art at equal intervals. Some islands, to which the name of Prince Leopold was given, were also stratified horizontally, but without the buttress-like projections.

From the time that Capt. Parry first entered Lancaster's Sound, the sluggishness of the compasses, as well as the amount of their irregularity, had been found to increase rapidly though uniformly. The irregularity became more and more obvious as they advanced to the southward. By observation they found, that when the true course of the Hecla was about S. S. W., the binnacle and azimuth compasses at the same time agreed in shewing N. N. W. $\frac{1}{2}$ W., making the variation to be allowed on that course, eleven points and a half westerly. It was evident, therefore, that a very material change had taken place in the dip or the variation, or in both these phenomena, which rendered it probable that they were making a very near approach to the magnetic pole.

'We now, therefore,' says Captain Parry, 'witnessed, for the first time, the curious phenomenon of the directive power of the needle becoming so weak, as to be completely overcome by the attraction of the ship; so that the needle might now be properly said to point to the north pole of the ship. It was only, however, in those compasses in which the lightness of the cards, and great delicacy in the suspensions, had been particularly attended to, that even this degree of uniformity pre-ailed; for, in the heavier cards, the friction, upon the points of suspension was much too great to be overcome even by the ship's attraction, and they consequently remained indifferently in any position in which they happened to be placed. For the purposes of navigation, therefore, the compasses were from this time no longer consulted; and, in a few days afterwards, the binnacles were removed as useless lumber, from the deck to the carpenter's store-room, where they remained during the rest of the season, the azimuth compass alone being kept on deck, for the purpose of watching any changes which might take place in the directive power of the needle: and the true courses and direction of the wind were in future noted in the log-book, as obtained to the nearest quarter-point, when the sun was visible, by the azimuth of that object and the apparent time.'

On the following day (the 8th of August), the directive power of the magnet seemed to be weaker than ever; in the North Pole of the needle, in Captain Kater's steering compass, in which the friction is almost entirely removed by a thread suspension, was observed to point steadily towards the ship's head, in whatever direction the latter was placed. An accidental circumstance convinced Captain Parry that there was no current setting constantly in one direction. A small piece of wood was picked up, which appeared to have been the end of a boat's yard, and which caused sundry amusing speculations among the gentlemen on board, who felt rather mortified to think that a ship had been there before them, and that, therefore, they were not entitled to the honour of the first discovery. A stop was suddenly put to this and other ingenious inductions, by the information of one of the seamen that he had dropped it out of his boat a fortnight before.

The vessels continued their progress, and several bays, capes, and headlands were discovered, and received names by the voyagers. On the 22nd they had a clear and extensive view to the northward, free from ice; and they now felt that they had actually entered the Polar Sea. The magnificent opening, through which their passage had been effected, from Baffin's Bay to a channel dignified with the name of Wellington, was called Barrow's Straits, after the Secretary of the Admiralty.

In latitude 75° 03' 12" long. 103° 44' 37", an island was discovered, and Captain Sabine, with two other officers, landed on it near the east point, which was called Cape Gillman. The gentlemen reported, on their return, that—

'The remains of Esquimaux habitations were found in four different places. Six of these, which Captain Sabine had an opportunity of examining, and which are situated on a level sandy bank, at the side of a small ravine near the sea, are described by him as consisting of stones rudely placed in a circular or rather elliptical form. They were from seven to ten feet in diameter; the broad flat sides of the stones standing vertically, and the whole structure, if such it may be called, being exactly similar to that of the summer huts of the Esquimaux, which had been seen at Hare Island, the preceding year. Attached to each of them was a small circle, generally four or five feet in diameter, which had probably been the fire-place.'

The whole encampment appeared to have been deserted for several years; but very recent traces of the rein-deer and musk-ox were seen in many places. The steering of the vessels now became very difficult, and, says our author:—

'The circumstances under which we were sailing, were, perhaps, such as never occurred since the early days of navigation. To the northward was the land; the ice, as we supposed, to the southward; the compasses useless; and the sun completely obscured by a fog, so thick that the Griper could only now and then be seen, at a cable's length astern. We had literally, therefore, no mode of regulating our course but by once more trusting to the steadiness of the wind; and it was not a little amusing, as well as novel, to see the quarter-master conning the ship by looking at the dog wave.'

On the 2nd of September a star was seen, being the first that had been visible for more than two months. Two days afterwards, namely, on the 4th, at a quarter past nine P. M., the ships crossed the meridian of 110° west from Greenwich, in the latitude of 74° 44' 20", by which they were entitled to the reward of £5000. In order to commemorate the event, a bluff headland that they had just passed was called Bounty Cape. On the following day they dropped anchor, for the first time since quitting the English coast, in a roadstead, which was called the Bay of the Hecla and Griper, and the crews landed on the largest of a groupe of islands, which was called Melville Island. 'The ensigns and pendants,' says Capt. Parry, 'were hoisted as soon as we had anchored, and it created in us no ordinary feelings of pleasure to see the British flag waving, for the first time, in these regions, which had hitherto been considered beyond the limits of the habitable part of the world.'—They did not remain here many days, before parties ventured on shooting excursions, and three men, who had missed their way, were absent ninety-one hours, and exposed during three nights to the inclemency of the weather.

Captain Parry still attempted to gain a passage to the westward, and succeeded in getting along the coast of Melville Island to some distance, but there being no hope of penetrating further at that season, and the ice setting in very rapidly, he was induced to return to Hecla and Griper Bay, which he regained on the 24th of September. It was now necessary to cut a canal through the ice, and to draw the ships up it into the harbour. Two parallel lines were cut, distant from each other little more than the breadth of the large ships, and the ice then divided into rectangular pieces, which were again subdivided diagonally, and floated out of the canal. It was afterwards found necessary to sink the pieces of ice under the floe as they were cut. At three o'clock, of the third day spent in these operations, the vessels reached their winter quarters, an event which was hailed with three hearty cheers by the united ships' crews. The group of islands that were discovered were called the North Georgian Islands.

The ships had now reached that station, where, in all probability, they were destined to remain for at least eight months, during three of which they were not to see the face of the sun. Every precaution was immediately taken for the security of the ships and the preservation of the various stores; the masts were dismantled, except the lower ones, and the planks of the housing erected, and afterwards roofed over with a cloth composed of wadding tilt. The crews of both vessels were in excellent health, which great care was still taken to preserve, by keeping the births and bed places as warm and dry as possible. The allowance of bread was reduced to two thirds; a pound of Donkin's preserved meat, together with one pint of vegetable or concentrated soup per man, was substituted for a pound of salt beef weekly; a proportion of beer and wine was served instead of spirits; and a small quantity of sour krout and pickles, with as much vinegar as could be used, was issued at regular intervals. The daily proportion of lime juice and sugar, mixed with water, was drunk by each man, in presence of an officer appointed to attend to this duty. When any game was procured, it was served in lieu of the established allowance of meat; and in no one instance, neither in quantity nor quality, was the slightest preference given to the officers.

In regard to clothing, equal attention was paid to the comfort of every individual on board; and, now being in a state of leisure and inactivity, Capt. Parry projected the amusements of a theatre, of which Lieut. Beechey was stage manager; and a weekly newspaper, to be called the North Georgia Gazette and Winter Chronicle, of which Captain Sabine undertook to be the editor. These had the happy effect of diverting the mind from the gloomy prospect which would sometimes obtrude itself on the stoutest heart.

Some deer having been seen near the ships on the 10th of October, a party was despatched after them, and being led on by the ardour of pursuit, forgot Captain Parry's order that every person should be on board before sunset:—

'John Pearson, a marine belonging to the Griper, who was the last that returned on board, had his hands severely frost-bitten, having imprudently gone away without mittens, and with a musket in his hand. A party of our people most providentially found him, although the night was very dark, just as he had fallen down a steep bank of snow, and was beginning to feel that degree of torpor and drowsiness which, if indulged, inevitably proves fatal. When he was brought on board, his fingers were quite stiff, and bent into the shape of that part of the musket he had been carrying; and the frost had so far destroyed the animation in his fingers on one hand, that it was necessary to amputate three of them a short time after, notwithstanding all the care and attention paid to him by the medical gentlemen. The effect which exposure to severe frost has, in debasing the mental as well as the corporeal faculties, was very striking in this man, as well as in two of the young gentlemen who returned after dark, and of whom we were anxious to make inquiries respecting Pearson. When I sent for them into my cabin, they looked wild, spoke thick and indistinctly, and it was impossible to draw from them a rational answer to any of our questions. After being on board for a short time, the mental faculties appeared gradually to return with the returning circulation, and it was not till then that a looker on could easily persuade himself that they had not been shrinking too freely. To those who have been much accustomed to cold countries, this will be no new remark; but I cannot help thinking, (and it is with this view that I speak of it,) that many a man may have been punished for intoxication, who was only suffering from the benumbing effects of frost; for I have more than once seen our people in a state so exactly resembling that of the most stupid intoxication, that I should certainly have charged them with that offence, had I not been quite sure that no possible means were afforded them on Melville Island, to procure any thing stronger than snow-water.'

The 4th of November was the last day that the sun was seen above the horizon, but the weather was not sufficiently clear to allow the scientific gentlemen to make any observations on the disappearance of that cheering orb, 'of this great world both eye and soul.' The next day the theatre was opened, and Miss in her Teens performed; a new Christmas piece was also produced, with the most 'brilliant success,' as a London manager would say, though the director of the North Georgia Theatre announces the event more modestly. The circumstances under which the crews were situated being such as never before occurred, it cannot be uninteresting to know in what manner they passed their time, during three months of nearly total darkness, in the middle of a severe winter, and in a climate where Europeans never wintered before:—

'The officers and quarter-masters were divided into four watches, which were regularly kept, as at sea, while the remainder of the ship's company were allowed to enjoy their night's rest undisturbed. The hands were turned up at a quarter before six, and both decks were well rubbed with stones and warm sand before eight o'clock, at which time, as usual at sea, both officers and men went to breakfast. Three-quarters of an hour being allowed after breakfast for the men to prepare themselves for muster, we then beat to divisions punctually at a quarter past nine, when every person on board attended on the quarter-deck, and a strict inspection of the men took place, as to their personal cleanliness, and the good condition, as well as sufficient warmth, of their clothing. The reports of the officers having been made to me, the people were then allowed to walk about, or, more usually, to run round the upper deck, while I went down to examine the state of that below, accompanied, as I before mentioned, by Lieutenant Beechey and Mr. Edwards. The state of this deck may be said, indeed, to have constituted the chief source of our anxiety, and to have occupied by far the greatest share of our attention at this period. Whenever any dampness appeared, or, what more frequently happened, any accumulation of ice had taken place during the preceding night, the necessary means were immediately adopted for removing it; in the former case, usually by rubbing the wood with cloths, and then directing the warm air-pipe towards the place; and in the latter, by scraping off the ice, so as to prevent its wetting the deck by any accidental increase of temperature. In this respect, the bed-places were particularly troublesome; the inner partition, or that next the ship's side, being almost invariably covered with more or less dampness or ice, according to the temperature of the deck during the preceding night. This inconvenience might, to a great degree, have been avoided, by a sufficient quantity of fuel to keep up two good fires on the lower deck, throughout the twenty-four hours; but our stock of coals would by no means permit this, bearing in mind the possibility of our spending a second winter within the Arctic circle; and this comfort could only, therefore, be allowed on a few occasions, during the most severe part of the winter.

'In the course of my examination of the lower deck, I had always an opportunity of seeing those few men who were on the sick list, and of receiving from Mr. Edwards a report of their respective cases; as also of consulting that gentleman as to the means of improving the warmth, ventilation, and general comfort of the inhabited parts of the ship. Having performed this duty, we returned to the upper deck, where I personally inspected the men; after which, they were sent out to walk on shore when the weather would permit, till noon, when they returned on board to their dinner. When the day was too inclement for them to take this exercise, they were ordered to run round and round the deck, keeping step to a tune on the organ, or, not infrequently, to a song of their own singing. Among the men were a few who did not at first quite like this systematic mode of taking exercise; but when they found that no plea, except that of illness, was admitted as an excuse, they not only willingly and cheerfully complied, but made it the occasion of much humour and frolic among themselves.

'The officers, who dined at two o'clock, were also in the habit of occupying one or two hours in the middle of the day in rambling on shore, even in our darkest period, except when a fresh wind and a heavy snow drift confined them within the housing of the ships. It may be well imagined, that, at this period, there was but little to be met with in our walks on shore, which could either amuse or interest us. The necessity of not exceeding the limited distance of one or two miles, lest a snow-drift, which often rises very suddenly, should prevent our return, added considerably to the dull and tedious monotony which, day after day, presented itself. To the southward was the sea, covered with one unbroken surface of ice, uniform in its dazzling whiteness, except that, in some parts, a few hummocks were seen thrown up somewhat above the general level. Nor did the land offer much greater variety, being almost entirely covered with snow, except here and there a brown patch of bare ground in some exposed situations, where the wind had not allowed the snow to remain. When viewed from the summit of the neighbouring hills, on one of those calm clear days, which not unfrequently occurred during the winter, the scene was such as to induce contemplations, which had, perhaps, more of melancholy than of any other feeling. Not an object was to be seen on which the eye could long rest with pleasure, unless when directed to the spot where the ships lay, and where our little colony was planted. The smoke which there issued from the several fires, affording a certain indication of the presence of man, gave a partial cheerfulness to this part of the prospect; and the sound of voices which, during the cold weather, could be heard at a much greater distance than usual, served now and then to break the silence which reigned around us,—a silence far different from that peaceable composure which characterizes the landscape of a cultivated country; it was the death-like stillness of the most dreary desolation, and the total absence of animated existence. Such, indeed, was the want of objects to afford relief to the eye or amusement to the mind, that a stone of more than usual size appearing above the snow, in the direction in which we were going, immediately became a mark, on which our eyes were unconsciously fixed, and towards which we mechanically advanced.

Leaving, for the present, our enterprising countrymen to pass their Christmas at New Georgia, we shall interrupt the narrative to notice Captain Parry's remarks as to the probable existence and accomplishment of a north-west passage into the Pacific Ocean. He says,—

‘Of the existence of such a passage, and that the outlet will be found in Behring's Strait, it is scarcely possible, on an inspection of the map, with the addition of our late discoveries, and in conjunction with those of Cook and Mackenzie, any longer to entertain a reasonable doubt. In discovering one outlet from Baffin's Bay into the Polar Sea, and finding that sea studded with numerous islands, another link has at least been added to the chain of evidence upon which geographers have long ventured to delineate the northern coast of America, by a dotted line from Icy Cape westward, to the rivers of Mackenzie and Hearne, and thence to the known part of the coast to the north of Hudson's Bay, in the neighbourhood of Wager River; while, at the same time, considerable progress has been made towards the actual accomplishment of the desired passage, which has for nearly three centuries engaged the attention of the maritime nations of Europe.

‘The success which attended our efforts during the season of 1819, after passing through Sir James Lancaster's Sound, was such as to inspire even the least sanguine among us with reasonable hope of the complete accomplishment of our enterprise, before the close of the next season. In entertaining such a hope, however, we had not rightly calculated on the severity of the climate with which we had to contend, and on the consequent shortness of the season, (not exceeding seven weeks,) in which it is possible to perform the navigation of that part of the Polar Sea. Although it must be admitted, that there is something peculiar about the south-west end of Melville Island, extremely unfavourable to navigation, yet it is also certain, that the obstructions we met with from ice, both as to its thickness and extent, were found generally to increase, as we proceeded westward, after passing through Barrow's Strait. That we should find this to be the case, might perhaps have been reasonably anticipated, because the proximity to a permanently open sea appears to be the circumstance which, of all others, tends the most to temper the severity of the Polar regions, in any given parallel of latitude. On this account I should always expect to meet with the most serious impediments about mid-way, between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans; and having once passed that barrier, I should confidently hope to find the difficulties lessen in proportion as we advanced towards the latter sea; especially as it is well known, that the climate of any given parallel on that side of America is, no matter from what cause, very many degrees more temperate than on the eastern coast.

‘But, although it is evident, that climate does not wholly depend on latitude, but on other circumstances also, (principally, perhaps, those of locality above-mentioned,) yet it can scarcely be doubted that, on any meridian to the north of America, for instance, 114° west, where we were stopped, the general climate would be found somewhat better, and the navigable season longer, in the latitude of 60° than in that of 75°, near which we wintered. For this reason, it would perhaps be desirable, that ships endeavouring to reach the Pacific by this route, should keep, if possible, on the coast of America, and the lower in latitude that coast may be found, the more favourable will it prove for this purpose.

‘Our experience, I think, has clearly shewn that the navigation of the Polar Seas can never be performed with any degree of certainty, without a continuity of land. It was only by watching the occasional openings between the ice and the shore, that our late progress to the westward was effected; and had the land continued in the desired direction, there can be no question that we should have continued to advance, however slowly, towards the completion of our enterprise. In this respect, therefore, as well as in the improvement to be expected in the climate, there would be a manifest advantage in making the attempt on the coast of America, where we are sure that the land will not fail us. The probability of obtaining occasional supplies of wood, game, and anti-scorbutic plants; the chance of being enabled to send information by means of the natives; and the comparative facility with which the lives of the people might be saved, in case of serious and irreparable accidents happening to the ships, are also important considerations, which naturally serve to recommend this route. Should the sea on the coast of America be found moderately deep, and shelving towards the shore, (which, from the geological character of the known parts of the continent to the south, and of the Georgian Islands to the north, there is reason to believe would be the case for a considerable distance to the westward,) the facility of navigation would be much increased, on account of the grounding of the heavy masses of ice in water sufficiently deep to allow the ships to take shelter behind them, at such times as the flocks close in upon the land. Farther to the westward, where the primitive formation, and perhaps even a continuation of the Rocky Mountains, is to be expected, a steep and precipitous shore would probably occur, a circumstance which the foregoing narrative has shewn to be attended with much comparative uncertainty and risk.

‘The question which naturally arises, in the next place, relates to the most likely means of getting to the coast of America, so as to sail along its shores. It would, in this respect, be desirable to find an outlet from the Atlantic into the Polar Sea, as nearly as possible in the parallel of latitude in which the northern coast of America may be supposed to lie; as, however, we do not know of any such outlet from Baffin's Bay, about the parallels of 60° to 70°, the attempt is, perhaps, to be made with better chance of success in a still lower latitude, especially as there is a considerable portion of coast that may reasonably be supposed to offer the desired communication, which yet remains unexplored. Cumberland Strait, the passage called Sir Thomas Rowe's Welcome, lying between Southampton Island and the coast of America, and Repulse Bay, appear to be the points most worthy of attention; and, considering the state of uncertainty in which the attempts of former navigators have left us, with regard to the extent and communication of these openings, one cannot but entertain a reasonable hope, that one, or perhaps each of them, may afford a practicable passage into the Polar Sea.

‘So little, indeed, is known of the whole of the northern shore of Hudson's Strait, which appears, from the best information, to consist chiefly of islands, that the geography of that part of the world may be considered altogether undetermined; so that an expedition, which should be sent to examine those parts, would soon arrive upon ground never before visited, and in which, from an inspection of the map in its present state, there certainly does seem more than an equal chance of finding the desired passage. It must be admitted, however, that any notions we may form upon this question, amount after all to no more than conjecture. As far as regards the discovery of another outlet into the Polar Sea, to the southward of Sir James Lancaster's Sound, it is evident that the enterprise is to be begun again; and we should be cautious, therefore, in entertaining too sanguine a hope of finding such a passage, the existence of which is still nearly as uncertain as it was two hundred years ago, and which possibly may not exist at all.

In the course of the foregoing narrative, it may have been remarked, that the westerly and north-westerly winds were always found to produce the effect of clearing the southern shores of the North Georgian islands of ice, while they always brought with them clear weather, which is essentially necessary in prosecuting discoveries in such a navigation. This circumstance, together with the fact of our having sailed back in six days from the meridian of Winter Harbor to the entrance of Sir James Lancaster's Sound, a distance which it required five weeks to traverse when going in the opposite direction, seems to offer a reasonable ground for concluding, that an attempt to effect the north-west passage might be made, with a better chance of success, from Behring's Strait, than from this side of America. There are some circumstances, however, which, in my opinion, render this mode of proceeding altogether impracticable, at least for British ships. The principal of these arises from the length of the voyage which must first be performed, in order to arrive at the point where the work is to be begun. After such a voyage, admitting that no serious wear and tear have been experienced, the most important part of a ship's resources, namely, the provisions and fuel, must be very materially reduced, and this without the possibility of renewing them, to the extent necessary for such a service, and which can alone give confidence in the performance of an enterprise of which the nature is so precarious and uncertain.

Nor should it be forgotten how injurious to the health of the crews, so sudden and extreme a change of climate would in all probability prove, as that which they must necessarily experience in going at once from the heat of the torrid zone into the intense cold of a long winter upon the northern shores of America. Upon the whole, therefore, I cannot but consider, that any expedition, equipped by Great Britain with this view, will act with greater advantage, by at once employing its best energies in the attempt to penetrate from the eastern coast of America, along its northern shore.

Although we shall return to this volume in our next, yet it may be necessary now to observe, that its em-bellishments, which consist of twenty maps, charts, and other engravings, are of a very superior description; the dreary appearance which some of the plates present, and the situation of the ships, is truly terrific; but, in examining the charts, it is pleasant to trace the progress of our gallant countrymen in seas and regions hitherto unexplored. (To be continued.)

Memoirs of the Secret Societies of the South of Italy, particularly the Carbonari. Translated from the Original MS. 8vo. 235. London, 1821.

IN the last number but one of the Literary Chronicle, we gave a brief notice of the Carbonari, from Mr. Keppel Craven's work. The subject is one which has attracted great attention and much curiosity in Europe, and we are now happy in being able (as we hope) to gratify our readers by the volume before us, which contains the most interesting details of this very extraordinary and powerful institution. The author declares, that he never belonged to any secret society, not even to freemasonry, and it may, therefore, appear singular, how he has penetrated the mystery with which the Carbonari enveloped themselves. The fact is, that when the Carbonari of Naples had effected the revolution in July, 1820, they imagined that they had no cause for further concealment. 'They boasted of their success; they revealed their secret proceedings; they promulgated decrees, and posted up proclamations. The press multiplied their catechisms, the transactions of their societies, and the results of their deliberations.' It is from such sources that the author has drawn his materials; and he gives the titles of forty-seven books and pamphlets on the subject, to which he frequently refers in the course of the work. These Memoirs contain a plain impartial narrative, without any strict methodical arrangement. For this the author apologizes, and declares, that he 'relies wholly on the interest of the subject, and on the consciousness of never having altered facts, to adopt them either to prejudice or theory.'

The existence of the Carbonari has been long known in Naples, but it was the late revolution which brought them into public notice. The practice of creating a state within a state, and of erecting secret tribunals to redress wrongs, has existed in all barbarous and turbulent times. It is of very ancient date in the kingdom of the two Sicilies. According to the Chronicles of the Abbays of Fossa Nuova and of Monte Casino, a sect of presumptuous men, de vanis hominibus, arose. They took the name of avengers, Vendicosi, and did all the mischief in their power, not by day, but by night. At length, the grand master of the sect was hanged, and many of his partisans braided with a hot iron.

A second Sicilian Society, almost unknown to the rest of Europe, was called the Beati Paoli, and much resembled, in their motives and actions, the Free Knights in Germany. Persons of all ranks united themselves secretly, and proceeded against the great barons and the tribunals, whose power was such, that they were not to be reached openly. This institution, vicious and horrible in itself, did, however, produce some partially salutary effects, restraining the arbitrary licentiousness of the great, by the terror which it inspired. The punishments inflicted by the Beati Paoli were death by poison, or the dagger, mutilation, destruction of property by fire, and, for the slightest crimes or faults, the severest beating. The ramifications of this society were spread over the whole island; and a cavern is shown at Palermo, in a street called de Canceddi, near the church of Santa Maria di Gesù, where they held their meetings. Neither the severest laws nor the heaviest penalties had any effect on the Beati Paoli, but the change in the state of society, and the improvement of manners, at length put an end to the association. A lively recollection of it, however, still remains among the Sicilians; and they often exclaim, on receiving an injury or loss, for which they cannot apply to justice, 'Ah, se fossero ancora i Beati Paoli!' Ah, if the Beati Paoli were still in being!

The Carbonari, anxious to be thought an old institution, derive the proofs of their antiquity from Germany. The necessity of mutual assistance, it is said, induced the colliers, (literally charcoal burners or charrers), who inhabit the vast forests of Germany, to unite themselves against robbers and enemies, and, by conventional signs, known only to themselves, they claimed and afforded mutual assistance. These associations, in the course of time, acquired more consistency, and spread themselves over Germany, France, and the Netherlands. The Society of Hewers (Feudeurs) resembled that of the colliers. Amongst their symbols of imitation, we find the trunk of an old tree, together with other allusions to their occupations in the woods.

The Carbonari have a curious traditional story of their origin, which they trace to the time of Francis the First, King of France; and at their feasts, the grand master 'drinks to the health of Francis I., the founder of the order.' Whatever antiquity the Carbonari may claim, it is certain that they never rose to any importance, nor acted any conspicuous part until the French revolution. Their restoration is ascribed by the grand masters, at Naples, to an unknown officer, who had spent some time in Spain. The next efficient supporter of the sect (as they are called), was Maghella, a native of Genoa, who was originally employed in a counting-house, but afterwards became minister of police in the Ligurian Republic, and in favour with Murat, whom he advised to abandon Bonaparte before the Russian campaign, in 1812, and proclaim the independence of Italy. In 1815, Maghella endeavoured to rouse Italy to independence, and in the name of Murat, he organized the Papal provinces of which he had taken possession; and it was there that the lodges of the Carbonari were established. He then introduced the sect into Naples, assuring Murat that such an institution would draw the attention of the populace from the remembrance of their ancient sovereigns, and gain them over to the new order of things. The doctrine preached to the inhabitants of the Calabrias and the Abruzzi, was, however, adapted to their inclinations. 'It depended, for effect, on the two-fold excitement of religious fanaticism and pecuniary interest; for while the imitation of Jesus Christ himself, the Grand Master of the order, was the devotional object proposed, they were shown, at the bottom of the scene, a political change, which must infallibly diminish the taxes.'

To give stability to the sect thus introduced at Naples, and to graft it on an old stock, all freemasonry were admitted simply by ballot, and without the preparatory trials required from ordinary candidates. Hence it was, that the Pope issued his decree against freemasonry, considering all the secret societies of Italy as derived from it. One consequence of the amalgamation of freemasonry with Carbonarian has been a toleration of all the Christian sects which masonry contained:—

'But, though such free toleration is allowed, the ceremonies of admission partake of an almost fanatic superstition.

The novices were told that, in imitation of the grand master, Christ, they must necessarily pass through sufferings to purity and happiness; they were crowned with thorns, and a reed was placed in their hands. A dramatic representation exhibited part of the agonies of the Saviour, and it was solemnly announced, that the great requisites were to preserve their faith, and mutually to assist each other.

'The following extract, from the 1st chap. of the statutes of Carbonarianism, will tend to explain the real or pretended principles of the sect.

'Of the General Doctrine of the Order.

'Art. 1. Good Cousinship is principally founded on religion and virtue.

'Art. 2. The place of meeting is called the Baracca; the space surrounding it, the Forest or Wood; the interior of the lodge, the Vendita.

'Art. 3. The members are called Good Cousins; they are divided into two classes—apprentices and masters.

'Art. 4. Tried virtue and purity of morals, and not Pagan* qualities, render men worthy of belonging to the Carbonari.

'Art. 5. An interval of six months is necessary before an apprentice can obtain the rank of master. The principal obligations imposed on him are, to practise benevolence, to succour the unfortunate, to show docility of mind, to bear no malice against Carbonari, and to enrich his heart with virtue.

'Art. 6. By this article it is forbidden to talk directly or indirectly against religion, and by 'Art. 7. All conversation on religion in general, or against good morals, is prohibited.

'Art. 8. Every Good Cousin Carbonari is obliged to preserve inviolable secrecy concerning the mysteries of the order.

'Art. 9. No G. C. C. may communicate what is done or decided upon in his Vendita, to those who belong to another, much less to persons not initiated.

'Art. 10. The greatest reserve is recommended to the members, towards all persons with whom they are not well acquainted, but more especially in the bosoms of their own families.'

The capital was the centre of the Carbonari, where the Alta Vendita or principal lodge, consisting of honorary members and deputies from other lodges, was held. It was the business of this lodge to grant charters of organization to new lodges, or to confirm such as were submitted for its approbation. It has been eclipsed by the superior activity of the Carbonari magistracy of the Western Lucanian Republic, for so the province of Principato Citra is termed.

The symbols used at their meetings,

* Pagano may be translated profane, belonging to the uninitiated.'

and painted on the patents of the initiated, are numerous, and consist of the trunk of a tree, linen cloth, water, salt, a crown of white-thorns, a cross, leaves, sticks, fire, earth, a ladder, a bundle of sticks, a ball of thread; three ribbons, one blue, one red, and one black, with the axe, mattock, and shovel. The symbols are thus explained:—

'The cross should serve to crucify the tyrant who persecutes us, and troubles our sacred operations. The crown of thorns should serve to pierce his head: The thread denotes the cord to lead him to the gibbet; the ladder will aid him to mount. The leaves are nails to pierce his hands and feet. The pick-axe will penetrate his breast, and shed the impure blood that flows in his veins. The axe will separate his head from his body, as the wolf who disturbs our pacific labours. The salt will prevent the corruption of his head, that it may last as a monument of the eternal infamy of despots. The pole will serve to put the skull of the tyrant upon. The furnace will burn his body. The shovel will scatter his ashes to the wind. The baracca will serve to prepare new tortures for the tyrant. The fountain will purify us from the vile blood we shall have shed. The linen will wipe away our stains, and render us clean and pure. The forest is the place where the Good Cousins labour to obtain so important a result. The trunk with a single branch signifies that, after the great operation, we shall become equal to the N. C.'

'One would be tempted to doubt the reality of the last explanation of the symbols, if it were not given in the minutes of a legal trial. Perhaps the compiler of the notes may have confounded the verbal depositions of some of the witnesses, with what he thought he had read in the catechisms of the sect.'

The Carbonari are called a sect, and the appellation does not displease them. The lunatics of the society detail the miraculous conversations which it has already wrought. The ferocious Lagzaroni of Naples, and the wildest brigands of the Calabrias and the Abruzzi, have been known, immediately on their initiation to perform the most striking acts of benevolence and justice. Under this pretext of bringing back the wicked to the paths of virtue, distinguished brigand chiefs are admitted into the order. The notorious Gaetano Vardurelli himself was a Carbonaro:—

'So far is this system carried, that an assassin, condemned to the chain, is permitted to take his place in the Vendita of the Castle of St. Elmo, where he is confined with other gally-slaves, the commander of the fort, himself a Carbonaro, has not dared to exclude him, but is obliged to sit by his side.

'The Carbonari, like the English Puritans during the civil wars, affect great austerity of manners, and talk of reformation. They cause such Good Cousins as have committed excesses, to do public penance in the Vendite. They preach against games of chance, and it is at their instigation, that such games have been prohibited. Their oath contains a clause, by which they are bound to respect the conjugal honour, and the good name of the Carbonari; and praiseworthy actions are reported at their meetings, and registered.'

The Carbonari have adopted some of the forms of the Beati Paoli, already noticed:—

'If any unfortunate being has incurred their vengeance, especially if it be by an act of infidelity towards the sect, the grand masters meet in what is called a chamber of honour, and deliberate on his fate. If he be condemned, they write his name on a piece of paper, which is burnt, and he is registered in the Black Book, with those who, having presented themselves as candidates for admission into the society, have been rejected as unworthy. The sentence is executed by whoever is especially named for the purpose, and the rest of the lodge cannot resist or annul it.

'Although the printed penal statute of the Western Lucanian Republic makes no explicit mention of the punishment of death, yet it contains some articles which clearly imply it. The punishments are divided under the heads of degradation and penalties in general. The first head is again subdivided into

1st. Devoting to general execration.

2d. Burning the name, or the person in effigy.

3d. Unanimous black-balling—annamamento.

'Among the consequences of these punishments, are interdiction of water and fire, the prohibition of all communication between other Good Cousins and the criminal, whose name, written in large letters, is affixed in all the vendite, and read at every sitting. "The Annamento," they observe, may be effaced by time, but "infamy attaches itself for ever."

'The execration is more than mere disapprobation. Its mystery is explained in the 35th article of the 9th section, "On Crimes against Individuals," which declares that a murderer is not punishable, when the person put to death is a Carbonaro, condemned, after trial, to general execration, or to have his name or effigy burnt. The oath of initiation itself is a proof that the punishment of death is among the engines used by this dangerous society.'

The number of Carbonari has increased rapidly. They amounted to from twenty-four to thirty thousand, from the very beginning of their establishment. The whole population of some towns in the Abruzzi and the Calabria enlisted themselves. Admission to the first rank of Carbonarism is easily obtained; and whoever objects to going through the ceremony in the grand assembly, may perform it before the Grand Masters in private. As nothing is intrusted to the apprentices, there is no risk in multiplying them; the main object being to secure a number of satellites ready to obey invisible superiors, and directions which they cannot understand.

As it is our intention to extend our notice of this very curious work to another number, we shall conclude, for the present, with an extract from the Appendix, giving an account of the forms used on the reception of a Carbonaro:—

'The Preparatore (preparer) leads the Pagan (uninitiated) who is to become a member, blindfold, from the closet of reflection to the door of the Baracca. He knocks irregularly: the Copritore (coverer) says to the second assistant, "A Pagan knocks at the door." The second assistant repeats this to the first, who repeats it to the Grand Master; at every communication the Grand Master strikes a blow with an axe.

'Grand Master. See who is the rash being who dares to trouble our sacred labours.

'This question having passed through the assistants and Copritore to the Preparatore, he answers through an opening in the door,

'Preparatore. It is a man whom I have found wandering in the forest.

'Gr. M. Ask his name, country, and profession.

'The secretary writes the answer.

'Gr. M. Ask him his habitation—his religion.

'The secretary notes them.

'Gr. M. What is it he seeks among us?

'Prep. Light; and to become a member of our society.

'Gr. M. Let him enter.

'(The Pagan is led into the middle of the assembly; and his answers are compared with what the secretary had noted.)

'Gr. M. Mortal, the first qualities which we require are frankness, and contempt of danger. Do you feel that you are capable of practising them?

'After the answer, the Grand Master questions the candidate on morality and benevolence; and he is asked if he has any effects, and wishes to dispose of them, being at the moment in danger of death; after being satisfied of his conduct, the Grand Master continues, "Well, we will expose you to trials that have some meaning—let him make the first journey." He is led out of the Baracca—he is made to journey through the forest—he hears the rustling of leaves—he is then led back to the door, as at his first entrance.

'Gr. M. What have you remarked during this journey?

'(The Pagan relates accordingly.)

'Gr. M. The first journey is the symbol of human virtue; the rustling of leaves, and the obstacles you have met in the road, indicate to you, that weak as we are, and struggling in this vale of tears, we can only attain virtue by good works, and under the guidance of reason, &c. &c. Let him make the second journey.

'(The Pagan is led away, and is made to pass through fire; he is made acquainted with the chastisement of perjury; and, if there is an opportunity, he is shown a head severed from the body, &c. &c. He is again conducted into the Baracca.)

'Gr. M. The fire through which you have passed is the symbol of that flame of charity which should be always kindled in our hearts, to efface the stains of the seven capital sins, &c. &c.

'Make him approach the sacred throne,' &c.

'Gr. M. You must take an irrevocable oath; it offends neither religion nor the state, nor the rights of individuals; but forget not, that its violation is punished with death.

'The Pagan declares that he will submit to it; the Master of the Ceremonies leads him to the throne, and makes him kneel on the white cloth.

'Gr. M. Order!

'The Oath.

'I, N. N. promise and swear, upon the general statutes of the order, and upon this steel, the avenging instrument of the perjured, scrupulously to keep the secret of Carbonarism; and neither to write, engrave, or paint any thing concerning it, without having obtained a written permission. I swear to help my Good Cousins in case of need, as much as in me lies, and not to attempt any thing against the honour of their families. I consent and wish, if I perjure myself, that my body may be cut in pieces, then burnt, and my ashes scattered to the wind, in order that my name may be held up to the execration of the Good Cousins throughout the earth. So help me God.

'Gr. M. Lead him into the middle of the ranks (this is done.) What do you wish? The Master of the Ceremonies suggests to the Pagan, to say light.

'Gr. M. It will be granted to you by the blows of my axe.

'The Grand Master strikes with the axe—this action is repeated by all the apprentices—the bandage is removed from the eyes of the Pagan. The Grand Master and the Good Cousins hold their axes raised.

'Gr. M. These axes will surely put you to death, if you become perjured. On the other hand, they will all strike in your defence, when you need them, and if you remain faithful. (To the Master of the Ceremonies.) Bring him near the throne, and make him kneel.

'Gr. M. Repeat your oath to me, and swear to observe exactly the private institutions of this respectable Vendita.

'The Candidate. I ratify it and swear.

'Gr. M. Holding the specimen of wood in his left hand, and suspending the axe over the head of the candidate with his right, says, "To the great and divine Grand Master of the universe, and to St. Theobald, our protector—In the name and under the auspices of the Supreme Vendita of Naples, and in virtue of the power which has been conferred upon me in this respectable Vendita, I make, name, and create you an apprentice Carbonaro."

'The Grand Master strikes the specimen which is held over the apprentice's head, thrice; he then causes him to rise, and instructs him in the sacred words and touch.

'Gr. M. Master of the Ceremonies, let him be acknowledged by the apprentices.

'The Assistants anticipate the execution of this order, by saying to the Grand Master, "All is according to rule, just and perfect."

'Gr. M. Assistants, tell the respective orders to acknowledge, henceforth, the Good Cousin N. N. as an active member of this Vendita, &c. &c.

'The symbolical picture is explained to the new apprentice.

'Gr. M. At what hour do the Carbonari terminate their sacred labours?

'First Assistant. As soon as the sun no longer enlightens our forest.

'Gr. M. What hour is it?

'Second Assistant. The sun no longer enlightens our forest.

'Gr. M. Good Cousins, as the sun no longer enlightens our forest, it is my intention to terminate our sacred labours. First, let us make a triple salutation (Vantaggio) to our Grand Master, divine and human, (Jesus Christ).—To St. Theobald, our protector, who has assisted us and preserved us from the eyes of the Pagans—Order! To me, —, &c. The signs and salutations (Vantaggi) are performed.

'Gr. M. I declare the labours ended; retire to your Banquette—retire in peace.'

The reception to the second rank, is attended with some blasphemous formalities: The President puts on a robe, and takes the name of Pilate; the first Counsellor, that of Caiaphas; and the second, that of Herod; the good Cousins are called the people; and to the Novice, is given the name of him whose kingdom was not of this world, and whose sufferings are thus impudently parodied. The oath is nearly the same as that of the apprentices, with this addition, that the Carbonari, admitted to the second rank, swear never to talk of the secrets of the apprentices before the Pagans, nor of those of the masters before the apprentices.

Annals of the Parish, or the Chronicle of Dalmailing; during the Ministry of the Rev. Micah Balwhidder; written by Himself. Arranged and Edited by the Author of the 'Ayrshire Legatees,' &c. 8vo. pp. 400. Edinburgh, 1831.

FROM the merit of the Ayrshire Legatees, a series of letters of a very peculiar character, which lately appeared in Blackwood's Magazine and attracted general notice, we took up the present work from the same pen. (for so we take it to be, notwithstanding the editorial character assumed,) with the most favourable prepossessions; and we may say, almost unreservedly, that we have not been disappointed. It is written in the same style with the letters; and in that style the author is so excellent, that we could wish to forget that he ever deviated from it, which, if we mistake not, he has done in more than one recent instance, to no great purpose. To such of our readers as are not yet acquainted with this style, we cannot impart, in two words, a better idea of it than by requesting them to call to mind Humphrey Clinker. Like Smollett, whom the author may be fairly admitted to rival, he possesses, in an eminent degree, the talent of making ordinary life interesting, of writing what is delightful fiction, and yet no romance. The actors in his story are every-day characters, and the situations in which he places them are every-day situations; yet, by the fidelity with which he makes them think, and act, and speak, as such persons would do in real life; by the art with which he brings out all the interesting peculiarities of their characters—and no other; and by the good taste and judgment with which he avoids ever intruding the author on our notice, to disturb the idea of reality, which has been momentarily created, he has contrived to produce, what is by no means an every-day thing—another novel worth reading, and worth preserving by the side of the best works which we have of this description.

Mr. Micah Balwhidder is a Scotch person of guileless heart and primitive manners; not overburdened with attainments, and of an order of mind habitually inferior, but warmed at times by peculiar impulses into a degree of elevation, bordering on genius. Seated for life in the pastoral charge of the parish of Dalmailing, he made it the amusement of some of his leisure hours, to keep a chronicle of all the remarkable events that happened within its bounds during his ministry; and it is this chronicle which the author of the Ayrshire Legatees has been so kind as to arrange and edit for the gratification of the public.

A story of deep and intricate contrivance, related in a style ornate and eloquent, is not of course what we are to look for; but all that the structure of the work admits, the reader will find in the Annals of the Parish;—a succession of striking events in the lives of a group of most interesting characters, told in the language of simplicity and truth, rich in native beauties, but free from all tinsel and affectation. It seems, from beginning to end, as if it were the real Micah, and no fictitious personage, who was addressing us; to keep up this delusion, indeed, so well as he has done, the author must, we think, have at times felt some difficulty in writing himself down, if we may so express ourselves, to the level of the character he has represented, as well as in resisting that temptation to make the most of every thing, which a person knowing that he is writing for the public, is so much more apt to feel, than one who, like Micah, only wrote for his own amusement. In the extract, which we shall now proceed to make, as a fair specimen of the work, the reader will see this skill in the keeping of the composition—to borrow a phrase from art very strikingly exemplified. In the short space of four pages, the author has contrived to say more than some authors would have done in half a volume; a more affecting specimen of simple pathos we have indeed rarely met with. The news of the victory of the Nile has just arrived, and with it a letter to Mr. Micah Balwhidder, announcing, that among the heroes who fell in that glorious achievement, was Charles Malcolm, a youth of high promise, the son of a widow of amiable character, who resides in the parish:—

'I got a letter,' says Micah, 'from Mr. Howard, the midshipman, who came to see us with Charles, telling me, that poor Charles had been mortally wounded in the action, and had afterwards died of his wounds. "He was a hero in the engagement," said Howard, "and he died as a good and brave man should." These tidings gave me one of the sorest hearts I ever suffered, and it was long before I could gather fortitude to disclose the tidings to poor Charles's mother. But the callants of the school had heard of the victory, and were going shouting about, and had set the steeple-bells a ringing; by which Mrs. Malcolm heard the news, and knowing that Charles' ship was with the fleet, she came over to the Manse in great anxiety, to hear the particulars, somebody telling her, that there had been a foreign letter to me by the postman.

'When I saw her, I could not speak, but looked at her in pity, and the tear fleeing up into my eyes, she guessed what had happened. After giving a deep and sore sigh, she inquired, "How did he behave? I hope well, for he was aye a gallant laddie!" And then she wept very bitterly. However, growing calmer, I read to her the letter, and when I had done, she begged me to give it her to keep, saying, "its all I have now left of my pretty boy, but its mair precious to me than the wealth of the Indies," and she begged me to return thanks to the Lord for all the comforts and all the manifold mercies with which her lot had been blessed, since the hour she put her trust in Him alone, and that was when I was left a penniless widow, with her five fatherless bairns.

'It was just an edification of the spirit, to see the Christian resignation of this worthy woman. Mrs. Balwhidder was confounded, and said, there was more sorrow in seeing the deep grief of her fortitude than tongue could tell.

'Having taken a glass of wine with her, I walked out to conduct her to her own house, but in the way we met with a severe trial. All the weans were out parading with napkins and hail-blades on sticks, rejoicing and triumphing in the glad tidings of the victory. But when they saw me and Mrs. Malcolm coming slowly along, they guessed what had happened, and threw away their banners of joy, and standing all up in a row, with silence and sadness along the kirk-yard as we passed, shewed an instinct of compassion that penetrated to my very soul. The poor mother burst into fresh affliction, and some of the bairns into an audible weeping, and taking one another by the hand, they followed us to her door like mourners at a funeral. Never was such a sight seen in any town before. The neighbours came to look at it as we walked along, and the men turned aside to hide their faces, while the mothers pressed their babies fondler to their bosoms, and watered their innocent faces with their tears.

'I prepared a suitable sermon, taking, as the words of my text, "Howl, ye ships of Tarshish, for your strength is laid waste." But when I saw around me so many of my people clad in complimentary mourning, for the gallant Charles Gallav and her daughter had on an old black ribbon, and when I thought of him, the spirited laddie, coming hune from Jamaica, with his parrot on his shoulder, and his limes for me, my heart filled full, and I was obliged to sit down in the pulpit and drop a tear.

'After a pause, and the Lord having vouchsafed to compose me, I rose up and gave out that anthem of triumph, the 124th Psalm, the singing of which brought the congregation round to themselves, but still I felt that I could not preach as I had meant to do, therefore I only said a few words of prayer, and singing another psalm, dismissed the congregation.'

We hinted, on the outset of this notice, at something like reservations to our praise of Mr. Micah's Annals; but the sublimity of his silence at the conclusion of the preceding scene, has made us so much in love with silence for the moment, that we forbear. The reservations were, after all, but trivial; and the few points, to which we had some slight exceptions to make, will not lessen the pleasure with which we are sure the Annals of the Parish will be universally read.

Little Charles's Grammar; or, an Easy Grammar of the French Language. By James Jennings. 18mo. pp. 100. London, 1821.

THE author of this little grammar has rendered good service to children and their instructors, by explaining the principles of the French tongue in so familiar a manner, that the most ordinary capacity may comprehend them.

Wonderful Characters; comprising Memoirs and Anecdotes of the most Remarkable Persons. By Henry Wilson. 8vo. London, 1821.

THE lovers of the marvellous will, perhaps, thank us for pointing out to them where they may procure, at a cheap price, lives of such worthies as Daniel Dancer and Dirty Dick; the Mayor of Garrat, Daniel Lambert, and Jefferey Hudson, Blind Jack of Knareborough, and Bamfylde Moore Carew. All these, cum multis aliis, are to be found in the first part of this work, which is embellished with fine engravings.

A Letter to R. W. Elliston, Esq. on the Injustice and Illegality of his Conduct in representing Lord Byron's Tragedy of Marino Faliero: with some Hints on the general Management of his Theatre. 8vo. pp. 22. London, 1821.

A COARSE and ungentelemanly epistle, without a single fact unknown to the public, or an argument that has not already been exhausted in the daily newspapers.

Select Biography. A Collection of Lives of Eminent Men who have been an honour to their Country. By various distinguished Writers. 18mo. Parts V. to XII.

WE briefly noticed this work on the publication of the first four parts; eight others have followed in regular succession, containing the lives of Fox, Pitt, Nelson, Marlborough, Bruce, Raleigh, Johnson, and the Marquis of Moutrose. As the work advances, it improves in character and the subjects are more varied and interesting. Several of the lives are original, and the others are judiciously condensed and abridged from the more bulky volumes to which they have hitherto been confined. To those who may wish to possess memoirs of the most distinguished persons our country has produced, at a moderate price, we recommend 'Select Biography.'

The Student's Manual; or, an Appendix to the English Dictionary: being an Etymological and Explanatory Vocabulary of Words derived from the Greek. 18mo. London.

If it was known how much real information a person may gain from this 'Manual,' and how much more he may appear to possess by making himself acquainted with it, there would be very few persons without it. To those who have not had the advantage of a classical education, and to others who are entering on its rudiments, it cannot be too strongly recommended. Ingenuity in the plan, good taste in the execution, and utility in its objects, are the characteristics of this cheap and clever little work.

RISE AND PROGRESS OF HORTICULTURE.

[We have for some time had it in contemplation to notice the progress of Horticulture in Great Britain, but this we find so ably done in the last number of the Quarterly Review, that we cannot do better than give our readers a faithful abridgment of the article, which is a Review of the London and Caledonian Horticultural Societies.—Ed.]

THE origin of horticulture, like that of every other art of primitive necessity, is unavoidably involved in obscurity. The first vegetable production which attracted attention as an article of food, was probably the fruit of some tree; and the idea of appropriating such trees may naturally be supposed to have given rise to a garden. All the writers of antiquity agree in putting the fig at the head of the fruit trees first cultivated, and next the vine, the fruit of which serves for food as well as for drink. The almond and pomegranate were early cultivated in Canaan; and it appears by the complaints of the Israelites in the Wilderness, that the fig, grape, and olive were known in Egypt from time immemorial. Culinary vegetables, such as roots and leaves, seem to have been in much less repute in the early ages than fruits. Leeks, onions, and garlic, however, together with cucumbers and melons, appear to have been in use in Egypt at a very early period. Moses, from his description of the garden of Eden, and his directions as to the culture of the vine in Canaan, seems not only to have been a tasteful but a judicious husbandman.

The gardens of Alcinoüs are said to have contained pears, pomegranates, figs, olives, and other fruits 'brilliant to the sight,'—probably citrons or oranges. The culinary vegetables are not particularized, but they were planted in beds. It matters little that these gardens are fabulous; it is enough that the fruits mentioned were known in the days of Homer.

In the laws of the Decemviri, the term hortus is used to signify both a garden and a country house; but afterwards, the kitchen garden was distinguished by the addition of pinguis. Pliny informs us that the husbandman called his kitchen garden 'a second desert,' or 'a fitch of bacon which was always ready to be cut,' or 'a salad easy to be cooked and light of digestion'; and judged that there must be a bad housewife where the garden (her especial charge) was in disorder. According to this author, who wrote about the end of the first century, there were cultivated in the neighbourhood of Rome, all the species of fruits known at the present day and many of the culinary vegetables. The principal exceptions are the pine-apple, orange, (not introduced till the fourth century,) potatoe, and sea-kale. The horticulture of the Romans was entirely artificial and carried on with the superstitious observances dictated by polytheism. Venus was considered as the patroness of the garden. We are informed by Columella, that husbandmen, who were more religious than ordinary when they sowed turnips, prayed that they might grow both for themselves and their neighbours. 'If caterpillars attack them,' he subjoins with suitable gravity, 'a woman going with her hair loose, and barefooted round each bed will kill them; but women must not be admitted where cucumbers or gourd are planted, for commonly green things languish and are checked in their growth by their handling of them.'

It was held by the Roman writers on georgics, that any scion may be grafted on any stock, but modern experience has taught that no faith is to be placed in this doctrine. In Italy, at the present day, attempts are made to impose on strangers roses, myrtles, and jessamines grafted on orange. It is a simple trick, and performed by planting a rose and an orange close together, and drawing a shoot of the former through a hole bored in the trunk of the latter.

The climate, soil, and surface of Britain, we think we may assert without prejudice, are more favourable for gardening, taking all its branches into consideration, than any other, although a century ago, almost every garden production was obtained from Holland. The royal fruiterers and green-grocers were sent thither for fruits and pot-herbs; and the seedsmen received all their seeds from that quarter, as they still do a number of sorts.

The only native fruits of Britain are the wild plum or sloe, currant, bramble, raspberry, strawberry, cranberry, black, red, and white heather-berries, elder-berries, roans, haws, hips, hazeluts, acorns, and beechnut. All the others have either been introduced by the Romans, or by the monks and religious houses during the dark ages from the tenth to the fifteenth century. The same may also be affirmed as to most of our culinary vegetables, of which only the carrot, celery, beet, asparagus, sea-kale, and mushrooms are natives.

Gardens and orchards are frequently mentioned in the earliest chartularies, but little is known of the real state of horticulture in Britain previous to the time of Henry VIII. This monarch's gardener introduced various fruits, salads, and pot-herbs, and cultivated them in the garden of the palace of Nonsuch in Surrey, together as it is commonly supposed with the apricot and Kentish cherry. According to an account of this garden, taken during the usurpation, it was surrounded by a wall fourteen feet high and contained 212 fruit trees.

Tusser, one of the earliest writers on husbandry, in his work which appeared in 1557, gives a list of the fruits and culinary vegetables then known, under the following heads:—'Seeds and herbes for the kyeihen; herbes and rootes for sallets and sauce; herbes and rootes to boyle or to batter; strewing herbes of all sortes; herbes, branches, and flowers for windowes and pots; herbes to still in summer; necessarie herbes to growe in the gardens for physick, not reherse before.' In the whole he enumerates more than 150 species, besides a copious catalogue of fruits, which, with the exception of the fig, orange, and pomegranate, introduced a few years afterwards, the musk melon about the end of the sixteenth century, and the pine apple in the beginning of the last century, include all the species at present cultivated in British gardens.

James I. patronized gardening, and formed or improved a garden at the palace of Theobalds, and another at Greenwich. The former is said by Mandelslo, who visited it in 1640, to have been surrounded by a high wall, and very rich in fruit-tree. Charles I. brought over Tradescant, a Dutchman, as his kitchen gardener, and appointed, for the first time in England, a royal botanist, Parkinson, whose Paradiſus Terrestris is one of the most original of our early works on Horticulture and Flower Gardening. Musk-melons were then cultivated on an open hot-bed placed on a sloping bank, and covered with straw instead of glass, as in France and Italy. Cauliflower and celery were rare at this time, and broccoli was not yet introduced. Virginia potatoes (our common sort) were little known, but Canada potatoes (our Jerusalem artichoke) were in common use. The varieties of fruits were very considerable. Of apples 58 sorts are mentioned, of pears 64, plums 61, peaches 21, pectanines 3, apricots 6, cherries 36, grapes 23, figs 3, with quinces, medlars, almonds, walnuts, filberts, gooseberries, currants, raspberries, and strawberries.

Cromwell promoted agriculture rather than gardening, and pensioned Hartlib, a Lithuanian, who, as Harte informs us, had studied in Flanders, and first communicated and recommended to notice 'the two grand secrets of Flemish husbandry,' those of letting farms on improving leases, and cultivating green crops.

Charles II. introduced French gardening, and his gardener, Rose, who had spent some time in Holland, then the best school of horticulture, and had also studied under Quintiny at Paris, introduced 'such famous dwarf fruit trees' at Hampton Court and Marlborough gardens, that London, his apprentice, in the translation of the 'Retired Gardener,' published in 1667, challenges all Europe to exhibit the like. In allusion to the last two gardens, Waller describes the mall of St. James's Park as,—

'All with a border of rich fruit trees crown'd'

When Quintiny came to England to visit Evelyn, Charles II. offered him a pension to reside here and superintend the royal gardens; but this, Weston informs us, he declined, and returned to serve his own master. Quintiney was the first horticulturist of modern times who united learning and practical knowledge. He was educated for the church, but having a decided preference for gardening, turned his whole attention that way. M. Tam-bonneau, his patron, first committed his gardens to his care; and, soon after, he was intrusted with the entire direction of those of the court. He died at Paris, in 1701. Louis XIV. always spoke of him with regret, and assured his widow that 'he was an equal sufferer with herself.'

Evelyn translated Quintiney's work on 'Orange Trees' and his 'Complete Gardener,' and wrote the 'Kalendarium Hortense,' (the fruitful parent of a useful class of books,) in 1664. His last work on gardening, (the Acetaria), was published in 1699. This excellent man was one of the founders of the Royal Society, and was consulted by the government on all questions relating to planting and agriculture. In 1662, it was proposed to the society to recommend the culture of potatoes, to prevent the recurrence of famine; but Evelyn, who does not seem, at that time, to have been aware of the value of the root, or the nature of its culture, gave them no encouragement, and the plan was laid aside. He patronized, however, a great many useful publications on rural subjects, and especially on horticulture.

Daines Barrington conjectures that hot-houses and ice-houses were first introduced during Charles the Second's reign, as at the installation dinner at Windsor, (23d April, 1667,) there were cherries, strawberries, and ice-creams. Strawberries and cherries, however, Switzer informs us, had been forced by dung heat from time immemorial, by the London market-gardeners. Lord Bacon suggests, that 'as we have housed the exotics of hot countries, lemons, oranges, and myrtles, to preserve them, so we may house our natives to forward them; and thus have violets, strawberries, and pease, all winter, provided they be sown and removed at proper times.'

Cooke, Lucre, Field, London, and Wise, were celebrated practical gardeners at this time; the two latter had the first considerable nursery garden at Brompton, and laid out the greater number of seats, which still exist in the ancient style. Among these may be mentioned Blenheim, Cannons, Exton Park, and Bramley, in England, and Hatton House, near Edinburgh.

As the 18th century advanced, the botanic garden at Chelsea and its curator, Phillip Miller, came into notice. A new era of gardening may be dated from the publication of his dictionary, and especially from the edition in which the Linnæan system was adopted. Miller improved the culture of the vine and the fig; and the Italian broccoli, and the pine-apple, were first made known through his work. The pine-apple was first grown by Sir Matthew Decker, at Richmond, in pots placed on shelves, like green-house plants; but was subsequently found to succeed better in bottom heat and in pits, as it is still grown in Holland.

Original Criticisms

ON

The Principal Performers of the Theatres Royal Drury Lane & Covent Garden.

NO. XVII.—MISS DANCE.

'Like Niobe, all tears.'—SHAKESPEARE.

WHENEVER a female performer is about to make her debut, we are always on the tip-toe of expectation; and when that performer is said to be a distinguished votary of Melpomene, our anxiety is necessarily increased twofold. Report had previously spoken in the highest possible terms of Miss Dance, and, as is generally the case, it had in some degree exceeded the bounds of strict veracity, yet we feel gratified in saying that she did succeed. Her first appearance was in the cheerless character of Mrs. Haller, a choice which she may rejoice in, as she was much more successful than in depicting the sublimer sorrows of the Venetian Matron. She was received with an applause for which she was not a little indebted to her graceful appearance, her fine form, and her handsome features. Many of the tones of her voice, which is very melodious, reminded us strongly of Miss O'Neil; indeed, her whole conception of the character appeared to be formed on the model of that highly talented and accomplished actress. The part of Mrs. Haller does not present an extensive field for the display of ability. The scenes in which deep interest is excited, are very few. To these, however, and indeed to the greatest part of the character, Miss Dance did ample justice. Her loveliness,—her retiring modesty,—her unaffected pensiveness of manners,—her sweetly melodious tones, which seemed responsive to the sorrows of an overfraught heart, solicited the sympathy of all who heard them, and realized the picture which the German poet has so admirably drawn; the last act was superior to any of the former, and the curtain descended amidst thunders of applause. So great was our delight at witnessing her beautiful representation of the unhappy Mrs. Haller, that we looked forward with extreme pleasure to the announcement of Belvidera. We had been led to expect that she might, at no very distant period, prove worthy of the very first characters in the tragic line, and that she would have become a highly valuable acquisition to Covent Garden, where female talent, in the tragic department, is miserably wanted. How unspeakably great, then, was our disappointment; her Belvidera scarcely possessed one of the beauties of Miss O'Neil, and was infinitely inferior to the beautiful representation of Mrs. W. West.—We had hoped that Covent Garden would have at length possessed a fine tragic actress,—we had hoped that Miss Dance might have aspired to the fame of Miss O'Neil, with better hopes than any actress we have seen, since that lady retired from the stage; but we have been completely deceived in our expectations,—intense must be her study, before she can take equal rank with Miss O'Neil; indeed, if we may be allowed to judge from her Belvidera, we most decidedly consider her as inferior to our Drury Lane heroine. In the character of Belvidera, an actress is placed between Scylla and Charybdis. If she yields to the sorrows of love, she runs the risk of falling into whining; if, on the other hand, she exerts herself to give effect to the raving scenes, she is equally exposed to the danger of ranting. These two faults Miss Dance could not avoid. In the former part of the play she whined dreadfully, and in the tempest of her madness, her voice broke forth into violent screamings. Her grief, on hearing that Jaffier intended to kill her father, was too languid; and in her relation to her husband, of Renault's villainy, in the two celebrated lines,—

'But with my cries I could his coward heart, Till he withdrew, and mutter'd vows to hell,' she produced but little effect. Again, she failed both in expression of countenance, of tone, and of action, when she uttered, 'The sir's too thin, and pierces my weak brain!' And her exclamation,—'Hell! hell! burst from thy centre, rage and roar aloud, if thou art half so hot, so mad, as I am,' instead of being terrifically grand, was impotent and ineffective. She displayed but little energy when searching for her husband, imagining that her father conceals him, and the shriek of agony when she fancies she beholds his spirit and that of Pierre, and follows them to the ground, had not any of the effect of her great predecessor. Having now mentioned the points of character in which she failed, it would be unjust, as well as illiberal, not to enumerate some of the beauties. In the scene where Jaffier yields her as the pledge of his fidelity, to the conspirators, she gave a very affecting picture of conjugal affection, rendered half frantic by the supposed unkindness of her husband, and the horror of their parting. Instead of whining, or, like some actresses, roaring out, 'remember twelve,' she dropped a feeble farewell, barely audible, but more expressive than if it had been thundered forth; and, in a half-smothered voice, uttered, 'Remember—twelve.' The scene in which Jaffier threatens to stab her, displayed much excellence, and the manner in which she threw her arms round his neck, and exclaimed, 'Now, then, kill me, while thus I cling about thy cruel neck,' &c. were admirable. Perhaps Miss Dance did not meet with much support in the character of Pierre, on the first night, when we witnessed the representation of Mr. Macready, who performed the character very little to our satisfaction; and, on a subsequent evening, we had the mortification of seeing Mr. Abbott, who, though a deserving performer, to say the truth, made a miserable conspirator. To the honour of Mr. C. Kemble be it said, that notwithstanding the disadvantage of an indifferent Belvidera, and a bad Pierre, he performed the character of Jaffier with unexampled excellence,—in the relation of Renault's conduct to his wife, he drew down torrents of applause; indeed, his performance of the character throughout was perfect; and, although this is not, perhaps, the place for making the remark, we cannot refrain from observing, that his Stranger was exceedingly improved since our notice of it in our review of this gentleman's performances. Indeed, we think it scarcely possible that the character could ever have been more finely played; decidedly, no performer now on the stage could do it so much justice. We will offer a word or two more before we conclude this subject,—if the managers imagine that the applause which is showered on their new idol, is the genuine sense of the public, they will soon find that they are grievously mistaken. We are afraid that the old adage, 'Dying men catch at straws,' has been verified; something certainly was wanting to uphold the falling fortunes of this concern, and they, therefore, seized upon the first seasonable opportunity that presented itself. We are persuaded, that if Miss Dance had delayed her appearance till another season, the managers would have found their account in it. Unremitting application is what she requires; we do not wish to discourage her; let her follow implicitly the instructions of her able preceptor,—let her powers become matured, and her style improved by judicious cultivation, and she may, in a few years, sustain the weighty honours of Melpomene with dignity as well as elegance. W. H. PARRY.

P. S. After expressing ourselves much disappointed with Miss Dance's performance of Belvidera, we feel happy in being able to affirm, with truth, that her Juliet possessed considerable claims to public admiration. Still it was not the Juliet we of late years have been accustomed to witness; superior as it was to Belvidera, we cannot pronounce it a chef-d'œuvre. Miss Dance pleased us much in the garden scene, and in many instances she was highly successful. The sportive and apparently half-ashamed accent with which, after recalling Romeo, she said, 'I have forgot why I did call thee back,' was nature itself. The chief fault of her Juliet was the want of that engaging softness which forms the principal feature of the character. In the scene with the Nurse, she was much too romping and boisterous, but her despair on learning her husband's doom, and the review of the dangers which may attend her swallowing the contents of the phial given her by the Friar, as well as her death, were all finely performed.—Upon the whole, we consider it a very far superior effort to her Belvidera, inferior, however, to her Mrs. Haller; indeed, we much fear that this lady has not sufficient talent to maintain her present rank in the theatre. Original Poetry.

STANZAS

Written on the Top of Mount Nisus, in the Island of Ithaca.

HAIL! rugged hill, whose sun-scorched hills are seen,
Heaving abrupt their heads of hoary grey,

With here and there a lively spot of green,
Like winter mingling with the bloom of May—
Yet here thy plains—to courts in various gay,
Did thy sage chiefs prefer those barren hills;
Fell twenty years a wanderer did he stray,
Of life for these despoiling all the ill—
For thee the sage's blood oft flowed in crimson rills.

See ponder pile, torn by the tooth of time,
In moss-grown fragments scattered all around;
Oft did those walls to many a theme sublime—

To matchless eloquence and verse resound:
'Twas thence the sage philosopher, profound
In moral maxims, all his maxims drew;
Thence keen-eyed science look'd her nature round,

In all her ways, with microscopic view;
There warriors learnt to fight and be victorious too.

Yon other ruin, crumbling into dust,
Where spotless chastity once found a home,
The pride of architecture rose, august,—

The arch—the column—and the gorgeous dome;

There pensive Penelope piled the loom
All day, and sad the tedious task unweave,
When sable night enveloped all in gloom,—
A blessed example of unaltered love!
Not all the youth of Greece her steady faith could move.

Deep in the bosom of that woody glen,
Where echo whispers to the passing breeze
Of every spring, on from her hollow den,
Hear to the blast behind her the groaning trees;

When once the bath, for elegance and ease,
Surrounded with fair seats of swarthy green,
Stately arose, the wondering stranger sees
The lonely Arethusa, Naiad Queen,
* Olyses.

† At a little village called Mavrona, (Μαύρα,) near the entrance of the port of Ithaca, are seen the ruins of a building, which seems to have been constructed without the help of mortar, the stones being dovetailed in a peculiar manner. Here they relate, that Homer, in the reign of a sage, descendant of Olyses, who is the real owner of the character attributed to that hero in the Odyssey, &c. taught poetry, elocution, philosophy, and the art of war, and was followed by disciples from all parts of Greece; hence the place is still called Homer's School.

That he had been at Ithaca previous to having written his poems, admits of no doubt; for no one could give such striking descriptions of a place he had never seen, as are to be found in his writings of this island.

‡ Palace Kastros, an extensive ruin some miles south-east of the town of Ithaca, supposed to have been one of the residences of the kings of that and the adjacent islands.

§ To the admirer of nature in her wildest dress, this fountain and its surrounding scenery will afford the highest pleasure. Arethusa is embosomed by a most romantic woody valley, accessible only by one steep and dangerous foot-path.

The water issues from an aperture in the rock, and is received into a basin, hewn by art, about six feet long, four and-a-half wide, and about four feet deep. This basin is completed by a front wall, built of stone and mortar, but which the petrifying quality of the water has completely consolidated. In the hottest summer weather it discharges about five gal-

Who, murmuring, seems to mourn the changes
she has seen.
There heroes rest, when toil their nerves un-strings,
Inbibed fresh vigour from her cooling streams;—
There lovely beauties, sprightly, fair, and young,
Would oft repair to lave their snowy limbs;
Ah! how degrading the mutation seems!
Now, there foul indolence, in female shapes,
In squalid tattered basks in noontide beams;
And Sloth and Apathy their bodies scrape,
In form of men, with many a gaunt and gap.

Can this be Greece, the mighty and the brave?
Can this be Greece, renowned in arts and arms?

Can this be Greece, this pale dejected slave,
Whose torpid breast no ray divine informs?
Yes, this is Greece divest of all her charms—
This drooping captive, manacled and bound—
With heaving breast and supplicating arms,
Behold for aid, she wildly looks around,
But where, alas! for Greece, is succour to be found!

Say,—ye who ponder on her abject state,
See what she is, and think of what she was,—
What over-powering evil could beget
Of this effect, this dire effect, the cause?
What levelled her proud cities and her laws?
Who tore the laurel from her martial brow?
Who bade fair Science and the Muses pause,
Leave bright Pædia and high Pindus' brow,
To give in climes remote their sweetest strains to flow.

'Twas Luxury, chief bane of social good,
Who steals his honour from the patriot's
breast,
That parent of a foul and noxious brood
Of evils, worse than earthquakes, fire, and pest.

'Twas she bade cruelly infuriate burst
In the darkness breast of Tyranny;
Twas she made man so base as not to scorn
Before a fellow man to bow the knee;
Twas she made men, by nature born free,
Become the slaves of superstition wild;
And, led by Falsehood and Hypocrisy,
In labyrinths of error stray beguiled,
And be by Ignorance and Vice debased—defiled.

For time there was, when man in every land,
(That age flows sweetly in poetic lore—)
Warm from the impression of his Maker's hand, Met brother man—his equal and no more;
Till Luxury from his brow the impression tore—

Then Discord bade fell Rapine draw the sword;
Then Murder bathed his wheels in tepid gore,
And the fair pages of the world's record
Were blotted with the names of vassal, slave, and lord.

Where is the greatness of great Babylon?
And where is fled the haughty Roman's boast—
The polished Greeks—the mighty Persian's throne?

All, all, beneath the hand of Luxury lost—
Those realms never felt of age the frost, lons in a minute, of very cold, clear, and light water, with something of a mineral taste.
This fountain once supplied an extensive bath, the ruins of which are discoverable a little below it.

Till they gave ear to Luxury's syren song—
Kingdoms attend! you'll find unto your cost, Whoever listens sinks the dead among—
So sings the muse—perhaps the muse is wrong.

Or does the unalterable voice of Fate
Thus speak the doom of empires as they rise—

'Rejoice awhile, for by a certain date
Your greatness withers, and your glory dies?'
Ah! is it so? and must the curious eyes
Of strangers yet behold Britannia low?
Must she, whose flame o'er earth and ocean flies,
To some new Goth or some new Vandal
bow?
And must her sons be doomed to slavery and woe.

O, thou good spirit! (for such sure thou art,
That warms my breast with patriotic fire,
Be thine to influence every Briton's heart—
With love of Britain Britons still inspire.
Be thou around her still a wall of fire!
Shield her from foreign and domestic wrong!
Confound her foes—ev'n blast them in thine ire.

Bid faction cease; be mute Corruption's tongue,
And, till the wreck of time, her liberty prolong.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—We are not aware of any novelty at this theatre during the week, except that, on Monday evening, it was very unexpectedly honoured with a visit from the Queen. Both Mr.
Elliston and the audience were quite unprepared; and her majesty, who, on entering, took her seat in the box immediately opposite to the king's, was some time in the house before she was recognized. As soon, however, as the audience understood she was present, a simultaneous burst of applause was heard from all parts of the theatre, and cries of 'God save the Queen,' were reiterated with vehement vociferation. The singers were not in attendance, and two acts of Lord Byron's tragedy passed off in dumb show, when Mr. Elliston came forward, to know the pleasure of the audience, which, on learning, he promised that the national anthem should be sung at the end of the tragedy. He certainly kept his word, but so motley a group were surely never before assembled.
The Doge of Venice, whose head was supposed to have been separated from his body, was seen joining Don Giovanni (ready dressed for the after-piece) in singing 'God save the Queen,' while the lovely Angiolina mixed with a group of imps in the general chorus.
Her Majesty, who looked extremely well, after waiting to see one or two scenes of the afterpiece, retired in the same private manner in which she entered the theatre.

COVENT GARDEN.—We suspect, that the managers of this theatre have,
at last, found out the precise line for Miss Dancer's talents, that of genteel comedy. The character of Lady Townley, in the comedy of the Provoked Husband, in which she appeared for the first time, on Friday night, is by far her best effort; she was lively and dignified, and avoided the common fault of confounding the air and fascinations of a woman of rank, with co-quetry or affectation. In the comic scenes she was all life, and in those of tenderness, at the close, she was extremely affecting. Mr. Charles Kemble was a fine representative of Lord
Townley, and Abbott made much of Manly. Fawcett was quite wrong-headed in Sir Francis Wronghead, whom he disgraced, by bad English and provincial barbarism, to a wanton excess. The play was received with much applause, and has been repeated.

Shakespeare's Tempest, which has been altered by Davenant, Dryden, and John Kemble, has been doomed to new mutilations and transformations, by more ignoble hands. It has been,
according to the prevailing vice of the age, operatized, by the introduction of some old music. Mr. Macready was a good Prospero, but we have seen a better; Miss Foote, a beautiful Ariel, with an indifferent voice; Miss Stephens and Miss Hallande, enchanting in Desdemona and Miranda; and Emery, Farren, and Blanchard, all that could be wished, in Caliban, Stephano, and Trinculo. The scenery is very beautiful.

ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.—Amidst
all the competition of amusements, Mathews 'holds on the even tenor of his way,' and neither fails in spirit nor attraction through the frequent repetition of his adventures.

MINOR THEATRES.—Novelty is the order of the day at the minor theatres, particularly the Surrey and Sadler's Wells, where, at least, one new and attractive piece has been produced weekly since the commencement of the season.—At the Coburg, Il Diavolo Antonio; and at Astley's, the Equestrian Troop, have their share of attraction; while at the European Saloon,
(now called the New Theatre,) Miss Macaulay, by her tragic and comic powers, and M. Alexandre, by his extraordinary ventriloquial talents, alternately draw fashionable audiences.

Literature and Science.

French Bibliography.—Among other periodical publications, there is one at Paris, bearing the name of 'Bibliography of France.' About fifty numbers appear annually, composing a volume of from 800 to 1000 pages. This work exhibits a list of all the printed works and re-impressions throughout the French territory. Once a week, there appears a number, of sixteen pages more or less. Every publication, whether printed at Paris or in the departments, is noticed instantly after its appearance. Works of minor, as well as of the greatest importance, are announced alike. The number of bookselling articles announced in 1820, was near five thousand. The editor, M. Beuchot, well known as a biographer of extensive erudition, for the purpose of facilitating researches, adds, at the end of every year, three supplementary numbers,—an alphabetical table of works, an alphabetical table of authors, and a systematic or methodical table, in which all the works announced through the year are arranged according to their kinds or subject matter. The journal contains, likewise, more copious information than any other, relative to engravings, geographical charts, and music. Under the title of Varieties, M. Beuchot furnishes, from time to time, notices of French works printed abroad, and translations of French works into foreign languages, foreign publications treating of France or the French, with bibliographical notices respecting books and editions. Under the head Necrology, the death of French authors is announced, mostly accompanied with the date; and a list of all such of their works as have come to his knowledge.

Hops.—Dr. A. W. Ives, of New York, has lately made experiments on the hop, which prove that its characteristic properties reside in a substance forming not more than one-sixth part of the weight of the hop, and easily separable from it. It was observed, that on removing some hops from a bag in which they had been preserved for three years, an impalpable yellow powder was left behind; which, when sifted, appeared quite pure; this has been called lupulin; it is quite peculiar to the female plant, and is probably secreted in the nectaries. Hops from which all the lupulin had been separated, when acted upon by water, alcohol, &c. gave a portion of extract which, however, possessed none of the characteristic properties of the hop. Dr. Ives next endeavoured to ascertain the quantity afforded by a given weight of hops: 6lbs. of hops, from the centre of a bag, were put into a light bag, and by threshing, rubbing, and sifting, fourteen ounces of lupulin were separated. Two barrels of beer were then made, in which nine ounces of lupulin were substituted for 5lbs. (the ordinary quantity) of hops, and the result confirmed every expectation.

The Bee.

Omnis nos itidem depascitur aurea dieta.'*

LUCRETIVS.

[From the Percy Anecdotes.]

'Criticism.—The late Mr. Cumberland used to say, that authors must not be thin-skinned, but shelled like the rhinoceros. The injunction would have been good, were the shell of their own making; but it would be hard were the linnet, or the nightingale, to cease from warbling, because they cannot sing in a storm.

'The art of literary condemnation, as it may be practised by men of wit and arrogance, is much less difficult than criminal. A worthless book produces no great evil in literature; it dies soon, and naturally; but that undue severity of criticism, which lessens by one page the contributions of genius to the cause of human improvement, is a serious and great calamity.

'The elegant author of the Calamities of Authors, asks, "who are the authors marked out for such attack?" "Scarcely," he says, "one of the race of scribblers; for wit will not lose one silver shaft on game; which struck, no one would take up. It must level at the historian, whose novel researches throw a light on the depths of antiquity; on the poet, who, addressing himself to the imagination, perishes, if that solve avenue to the heart be closed on him."

'Such are the class of authors, who are the chief objects of this sort of criticism, which has sent some nervous authors to their graves, and embittered the existence of many whose talents we all regard.

'HAWKSWORTH died of criticism; Tasso was driven mad by it; and even the calm NEWTON kept hold of life only by the sufferance of a friend, who withheld a criticism on his chronology, for no other reason, but his conviction, that if published while he was alive, it would put an end to him.

'HAWKSWORTH, says Dr. Kippis, in his biography of Captain Cook, was "invited to write the account of the late Voyages to the South Seas, a fatal undertaking, and which, in its consequences, deprived him of peace of mind, and of life itself." An innumerable host of enemies attacked it in the newspapers and magazines; some pointed out blunders in matters of science, and some exercised their wit in poetical translations and epigrams; but these, however much they might hurt his feelings as an author, did not probably make him suffer as a man, so much as those who censured him for the frequent heresy of his sentiments, and the indecency of not a few of his narratives. Nor is it surprising that he should have felt irritated, and vexed, and mortified, that such a reception should be given to a work, of which he thought he might be proud, and from which he drew so great an emolument (£8000). But no respect for the services he had before rendered to religion or virtue, by his papers in the Advertiser, and his Notes to Swift's Letters, could obliterate the impression of his apostasy in the remarks which he introduced into the account of the Voyage Round the World; and it could not but aggravate the pain which both his friends and himself felt, when they considered, that whatever was objectionable in this work, had come from his pen without provocation, and without necessity, either from the nature of the undertaking, or the expectation of the public.

'Tasso had a vast and prolific imagination, accompanied with an excessively hypocondriacal temperament. The composition of his immortal epic, by giving scope to the boldest flights, and calling into effect the energies of his exalted and enthusiastic genius, whilst with equal ardour it led him to entertain hopes of immediate and extensive fame, laid most probably the foundation of his succeeding derangement. His susceptibility and tenderness of feeling were great; and when his sublime work met with unexpected opposition, and was even treated, with contempt and derision, the fortitude of the poet was not proof against the keen sense of disappointment. He twice attempted to please his ignorant and malignant critics, by recomposing his poem; and, during the hurry, the anguish and irritation attending these efforts, the vigour of a great mind was entirely exhausted, and in two years after the publication of his "Gerusalemme Liberata," the unhappy bard became an object of pity and of terror.

'NEWTON, with all his philosophy, was so sensible to critical remarks, that Whiston tells us, he lost his favour, which he had enjoyed for twenty years, for contradicting Newton in his old age; for no man was of "a more fearful temper." Whiston declares, that he would not have thought proper to have published his work against Newton's Chronology in his lifetime, "because I knew his temper so well, that I should have expected it would have killed him; as Dr. Bentley, Bishop Stillingfleet's chaplain, told me, that he believed Mr. Locke's thorough confutation of the bishop's metaphysics about the Trinity, hastened his end."

'Dr. Johnson.—Soon after the publication of the Life of Savage, which was anonymous, Mr. Walter Harte, dining with Mr. Cave, the projector of the Gentleman's Magazine, at St. John's Gate, took occasion to speak very handsomely of the work. The next time Cave met Harte, he told him that he had made a man very happy the other day at his house, by the encomiums he bestowed on the author of Savage's Life. "How could that be?" says Harte; "none were present but you and I." Cave replied, "You might observe I sent a plate of vignettes behind the screen. There skulked the biographer, one Johnson, whose dress was so shabby, that he durst not make his appearance. He overheard our conversation; and your applauding his performance, delighted him exceedingly."

TO READERS & CORRESPONDENTS.

THE length to which our review of two highly interesting works has been extended, must be our apology for the omission of our usual notice of the fine arts, and the communications of several correspondents.

Recollections of a Classical Tour through various Parts of Greece, Turkey, and Italy, made in the Years 1818 and 1819. By Peter Edmund Laurent. Illustrated with coloured plates. 4to. pp. 317. London, 1821.

GREECE and Italy, at least, if not Turkey, have been as much travelled as almost any part of the globe, while more has been written on them than all the other parts united; but, notwithstanding this, they still present a rich variety to the judicious and intelligent traveller. Our pages have frequently been enriched with the itineraries of tourists in Greece and Italy, and we now, with pleasure, add Mr. Laurent to the number, for, although he follows with rather unequal steps, he is worthy of being ranked among them.

From the preface, we learn, that Mr. Laurent left Oxford in 1818, in company with two members of the University. They passed over the Alps, by the Mount Cenis road, crossing Piedmont and the fertile valley of Lombardy, through the towns of Turin, Milan, Mantua, Verona, Vicenza, and Venice. From the last place they proceeded to Trieste, where, after making an excursion to the ruins of Pola, they embarked for Constantinople. In the course of the voyage they visited the Trojan plain and the probable site of Ilium. Dreading to face the plague, which then raged in the northern provinces of Greece, they re-embarked at Constantinople for Athens; thence passed into the Peloponnese; saw the remains of Corinth, Sigeon, Nemea, Argos, Mantinea, Sparta, Messene, Phigalia, Olympia, Patre, &c. &c. At Patre, our travellers embarked for the Ionian Islands, thence passed to Italy, touched at Otranto, Brindisi, and Barietta, and returned homeward through Naples, Rome, and Florence.

Our author having had such a clear field and fair play, something good may be expected from him, and he shall speak for himself; although we must—premise that he is a modest unassuming writer, who appears to have been contented with relating what he actually saw, and not trespassing on the regions of romance, in which travellers have, in all ages, been notorious poachers. The work, though not divided into letters, is in the style of epistolary composition, and is written with great ease and freedom. It is also (and as reviewers, we are, in duty bound, to thank him,) so divided, according to different places visited, that we can very easily detach a few extracts, which will enable our readers to judge of the author's talents, and of the interest the work possesses. In an account of Trieste, we have the following notice of the murder of the venerable Winckelmann:—

It was at Trieste that Winckelmann was assassinated by a villain named Arcangeli. This man had been a cook in the house of the Count Calisto, at Vienna, and had been condemned to death for several crimes, but had received his pardon; he met his victim on the road from Vienna to Rome, and gained his confidence by affecting to have a great love for the fine arts. Winckelmann was occupied in a room of his inn, writing some notes for a new edition of his History of Art, when Arcangeli interrupted him by asking him to see some medals; hardly had the antiquary opened the trunk which contained them, when his murderer threw on his neck a running knot, and endeavored to strangle him; not being able to succeed in his purpose, the sanguinary villain pierced him in several places with a knife; he was immediately seized and executed for his crime; but his punishment did not repair the loss which literature experienced by the death of Winckelmann. The venerable antiquary lived sufficiently long to receive the spiritual consolations of his church, and to dictate his will, by which he named Cardinal Albani his sole legatee.

Winckelmann was the son of an obscure tradesman of Stendal, in Brandenburg; by indefatigable exertions he raised himself to a most conspicuous rank in the study of antiquity; he was member of nearly all the literary societies in Europe, and his name will be ever dear to artists.

The account of Pola furnishes us with an interesting anecdote of Ariosto

The author says,—

‘I have often been surprised to find the name of Orlando or Rolando, so frequently attached to ruins in Italy and the neighbouring countries: Castello di Orlando is a name given near Naples and in Magna Grecia, to almost every one of the towers which, in former times, served as fastnesses for those bands of robbers which ravaged the country, and bade defiance even to Spanish despotism. This may be accounted for by the great diffusion of Ariosto's poem, the nature and variety of which render it, perhaps, more attractive than any other to the lower orders. Of this it is well known the poet had a convincing proof: falling, during a ramble over the Apennines, among a band of robbers, they were on the point of taking from him his purse, and, perhaps, his life; but having recognised in him the author of Orlando, they threw themselves at his feet, intreated pardon for their intended injury, and, singing his verses, guarded him to a place of greater security.’

As our remaining extracts, for the present, will be in the form of detached anecdotes, rather than as a connected narrative, we shall briefly observe that, on a careful examination of the whole work, we can pronounce it to be highly interesting, containing much real and valuable information, and avoiding every thing like prosing or trivial detail. Of this we hope to convince our readers, and now to the proof:—

Nautical Politeness.—Our schooner was manned by Illyrian sailors; they were very dirty, certainly more civil, but I doubt whether so skilful as the seamen of northern kingdoms; those tempests of long duration, to which the Atlantic sailor is often exposed, are unknown in more confined seas, where, in every part, a secure harbour is at hand, to shield the battered vessel from the rage of the sea. In a summer voyage, they have little more to do than to eat and drink, tell horrid tales of pirates' cruelty, and hail each ship that passes; this last practice is never neglected, and the mode of executing it proves forcibly, that some portion of that promiscuity to compliment, which characterises Italy and all other nations swayed by despotic governments, may transude itself even into the dominions of Neptune. An English ship hails in a warmer tone, and abrupt:—‘Ho, the ship!’

bound—where from?" in the Mediterranean, all communication must be preceded by the hoisting of the colours, and the compliment, "Buon giorno Signor Capitano e tutta la compagnia, buon giorno;" while every question is ended by a "di grazia," which is made to reverberate for several seconds in the speaking trumpet.

Zea (Ceos), where the art of weaving silk was first taught by Parnphila, who made webs of it so fine that they were compared to gossamer, and poetically called a web of air, continues to carry on its original manufacture, but not to any considerable extent. The ladies of this island are far from being ugly, but our author complains, that the 'free, not to say, indecent, postures which they assume when lolling on their dyvans, render their beauty not very attractive to a northern taste.' We revert again to extract:—

A Turkish Church-Yard at Scio (Chios).—Near the town [Scio], on the sea shore, is seen a vast burial-ground, appropriated to the Turks; the cause of its being so extensive is, that their religion forbids the burial of more than one person on the same spot of ground; the graves are indicated by stones, inscribed with gilt Arabic characters: they are shaded with cypress, aloes, and the other trees by most nations regarded as expressive of grief. Vizirs and other great men have a kabbe, that is, a tower and monument beautifully built, placed over their graves. People of a middle station have two stones placed upright, one at the head, the other at the feet. One of these stones has the name of the deceased, elegantly written; to which is added, sometimes in prose, sometimes in verse, a prayer of this or the like form, at the direction of the heir: Dâma Allâho kalâhi rahmâtoho,—may God shew eternal mercy to him. If a man is buried, under the top of the stone is a Turkish turban; if a woman, another sort of ornament is placed there. The stone at the feet is the same in both. The sepulchral chapels erected in memory of some saints of Islamism and of the sultans, are called turbeh. These buildings are generally placed in the gardens of the mosques, founded by these princes; they are very richly adorned. The grave, which is in the middle of the chapel, is covered with a wooden chest, wrapped in red velvet, enriched with gold and precious stones, and having different verses of the Koran embroidered on it; towards the side where reclines the head of the defunct monarch, is seen a piece of the veil which has covered the shrine of Mecca, (for no Moslem must be buried without a piece of that sacred cloth,) over which is a muslin turban. Silver rails, incrustated with mother-of-pearl, surround the grave, at the extremities of which are two lofty chandeliers with tapers. The interior of these chapels is magnificently adorned with marble, porcelain, and golden inscriptions. Lamps, ever lighted, hang from the roof, and the turbeh-dars, or keepers of the tomb, are constantly reading chapters of the Koran for the repose of the soul of the sultans. Constantinople contains about twenty of these turbehs. The Turkish burial-grounds are always placed near the towns, and, being kept clean and adorned with verdure, are agreeable yet impressive objects; they are never imagined to be haunted, a circumstance more to be attributed to their attractive appearance, than to any strength of mind peculiar to the followers of Mahomet. 'Indeed, one can see no reason why the resting-place of our departed friends should be in the most dirty and melancholy spots, or why their remains should be so often and so unnecessarily disturbed.'

The Though.—The though is a horse's tail, stained red, and stuck upon a pole, with a gilt knob at the top: this is one of the military ensigns of the Turks, and the dignity of a vizir is determined by the number of these horses' tails which he is allowed to carry before him. Besides the though, each dozen of men has, when on march, a small standard, the number of which causes the army to be crowded with flag-bearers, who in battle are worse than useless; the Turkish soldiers think it no disgrace to lose their colours, excepting, however, the holy banner of Mohammed, which in battle is kept at a convenient distance from the field, and at the first appearance of a defeat, is precipitately removed. The Janissaries conceive military glory to consist in a strenuous defence of their kettles and spoons.—Baid rides? Is it more rational to place honour in the defence of a piece of tattered silk, or of a monstrous two-headed black eagle?

Ilium and the Troic Plain.—The precise site of Troy was an object of dispute among the ancient critics; Strabo, in the thirteenth book of his geography, gives a most accurate account of the country, and after throwing forth many hints, which, in modern times, have been made good use of, leaves the question undecided. Demetrius, a native of Skepsia, a town not situated far from Alexandria of Troas, passed his life in an unsuccessful search for the spot, and only concluded that the town in his days called Ilium, could not be, according to the description of Homer, upon the same spot as the ancient city of Priam.

This Ilium, of which the ruins are pretty well determined, was placed near the sea; its Acropolis was shown as the Pergamus of Troy. To the north of the hill on which it was erected, flowed a small rivulet, which they denominated the Simoeis; it united with a stream, or rather river, which rolled its waters down the plain from Mount Ida, and threw itself into the Hellespont; this river was called the Scamander. Pliny, in his geographical description of the world, mentions this modern Ilium in a manner which proves, beyond a doubt, that he regarded it as built on the site of ancient Troy.

'Till the last century the question remained undecided, as Strabo had left it; but in the year 1785, Le Chevalier, an accurate and laborious traveller, discovered a spot in the plain, or rather at the foot of Ida, which seemed better to answer the description of the poet; it was a hill near the village of Bounar-Bashi, which he chose for his Pergamus; the river, which before every traveller had regarded as the Scamander, was now proved to be the Simoeis, and the former Simoeis remained without a name; much was said concerning the hot and warm sources of the newly-found Scamander. Other travellers, with an imagination less heated, visited this spot; they found the distance from Bounar-Bashi to the Hellespont, too great; they discovered that the sources of the new Scamander, instead of being one warm and the other cold, were both warm; many difficulties were raised against the system of Le Chevalier, and rebutted with warmth by his friends. Two parties immediately divided the classic world; one contended for the truth of the minute and often fanciful details of Le Chevalier; while others denied the truth of many of the most important facts brought forward by that geographer. Both parties were violent, and, as generally happens in such cases, equivocation took the place of truth, passion that of argument.

'To conciliate the two parties is task which I have neither the wish nor the talent to perform: I have too often experienced, that when once discord has reared her head in religion, in politics, or in literature, argument is the last instrument to which resort must be had to check its influence.—blustering ignorance generally crushes one of the factions, and the tyranny of the other necessarily ensures a temporary quiet. When I visited the plain of Ilium, I had heard but little of the dispute in question. I, indeed, knew that some persons had endeavoured to prove the Trojan war a fable; but I rejected the idea, as a Christian does that of infidelity, from which, in future life, he guesses much harm may perhaps accrue, while with certainty he knows that no bad effects can ensue from his adhering to the tenets of his ancestors. If it be proved that the truth of the main facts contained in the Iliad is chimerical, what will become of the history attached to them? Are we to betray to all-douring scepticism so many interesting records? If we prove that Helen, that Paris, that Achilles, that Troy itself never existed, the interest felt in reading the works of Homer must necessarily be diminished, the pleasure will be no longer so great, and the bard, whose poems have nearly exhausted the whole fund of human knowledge, would be more neglected than even he now is.—Apollo and the muses defend us from so dire a misfortune!

'The scenery, as to the islands, the seas, the mountains, or, in a few words, as to its general features, corresponds, certainly as much as one can expect, with the description of Homer: Lemnos, Imbros, Tenedos, Ida, the Chersonesus, and the Hellespont, are found in the same relative situation as a cursory reader of the Iliad would imagine them to be placed; the plain itself, however, did not answer my expectations.—I did not, certainly, hope to be able to distinguish the very walls of the town; as well might I have expected to have seen the Greek ships anchored upon the strand, or Hector and Achilles striding over the fields; but I thought I should have seen some eminence worthy of being the Pergamus—some river worthy of being called the Scamander; the usual fate of classic travellers awaited me—I was disappointed.

‘The water was so shallow that we found it impossible to land with dry feet; the sailors offered to carry us on their backs to the shore; the experiment was first tried by an unfortunate Florentine, who, during the whole voyage, had suffered much from sea-sickness, a disorder ever the subject of ridicule among sailors; he mounted the broad shoulders of one of our Italian seamen, but hardly had he rode fifty yards in this style, before a well-pretended stumble threw him headlong into the sea;—“experientia docet.” We tucked up our trousers, threw off our stockings and shoes, and, with praiseworthy ardour, waded to the land.’

Public Baths at Constantinople.—‘The very frequent recurrence of ablations, enjoined by the wisdom of Mohammed, to preserve his followers from the disorders produced in a warm climate by an accumulation of dirt on the skin, has caused pious individuals to erect fountains in almost every street of the Turkish cities, and even on the border of the roads, far distant from any town; the tomb of the founder is generally placed in the neighbourhood, and is surrounded with trees, which offer a delightful shade to the wearied traveller. These fountains are generally built in the Moonish style, and adorned with Arabic inscriptions.’

‘To the same precept of cleanliness we may attribute the number of warm baths seen in Turkey; every village has its hammam or public bath, and every large house is provided with the same convenience. These thermæ are heated by a subterranean vault, which serves as a furnace, and is filled with logs of wood, above which, and immediately below the marble pavement of the building, is a large cauldron of water, which is kept in a constant state of ebullition; tubes placed in the interior of the walls carry off the steam, while others furnish the interior with hot water from the cauldron, and with cold water from a contiguous cistern. The bather, having paid to the keeper of the bath the price of entrance, is shown into a square room, along the walls of which runs a wide seat, covered with cushions; he here leaves his clothes, and girding round his body a wide piece of cotton, which hangs from his waist to his ancles, and placing his feet in a pair of wooden clogs, to preserve them from the burning heat of the floor, he proceeds through several rooms, successively increasing in warmth, to the interior chamber. This chamber is built in a circular shape, and covered by a cupola, in which there are many openings covered with very thick glass, which gives a free passage to the light, but not to the visual rays of the curious; a circular dais on the pavement indicates the position of the cauldron, which is immediately underneath; small fountains and marble basins are seen at equal distances round the wall.’

Temple of Theseus at Athens.—‘This well-preserved ruin, as I before said, stands on a large open place, where a rope-maker was exercising his trade when we passed: this spot is enlivened in the evenings with the youthful games of many Athenian boys; it was near this temple, according to Pausanias, that stood Ptolemy’s gymnasium and the forum. A part of the temple is now used as a church, dedicated to St. George: it is closed by a door made of flat iron bars, at which the Turks, with most disgraceful impiety, amuse themselves in trying the force of their muskets. In the chancel are the graves of three English travellers, who have paid the debt of nature in this country: one is that of the unfortunate Tweddell; by his side is buried a Mr. Walker, who fell a victim to a fever produced by fatigue and heat. The inscription upon Tweddell’s grave is engraved in the true antique style, without stops or separations; it cannot be read without considerable attention and study: it is indeed astonishing that men should be willing to sacrifice to the mania of imitating the very errors of the ancients, the striking effect which so beautiful an epitaph would produce on every reader were it legible. A grave was digging for a Mr. Phillips, who had died while making the tour of the Morea: he had quitted Athens in August, a time when disease rages with violence in the Peloponnesus; relying upon the strength of his constitution, he had refused to follow the advice given him by the consuls to defer his journey till the autumn: he departed, neglecting even to provide himself with medicine: we saw his name scratched upon one of the columns of a temple in Arcadia, near which the peasants told us he was seized with a fever, which threw him into delirium: we recorded his premature death under his name. By the uneducated, both Greeks and Mohammedans, it is imagined that after interment the body of a Frank is conveyed by some invisible power to his native land.

‘The Theseum is comparatively small, but its effect is striking: in shape it is similar to the Parthenon: the beautiful frieze with which it is decorated, represents part of the histories of Hercules and Theseus: it is most entire of all the Athenian monuments, and long may the protecting genius of Greece defend it from the defiling touch of the Turkish mason, and the no less destructive dilapidations of European virtuosi.

A Wedding at Athens.—‘Every traveller who has visited Athens for a few days, returns with a description of the weddings, burials, and christenings at which he assisted: whether during our stay Hymen had ceased to inspire the Athenian youths, and death to strike, æquo pede, I cannot determine; but I assure you, although we remained at Athens more than a month, we witnessed no funeral, and were present at one wedding only;—the happy couple was not of the highest rank: that you should not, however, accuse my journal of being deficient in the article of matrimony, I shall add to this chapter of musty antiquity an account of one of the most extraordinary and ridiculous scenes I ever witnessed.

‘It was on a Sunday afternoon; the heat was excessive, and we were occupied in rearranging our journal; my ear was struck with the monotonous sound of a Greek tambour, and the noise of people hurrying through the street: I followed them, and after turning through two or three lanes, came to the spot where the sound proceeded. Some dirty musicians, with a tambour, a fiddle, and a guitar, were dancing, playing, and singing; after them came a Greek damsel, supported by two grave matrons, and followed by a long string of dames hoary with age: she was the bride, and notwithstanding the thermometer stood at 96°, was covered with mantles and furs; her fingers’ ends and joints were stained red; the lower part of her eyes was tinged with a blue colour, and her cheeks were ornamented with stars of black dye and leaf gold: a dirty urchin, walking backwards, held a mirror in such a manner that the young woman had her image constantly before her.

a comfortable establishment for the young people; I subscribed my share, but preferred dispensing with the kisses. A Greek, an old man, whose age was sufficient excuse for the joke, pushed me towards the bride, whom I was consequently obliged to salute amidst the loud cheers of the assembly:—how the ceremony ended I cannot tell you, as the day fell, and I returned home ere all had embraced the bridegroom.

CAPTAIN COOK was one of the first navigators that preserved his crew in good health, amidst all the variations of climate, to which a voyage round the world exposed them; to Captain Parry no less praise is due, for his attentions in this respect; and he had the gratification of seeing every officer and man on board both ships, (with only one exception out of ninety-four persons) return to their native country in as robust health as when they left it, after an absence of nearly eighteen months. Even the scurvy, so fatal a scourge in high northern latitudes, was kept under or subdued in a most remarkable manner. The first instance of this disease occurring was in the beginning of January, 1820, when Mr. Scallion, the gunner, was afflicted with it. This was found to have been occasioned by the deposit of moisture in his bed-place; and here we may mention another instance of the equality of the dangers shared by all—that from the situation of the officers' bed-places, moisture and ice accumulated much more rapidly in them than in those of the men. The means adopted for the recovery of the gunner will afford a good hint to voyagers, and even to those

'Gentlemen of England, who live at home at ease,

'And little think upon the dangers of the sea.'

Every attention was paid to Mr. Scallion's case by the medical gentlemen, and all our anti-scorbutics were put in requisition for his recovery: these consisted principally of preserved vegetables, soups, lemon juice and sugar, pickles, preserved currants and gooseberries, and spruce-beer. I began also, about this time, to raise a small quantity of mustard and cress in my cabin, in small shallow boxes filled with mould, and placing the stove-pipe; by these means, even in the severity of the winter, we could generally ensure a crop at the end of the sixth or seventh day after sowing the seed, which, by keeping several boxes at work, would give to two or three scorbutic patients nearly an ounce of salad each daily, even though the necessary economy in our coals did not allow of the fire being kept in at night. Had this been allowable, and a proper apparatus at hand for the purpose, there is no doubt that it might have been raised much more rapidly; and those who are aware how perfect a specific a very small quantity of fresh vegetable substance is for the scurvy, will, perhaps, agree with me in thinking that such an apparatus would form a very valuable appendage to be applied occasionally to the cabin-stove. The mustard and cress thus raised were necessarily colourless, from the privation of light, but, as far as we could judge, they possessed the same pungent aromatic taste as if grown under ordinary circumstances. So effectual were these remedies in Mr. Scallion's case, that, on the ninth evening from the attack, he was able to walk about on the lower deck for some time, and he assured me that he could then "run a race."

On the morning of the 1st of January, a halo, whose radius was $22^{\circ} 30'$, with three paraselenae, which were very luminous, but not tinged with the prismatic colours was seen about the moon; and, on the following day, the same phenomenon occurred, with the addition of a vertical stripe of white light proceeding from the upper and lower limbs of the moon, and forming, with part of the horizontal circle, the appearance of a cross; and a few days after, the aurora borealis was seen; but neither the magnetic needle nor the gold leaf of the electrometer were in the slightest degree affected by it.

Captain Parry and his crew did not experience those effects from the cold, even when 49° degree below zero, which preceding voyagers have stated: such as, the dreadful sensation said to be produced on the lungs, when the air is inhaled at a very low temperature; or the vapour with which an inhabited room is charged, condensing into a shower of snow, immediately on the opening of a door or window. He says—

'This goes much beyond any thing that we had an opportunity of observing. What happened with us was simply this: on the opening of the doors at the top and bottom of our hatchway ladders, the vapour was immediately condensed by the sudden admission of the cold air, into a visible form, exactly resembling a very thick smoke, which settled on all the panels of the doors and bulk-heads, and immediately froze, by which means the latter were covered with a thick coating of ice, which it was necessary frequently to scrape off; but we never, to my knowledge, witnessed the conversion of the vapour into snow, during its fall.'

The distance at which sounds were heard in the open air, during the continuance of intense cold, seems almost incredible. Captain Parry says, people have been distinctly heard conversing in a common tone of voice at the distance of a mile; and he 'heard a man singing to himself, as he walked along the beach, at even a greater distance than this.' Another circumstance occurred scarcely less curious: the smell of smoke was felt so strong at a distance of two miles, leeward of the ships, that it impeded the breathing. This shews what a distance the smoke was carried horizontally, owing to the difficulty with which it rises at a very low temperature of the atmosphere. On the 15th of February the thermometer was at 55° below zero. This was the most severe cold during their stay in Winter Harbour; and, although the officers amused themselves with freezing mercury and beating it out on an anvil, (such was the intensity of the cold) yet 'not the slightest inconvenience was suffered from exposure to the open air, by a person well clothed, as long as the weather was perfectly calm; but in walking against a very light wind, a smarting sensation was experienced all over the face, accompanied by a pain in the middle of the forehead, which soon became rather severe.' As a specimen of the average proportion of ice, formed in the harbour, from September to March, it is stated that where the depth of water was four fathoms and a quarter, the ice was found to be six feet and a half thick, and the snow on the surface eight inches deep. We have already stated, that some of the crew were absent for four days from the ships, having rambled to a considerable distance, and lost their way. Peter Fisher, a seaman of the Griper, was of the party, and had scratched on a stone the initials of his name. Of this seaman there is an interesting anecdote:—

'When Mr. Fife and his party returned from that excursion, it was a matter of surprise to us, to see how fresh Fisher was, and how little he seemed to regard what had happened, as any thing out of the common way, of which, indeed, the circumstance just related, is also a proof. When asked, on his first arrival on board, at that occasion, what they had lived upon, "lived upon," said Fisher, dryly, "the Duke of Wellington never lived so well. We had grouse for breakfast, grouse for dinner, and grouse for supper, to be sure!"

On the 12th of May, some ptarmigans were seen, which were hailed as a sure omen of returning summer. Several men went out on shooting excursions, and being exposed for several hours to the glare of the sun and snow, became affected with that painful inflammation in the eyes, called in America snow-blindness:—

'This complaint, of which the sensation exactly resembles that produced by large particles of sand or dust in the eyes, is cured by some tribes of American Indians, by holding them over the steam of warm water; but we found a cooling wash, made of a small quantity of acetate of lead mixed with cold water, more efficacious in relieving the irritation, which was always done in three or four days, even in the most severe cases, provided the eyes were carefully guarded from the light. As a preventive of this complaint, a piece of black crape was given to each man, to be worn as a kind of short veil attached to the hat, which we found to be very serviceable; a still more convenient mode, adopted by some of the officers, was found equally efficacious; this consisted in taking the glasses out of a pair of spectacles, and substituting black or green crape, the glass having been found to heat the eyes and increase the irritation.'

On the 17th of May, the operation of cutting the ice round the Hecla was completed, and the ships were once more fairly afloat. This was performed in the following manner:—

'The ice alongside the ships was found to be six feet thick, being about eighteen inches less than the average thickness of it in Winter Harbour, owing principally to our having continued to cut it round the ships for some time after the commencement of the winter, and in part, perhaps, to the snow with which it had there been thickly covered. We began by digging a large hole under the stern, being the same as that in which the tide-pole was placed, in order to enter the saw, which occupied us nearly two days, only a small number of men being able to work at it. In the mean time, all the snow and rubbish was cleared away from the ship's side, leaving only the solid ice to work upon; and a trench, two feet wide, was cut the whole length of the starboard side, from the stem to the rudder, keeping within an inch or two of the bends, and taking care here and there to leave a dike, to prevent the water which might ooze into one part from filling up the others in which the men were working. In this manner was the trench cut with axes, to the depth of about four feet and a half, leaving only eighteen inches for the saws to cut, except in those places where the dikes remained. The saw being then entered in the hole under the stern, was worked in the usual manner, being suspended by a triangle made of three spars; one cut being made on the outer part of the trench, and a second within an inch or two of the bends, in order to avoid injuring the planks. A small portion of ice being broken off now and then by bars, handspikes, and ice-chisels, floated to the surface, and was hooked out by piecemeal. This operation was a cold and tedious one, and required nine days to complete it. When the workmen had this morning completed the trench within ten or twelve feet of the stern, the ship suddenly disengaged herself from the ice to which she had before been firmly adhering on the larboard side, and rose in the water about ten inches abaft, and nearly eighteen inches forward, with a considerable surge. This disengagement, to which the sailors naturally applied the term "launching," confirmed my supposition, that the ship was held so fast by the ice, as to make it dangerous to alter materially the stowage of the holds, but in a manner the very reverse of what I had apprehended.'

In the beginning of June, Captain Parry, accompanied by a party of officers and men, set out on a journey across Melville Island, to the northern shore; and they returned to the ships by a different route, on the 15th. The island was thus very satisfactorily explored. The journey was, however, unproductive; the soil is generally barren, though, in some places, rich and abounding with the finest moss. Vegetation only exists in some places, and the botanical collections were very limited. Game was more abundant near the sea than inland. The tracks of deer and musk oxen were numerous and recent; and one deer followed the party for some time, and gambolled around them at a distance of only thirty yards. On the 13th of June—

'The sportsmen went out early in the morning, and soon after met with a musk-ox feeding on a spot of luxuriant pasture-ground, covered with the dung of these animals, as well as of deer. They fired at him from a considerable distance, without wounding him, and he set off at a very quick pace over the hills. The musk-ox has the appearance of a very ill-proportioned little animal, its hair being so long as to make its feet appear only two or three inches in length; it seems, indeed, to be treading upon it at every step, and the individual in question actually did so in some instances, as the hair was found in several of the foot-tracks. When disturbed and hunted, they frequently tore up the ground with their horns, and turned round occasionally to look at their pursuers, but they never attempted to attack any of them. Our gentlemen also met with a herd of twelve deer, three only of which had horns, and they were much the largest of the herd, and constantly drove the others away when they attempted to stop. The birds seen by our people were many Brent-geese and ptarmigans, several golden plovers, one or two "boatwains" (Lestris Parastictus), and abundance of snow-buntings. One or two mice (Mus Hudsonius) were caught; like several others we had seen, these were turning brown about the belly and head, and the back was of a dark grey colour. In every part of the island over which we travelled, the holes and tracks of these little animals were occasionally seen; one of them, which Sergeant Martin ran after, finding no hole near, and that he could not escape, set himself against a stone, as if endeavouring to defend himself, and bit the sergeant's finger when he took hold of him.'

As the weather got warmer, the crews were enabled to procure a good supply of sorrel, which grew very rapidly near Winter Harbour; the sportsmen began to be successful, and a tolerable quantity of fresh provisions were thus procured. The total quantity obtained for the use of the expedition, during their stay upon the shores of Melville Island, nearly a period of twelve months, was as follows:—three musk-oxen, 24 deer, 68 hares, 63 geese, 59 ducks, and 144 ptarmigans, affording, in the whole, 3766 pounds of meat.

The North Georgia Gazette, and Winter Chronicle. 4to. pp. 132. London, 1821.

This work furnishes a pleasing instance of the amiable character of the commander of the late expedition, and of the good nature and social cheerfulness which must have reigned among his little band of adventurers under circumstances so novel and appalling as they had to encounter. To relieve the tedium of a winter passed in the arctic seas, and to keep alive the enthusiastic spirit of the crews, the officers adopted two expedients: those of opening a theatre and commencing a weekly newspaper, to be furnished with original contributions only. The management of the theatre was confided to Lieutenant Beechey, who painted the scenery; and Captain Sabine undertook the charge of editing the paper. In the proposals, it was recommended that an anonymous signature should be affixed to each communication, and that the handwriting should be effectually disguised, to ensure the most rigid impartiality in judging and selecting the articles for insertion. The editor's letter-box was placed on the capstan of the Hecla, and the first number of the North Georgia Gazette was published November 1, 1819, and the work reached to twenty-one numbers. The whole of these are now republished, and no alteration has been attempted in the respective papers in preparing them for the press. They consist of letters, poems, dramatic critiques, and other light effusions, all relating to the events of the day. They must be severe censurers, indeed, who would subject a work written under such circumstances, to the test of rigid criticism. Some of the poetical pieces, however, possess considerable merit, and prove that even an arctic winter cannot chill true genius. We shall quote one or two of these pieces without further comment:—

‘ADDRESS

On the Opening of the Theatre Royal, North Georgia, written and spoken by Mr. Wakeham.

Rome's form was triumphant in the field,
Where rescue'd Europe's destiny was seal'd;
No foe to combat on the rolling wave,
No injur'd monarch that her sword might save,
'Twas still our much-lov'd country's glorious claim

To stand pre-eminent, unmatch'd in fame,
And in the paths of science yet to find
The liberal plan to benefit mankind.
Far in the north an unknown region lay,
Where growing ice congeal'd the liquid way;
Yet here it seem'd Columbia's bending shore,
Stretch'd westward, heard Pacific Ocean's roar.
Full oft in earlier days had Britons tried
To force a passage through the arrested tide,
But tried in vain, tho' with intrepid skill
Persisting long, in spite of every ill.

By happier fortune led, 'twas ours to prove
Thus far, uncheck'd by land, the waters rove,
And ice-encumber'd here to win our way
'Mid the long sunshine of an arctic day.
But now for coming storms and frigid air,
Approaching winter bids us well prepare:
The sun retiring, scarce illumines the sky;
Swift driving snows in circling eddies fly,
And soon no gladd'ning ray shall gild our noon,
But from the radiant stars, or changing moon.

While thus inactive we are doom'd to stay,
To cheer the lagg'ring hours—behold a play.
And tho' we boast not power by scenic art
To warm the passions or affect the heart,

Yet here secure we tread—no critic's eye
Is bent, with eager gaze, each fault to spy;
Amusement all our aim, if that succeed,
Our wish is gain'd—nor ask we other meed.
But, when emerging from stern Winter's tomb,
Reviving Spring shall chase the dreary gloom,
And genial warmth, expanding o'er the plain,
Four melting snows in torrents to the main,
When rustling winds, with all resistless sweep,
Unlock the fetter'd surface of the deep—

Then with new ardour will we onward hie,
To seek a passage 'neath this polar sky;
Firm in our leaders' care, who still have shown
The great resolve, the daring deed their own.
Nor—if that Power, whose providential sway
The burning suns and meander oceans obey,
Approving smile—will we the task give o'er
Till bold surges round our vessels roar;
Then, with glad sails we'll plough the foaming seas,

Delighted, list'ning to the swelling breeze

That swift impels us to Britannia's shore,
To love, to friendship, and our homes once more.*

There is great beauty as well as much true poetry in the following lines, which are anonymous:—

* Lines suggested by the Brilliant Aurora,
Jan. 15, 1820.

'High quiv'ring in the air, as shadows fly,
The northern lights adorn the azure sky.
Dimm'd by superior blaze, the stars retire,
And heav'n's vast concave gleams with sportive fire.

Soft blazing in the east, the orange hue,
The crimson, purple, and ethereal blue,
Form a rich arch, by floating clouds upheld,
High poised in air, with awful mystery swell'd;
From whose dark centres, with unceasing roll
Rich consecrations gild the glowing pole.

Their varied hues, slow waving o'er the bay,
Eclipse the splendor of the dawning day;
Streamers in quick succession o'er the sky
From the arc's centre far diverging fly;
Pencils of rays, pure as the heaven's own light,
Dart rapid upward to the zenith's height.

Transfix'd with wonder on the frozen flood,
The blaze of grandeur fired my youthful blood;
Deep in th' overwhelming maze of Nature's laws,
'Midst her mysterious gloom, I sought the cause;

But vain the search! inscrutable to man
Thy works have been, O God! since time began,
And still shall be—Then let the thought expire;

As late the splendours of Aurora's fire
To dark oblivion sank, in wasting flame;
Like the dim shadows of departed fame!'

Of the articles in prose, we cannot speak so highly, though some of them are not destitute of merit. There is, among other articles of intelligence, such as deaths, accidents, and offences, &c. a 'Law Report in the Court of Common Sense, in the cause of Editor v. Non-Contributors.' Counsellor, Puzzlewell produces affidavits from several of the defendants; one, that of 'Simon Sidroppe!,' we quote:—

'This deponent maketh oath and saith, that being from the beginning extremely desirous to contribute towards the support of The Winter Chronicle, he was determined to search the heavens and the earth for a subject; and, therefore, betook himself to the study of the globes, in hopes of there stumbling upon something suitable to his purpose. The deponent devoted his first attention to the celestial globe, and earnestly invoked the assistance of every constellation thereupon delineated, but without success. The Great Bear treated him in a manner too rude to be repeated, and the Little Bear (like a dutiful cub) followed his example. Taurus tossed him, Aries butted him, and he was thus left sprawling between Castor and Pollux. This malicious pair of rogues pretending friendship, led the deponent on imperceptibly, till he found himself in the claws of Cancer, who pinched him most unmercifully, and determined him to have nothing more to do with the constellations of the Zodiac. Pegasus was the next which appeared, and the deponent, without more ado, resolved to mount him, and at once to enrich the Chronicle by a ride to Parnassus—but this attempt had near cost him his life, for he had scarcely mounted, when Pegasus threw him clean over his head, and dislocated his right shoulder. The deponent being thus scurvily treated in his flight among the stars, had nothing left for it but to return to the earth. Here he may be said to have traversed the terraqueous globe in search of a subject, but none has yet offered itself. The deponent having made this declaration, leaveth his case to the justice and clemency of the court, conscious that though his name has never yet appeared in the paper, not one of the contributors has ever gone farther than himself, in search of matter for its support.'

The following extracts are not without point:—

'Hostilities in the North.—General Frost continues to prosecute the siege of Fort Nature with every demonstration of vigour. The approaches have been pushed to the foot of the Glacis and some horn-works which covered it destroyed, but the defences of the body of the place are yet so numerous, that it is considered impossible to effect a breach, and the unrelenting vigilance of the garrison precludes all hope of starving them; but various sallies have taken place, and many of the defenders have fallen; on the other hand, masses of the general's troops are almost daily captured, and those who escape the steel are given over to the flames.'

'The Army of Observation † has been a particular object of attack, but the only advantages which have as yet resulted, are the burning of one or two of the bridges of communication, whose defence had not been properly attended to. The general's opponents are, however, not idle, and his posts are incessantly annoyed by red hot shot ‡. Skirmishes happen every day, and frequent enterprises are attempted by the besiegers, but they are generally defeated with loss, although it is said, that affairs have occurred, in which they have actually surprised their foes in bed.

'Stratagem forms, apparently, a favourite part of the general's system, as a relation of his, with several adherents, were lately found concealed in the water-casks, and at present remain in "durance vile."

'On a recent occasion, this officer is reported to have displayed a degree of coolness never before witnessed, which had the effect of imparting surprising firmness to his troops. It is truly remarkable, that though these troops await the charge perfectly immovable, they drop off with great celerity when exposed to a lively fire. The general's forces are expected to be entirely broken early in the summer, and preparations are making for a vigorous pursuit; of the entire success of which, the most sanguine hopes are entertained.

'The commander exclaim'd, "What a fine thing is peas,

For making a fire and giving out heat;"

"That's true," replied Furelad, who by it was seated,

"I strongly advise you to have it re-peated."

The plays were performed once a fortnight by the officers. The stock of dramatic productions was very limited; so that they could only perform 'Miss in her Teens, The Liar, The Citizen, A Bold Stroke for a Wife, and The Mayor of Garratt,' until a new musical entertainment was produced, entitled the North West Passage, or the Voyage Finished. This piece was in five acts, and traced the progress of the expedition, in anticipation, from Winter Harbour, through the passage to Behring's Straits, and thence home to Deptford, when the sailors, assembling at the Prince of Wales public-house, are joined by their sweethearts, to whom they recount their difficulties and good fortune. This was a great favourite with the crews, and we cannot but admire the philosophy of the officers who could perform this and the other farces at the time that the thermometer was twelve degrees below zero on the stage!

This work, though curious, is scarcely of sufficient importance for a distinct publication; but, from the nature of Captain Parry's narrative, it could not have been admitted there except as an Appendix, which it must now be considered, though rather a more expensive one than we could have wished.

Annals of the Coinage of Britain and its Dependencies. By the Rev. R. Ruding.

DURING the whole of the reign of George I., the money was of the same species and value as that of Queen

Anne, but, to his style upon the reverse, were added his German titles, with FIDEI DEFENSOR, which then, for the first time, appeared upon the coins, although it had been constantly used in the style of our monarchs from Henry VIII., on whom it was conferred by Pope Leo X., in the year 1521. In 1718, a new species of money was coined, called a Quarter-Guinea, being the fourth part of a guinea in value, and bearing the same impression. A proclamation was also issued, which enforced the provisions of a former decree, that no gold or silver money should be paid without weighing it, and making an allowance for any deficiency of weight.

The want of small money in Ireland was so great in 1722, that the manufacturers were compelled to pay their men with tallies, or tokens of card, signed upon the back, to be afterwards exchanged for money. In order to supply this want, a patent for fourteen years was granted to William Wood, Esq. for coining halfpence and farthings in that kingdom, to the extent of three hundred and sixty tons. This measure was attacked with great, and, as Mr. Ruding clearly shews, with unjust severity, by Dean Swift, not only in the celebrated Draper's Letters, but he also preached two sermons on the subject. It appears, that Ireland would have sustained a loss of 80,000l. or about 6000l. a-year, if Wood had coined the whole quantity allowed by his patent, according to the lightest of those halfpence which he had sent over to Ireland; but it is proved, from Sir Isaac Newton's report of the assay of these coins, that some of them actually exceeded in weight the terms of the patent; and that, although they were of unequal size, yet, one piece with another, they were of full weight, and better copper money than had been coined for Ireland in the reigns of Charles II., James II., and William and Mary.

Of these facts, Swift was not ignorant, but he revenged the neglect of the administration, by attacking it through Wood's halfpence, which he rendered so unpopular, that the patent was relinquished. Among other misrepresentations, Swift calls Wood a mean ordinary man, a hardware dealer, when, in fact, he was a great proprietor and renter of iron and copper-works in England, and had a lease of all the mines on the crown lands, in thirty-nine counties.

When a reward was offered for the discovery of the author of the Draper's Fourth Letter, a note was sent to Swift, with the following text, from 1 Samuel, chap. xiv. ver. 45:—"And the people said unto Saul, shall Jonathan die, who hath wrought this great salvation in Israel? God forbid. As the Lord liveth, there shall not one hair of his head fall to the ground; for he wrought with God this day. So the people rescued Jonathan, that he died not." It was said to be written by a Quaker.

Although Swift denied that there had been any want of small change in Ireland, yet no sooner were Wood's halfpence withdrawn, than the want was so great, that, in 1728, local tokens were struck in several towns in the north of Ireland.

In the reign of George II., the gold coins were often reduced in their size, by unprincipled men, who filed to the amount of nine or twelve grains from the edge of each guinea. This was afterwards prevented, by adopting the suggestion of the Rev. Peter Vallavine, Vicar of Monkton, in the Isle of Thanet, which was to place the letters as near the edge of the coin as possible; the laws, in regard to uttering counterfeit money, were made more severe; and increased rewards offered for the apprehension of offenders. No alteration was made in the style upon the coins during this reign.

At the accession of George III., the coinage was found to be in a very imperfect state. The crown pieces had almost wholly disappeared; the half-crowns were defaced and impaired, and the shillings and sixpences had lost almost every mark of impression, either on the obverse or reverse. A coinage of gold took place in 1760, and one of silver, though to a very small extent, in 1763. Notwithstanding new and more severe enactments, the coinage became worse and worse, the gold was deficient in weight, and three-fourths of the silver in circulation was counterfeit. This, indeed, continued to be, in a great measure, the case during the whole reign, until the coinage in 1816.

The striking of provincial coins and tradesmen's tokens, which was suggested, and in some degree justified, by the disgraceful state of the copper coinage, began with the Anglesey penny, in 1784, and from that time, increased rapidly, until they were superseded by an issue of lawful coins in the year 1797. The coinage transactions of this year form a strange anomaly in the history of the mint. The deficiency of the silver coins was attempted to be supplied by the issue of Spanish dollars, countermarked upon the neck of the bust, with the mark of the king's head, used at Goldsmith's Hall; and the jealousy which had hitherto confined the art of coinage within the walls of some place under his majesty's jurisdiction, was now so completely lulled asleep, that a contract was entered into with Mr. Boulton, of Soho, near Birmingham, for the coinage of five hundred tons of copper-money, in pence only; this was afterwards followed by a coinage of two-penny pieces, halfpence, and farthings.

On the union of Great Britain and Ireland, in 1801, it was declared, that from henceforth, his majesty's royal style and title should be GEORGIUS TERTIUS, DEI GRATIA BRITANNIARUM REX FIDELI DEFENSOR. In 1804, it having been discovered, that the stamp upon the dollars had been frequently counterfeited, the old dollar was re-stamped at Mr. Boulton's manufactory, with his majesty's head and an inscription on the obverse, and Britannia on the reverse; these were made current at five shillings, and were a sort of token issued by the Bank of England. In 1811, they were raised to five shillings and sixpence, and the Bank issued tokens of three shillings, and of one shilling and sixpence value. All these have been called in, and are no longer current.

In February, 1817, an extensive silver coinage was issued and exchanged for the wretched silver money then current: All English shillings and sixpences, however plain, were taken by the Bank of England, and at the places appointed in various parts of the metropolis for issuing the new money.

In the same year, a new gold coin was issued, the Sovereign, which, however, never obtained much circulation; but now the Bank has resumed cash payments, we begin to see them pretty plentiful. Half sovereigns were also coined a few months afterwards. Upwards of five millions of sovereigns, three millions of half-sovereigns, and fifty millions of shillings, and thirty millions of sixpences, had been coined up to June, 1818. A coinage of new crown pieces also took place in that year.

Having now given a rapid sketch of the British coinage, from the earliest period of its history to the year 1818, we shall not extend our remarks further, than by noticing a subject to which we alluded in the outset—that fundamental error that has pervaded the whole system of the coinage, and vitiating every proceeding under it—the mistaken notion that pains and penalties can be devised more powerful in their effect than the temptations of avarice. On this subject, Mr. Ruding shows clearly, how insufficient the terror of punishment is, when the crime is so lucrative and so easily committed; and he offers, as the only means of preventing the crime, the following suggestions:—

'The theory of coinage must be simplified, by casting out of it the consideration of the manner in which our money will be received by the neighbouring nations. For they will take it only as bullion, and if the balance of trade be against us, and must be made good by gold and silver, it is most expedient that it should be done by the plain metal, which will cost nothing in the coinage.

'The theory, thus simplified, will regard only the convenience of the subjects of that monarch by whom the money is struck; and therefore, in our case, the sole consideration will be, whether we will receive the coins at such a weight as the highest price which bullion has ever attained will allow, or whether we will be contented with a scarcity of gold, with adulterated silver and copper, and the miserable expedient of filling up the void, either with tokens, or with paper money of any man's issuing, who can find credit sufficient to force it into currency.

'If we are, as unquestionably we with justice may be, dissatisfied with that compound medium which is now in circulation, the remedy seems to be of no difficult attainment.

'Let the weight of the coins be so reduced as to prevent their being affected by variations in the price of bullion; and let the workmanship of them be of the most exquisite kind that the artists of this country can effect. By these means, the destruction of the money by melting will be prevented, and the possibility of counterfeiting will be confined to workmen of the highest order, who will rarely be tempted to fraud by the pressure of want.

'Let the standard of fineness be continued as heretofore; because few persons are able to judge with accuracy of the nature of the alloy; but every man can weigh the coins, and therefore the diminution in that respect, will be open to the examination of all.

'Let the money be made smaller in diameter, and of greater thickness than it is at present, in order to allow higher relief to the impression, and to prevent the loss of weight by wearing, which is, in a great degree, according to the extent of surface. This will also allow the edges to be defended by the impression of a legend.

'Let the proportionate value of gold and silver to each other be accurately adjusted, that the over-rating of one may not produce the destruction of the other.

'And let the quantity of the various metals to be coined be regulated, according to the nature of the exchanges which are most commonly effected. These, from the increase of wealth amongst us, will require that the gold should form the principal part of the coinage, and that the silver and copper should be considered only as aliquot parts, or as fractions, of it.

'If this plan, or something equivalent to it, cannot be adopted, the coinage of gold and silver must be altogether abandoned, and those metals must circulate, as they do in China, by weight.

'But surely the time is not yet come, when it will be necessary, or even expedient, to make so near an approach to the barbarism of simple barter. The good sense of the people will feel the propriety of regulating the weight of the money, according to the increased value of the precious metals; and they will readily agree to a diminution of weight, proportioned to the security which they will receive against the imposition of counterfeits.

'One thing alone will then be wanting to the perfection of the coinage, and that is, the superseding of heraldic ensigns, by reverses allusive to public events, according to the proposal of Dean Swift, in the reign of Queen Anne, which has been already mentioned, but is in my mind of so great importance, that I do not scruple to repeat it.

'By this means, medals, that are at present only a dead treasure, or mere curiosities, will be of use in the ordinary commerce of life, and, at the same time, perpetuate the glories of the monarch's reign, reward the labours of his greatest subjects, keep alive in the people a gratitude for public services, and excite the emulation of posterity. To these generous purposes, nothing can so much contribute as medals of this kind, which are of undoubted authority, of necessary use and observation, not perishable by time, nor confined to any certain place; properties not to be found in books, statues, pictures, buildings, or any other monuments of illustrious actions."

'I would not, however, limit the reverses to the sole recording of what are commonly understood to be illustrious actions, but would extend their province so as to comprehend all remarkable discoveries in manufactures, commerce, art, or science, or, in short, to whatever tends to promote the perfection and happiness of man."

Although Mr. Ruding did not live to reap that rich reward of fame, which a work like his Annals of the Coinage must have insured him, yet it will remain an imperishable monument of his indefatigable zeal, talents, and industry. The quarto volume of plates contains well executed engravings of all the British coins that are known, and presents, at one view, the progress of the coinage of the kingdom, from its rudest form, with all the alterations that it has undergone.

Memoirs of the Secret Societies of the South of Italy, particularly the Carbonari.

IN the early period of the reign of Murat, his suspicions were excited against the Carbonari, and he began to hate and persecute them. He also prevailed on the Pope to issue an edict against freemasons and secret societies, in 1814. The Carbonari, kept under by an active system of police, only began to put their doctrines in practice when Murat's power began to totter; and when, in 1815, the Austrian army advanced on Naples, they chose that moment for revenge, and joined the cause of King Ferdinand. On this occasion, the Carbonari made a momentary junction with the Calderari (Brazieri), a society that had been organized to counteract the power of the Carbonari.

In 1817, the government of Naples began to be alarmed at the operation of this sect, as manifestoes were distributed in all directions by its means, calling on the king to give a constitution to his people, as he had promised. Severe measures were threatened, but not carried into effect, and the operations of the Carbonari were for a time suspended. The sect continued to increase daily throughout the kingdom. In the city of Naples, there were upwards of three hundred and forty lodges. The Capri line of battle ships alone contained three. In March, 1820, the number of Carbonari enrolled, amounted to six hundred and forty-two thousand.

The persons who, from the beginning, have directed the labours of the Carbonari towards a political and constitutional object, have always been few in number. The impulse once given and received, they voluntarily withdrew behind the scenes, and have been forgotten. Of these, the Canonico Menecchini, at Nola, was one of the most popular. He was appointed one of the members of the Committee of Public Safety, in the late revolution, and twice served the cause of humanity; first, by calming the enraged populace assembled before the royal palace, at the time of the massacre of the Neapolitans; and afterwards by dissuading the resentment of the ferocious Carbonari, in the field of Mars, when they threatened the lives of the Ex-ministers, Medici and Tommacci. But the reputation of Menecchini soon declined, and he set out for Messina, to organize Carbonarism in Sicily.

It was long imagined, that the Po was the boundary line of the sect in Italy; but this is a mistaken notion, as its principles, under different forms, are very widely diffused. It has been questioned, whether the Neapolitan Carbonari aim at a republic, or would be contented with a constitutional monarchy. The author of these memoirs proves, by the publications of the Carbonari, that nothing short of a republic would satisfy them. Their hatred to kings, who are invariably called tyrants, appears in their proclamations, their oaths, and their songs. The lyrical motto, which decorates the title page of the Constitution of the Lucanian republic, is as follows:—

'Thy plant will strike its roots alone
'Midst fragments of a shattered throne;
Nor freshest dew its leaves may nourish,
'Tis regal blood must make it flourish.'

The Western Lucanian Republic is more crafty in the pursuit of its object, and conceals it better. It sometimes assumes the credit of wishing to support the constitution, and states its intentions mildly, though its ultimate object is that of republicanism. This society, which is said once to have amounted to one million, cannot, however, have been very unanimous or determined; for, if the late revolution in Naples had been so popular as it was said to be, a million of Carbonari, to whom blood and carnage has no horrors, would not have tamely submitted to the yoke of Austria, without making a single effort for independence. The author of these Memoirs, in conclusion, says, that the society is daily losing ground by its imprudence, and that, as the curiosity of its members is no longer excited by an unknown object, their zeal is no longer kept alive by mystery.

As a supplement to these Memoirs, the author has given a particular account of General Church's campaign against the brigands of Calabria and the Abruzzi, in 1817. One of the most celebrated leaders of those lands was the Priest Ciro Annichiarico, who, driven from society for his crimes, took refuge in the mountain forests, and having collected a band of desperate outlaws, long carried on his depredations unmolested. Of this prince of freebooters, we have an interesting account:—

'Ciro Annichiarico, born of parents in easy circumstances, in the little town of Grottaglie, was destined to the ecclesiastical profession, and entertained it very young. His brothers are respectable farmers; his uncle, the Canonico Patituro, is a man of learning and information, and never took any part in the crimes of his nephew. The latter began his infamous career by killing a young man of the Motelesi family, in a fit of jealousy. His insatiable hatred pursued every member of the family, and exterminated them one after the other, with the exception of a single individual, who succeeded in evading his search, and who lived shut up in his house for several years, without ever daring to go out. This unfortunate being thought that a snare was laid for him when people came to tell him of the imprisonment, and shortly after of the death of his enemy; and it was with difficulty that he was induced to quit his retreat.

'Ciro, condemned for the murder of the Motelesi, to fifteen years of chains, or exile, by the tribunal of Lecce, remained there in prison four years, at the end of which time he succeeded in escaping. It was then that he began, and afterwards continued for several years, to lead a vagabond life, which was stained with the most atrocious crimes. At Martano, he penetrated with his satellites into one of the first houses of the place, and, after having offered violence to its mistress, he massacred her with all her people, and carried off ninety-six thousand ducats.

'He was in correspondence with all the hired brigands; and whoever wished to get rid of an enemy, had only to address himself to Ciro. On being asked by Captain Montorj, reporter of the military commission which condemned him, how many persons he had killed with his own hand, he carelessly answered, "E chi lo sa? saranno fra sessanta e settanta." Who can remember? they will be between sixty and seventy. One of his companions, Occhiolupo, confessed to seventeen; the two brothers, Francesco and Vito Serio, to twenty-three; so that these four ruffians alone had assassinated upwards of a hundred!

'The activity of Ciro was as astonishing as his artifice and intrepidity. He handled the musket and managed the horse to perfection; and as he was always extremely well mounted, found concealment and support, either through fear or inclination, every where. He succeeded in escaping from the hands of the soldiers, by forced marches of thirty and forty miles, even when confidential spies had discovered his place of concealment but a few hours before. The singular good fortune of being able to extricate himself from the most imminent dangers, acquired for him the reputation of a necromancer, upon whom ordinary means of attack had no power among the people, and he neglected nothing which could confirm this idea, and increase the sort of spell it produced upon the peasants. They dared not excrete, or even blame him in his absence, so firmly were they persuaded that his demons would immediately inform him of it. On the other hand, again, he affected a libertine character; some very fine French songs were found in his portfolio when he was arrested. Although a priest himself, and exercising the functions of one when he thought it expedient, he often declared his colleagues to be impostors without any faith. He published a paper against the missionaries, who, according to him, disseminated illiberal opinions among the people, and forbade them on pain of death to preach in the villages, "because, instead of the true principles of the Gospel, they taught nothing but fables and impostures." This paper is headed, "In nome della Grande Assemblea Nazionale dell' Ex-Regno di Napoli, o piuttosto dell' Europa intera, pace e salute."—"In the name of the Great National Assembly of the Ex-Kingdom of Naples, or rather of all Europe, peace and health."

He amused himself sometimes with whims, to which he tried to give an air of generosity. General d'Ottavio, a Corsican in the service of Murat, pursued him for a long time with a thousand men. One day, Ciro, armed at all points, surprised him walking in a garden. He discovered himself, remarking that the life of the general was in his hands; "but," said he, "I will pardon you this time, although I shall no longer be so indulgent, if you continue to hunt me about with such fury." So saying, he leaped over the garden wall and disappeared.

Having hidden himself, with several of his people, behind a ruined wall at the entrance gate of Grottaglie, the day when General Church and the Duke of San Cesario, accompanied by some horsemen, reconnoitred the place, he did not fire upon them; he wished to make a merit of this before the military commission, but it was probably the fear of not being able to escape from the troops who followed the general, that made him circumspect on this occasion.

Ciro's physiognomy had nothing repulsive about it; it was rather agreeable. He had a verbose, but persuasive eloquence, and was fond of inflated phrases. Extremely addicted to women, he had mistresses, at the period of his power, in all the towns of the province over which he was constantly ranging. He was of middle stature, well made, and very strong.

Ciro put himself at the head of the Patrioti Europei and Decisi, two associations of the most desperate character. The institution of the Decisi, or Decided, is so horrible, that it makes one shudder to contemplate it. The author has given a fac-simile of their patent, which will give some idea of the society. The following is the translation:—

'The Salentine Decision.

'Health.

'No. 5. Grand Massons.

'The Decision of Jupiter the Thunderer hopes to make war against the tyrants of the universe, &c. &c.

'The mortal Gaetano Caffieri is a Brother Decided, No. 5, belonging to the Decision of Jupiter the Thunderer, spread over the face of the earth, by his Decision, has had the pleasure to belong to this Salentine Republican Decision. We, invite, therefore, all philanthropic societies to lend their strong arm to the same, and to assist him in his wants, he having come to the decision that he will obtain liberty or death. Dated this day, the 29th of October, 1817.

Signed,

Pietro Gargaro (the Decided Grand Master, No. 1.)

Vito de Serio, Second Decided.

Gaetano Caffieri,

Registrar of the Dead.

'As the number of these Decided ruffians was small, they easily recognized each other. We find that the Grand Master bears the No. 1; Vito de Serio, No. 2; the proprietor of the patent, Gaetano Caffieri, No. 5. He figures himself among the signatures with the title of Registrar of the Dead, which does not allude to the deceased members of the society, but to the victims they immolated, and of whom they kept a register apart, on the margin of which were found blasphemies and infernal projects. They had also a Director of Funeral Ceremonies, for they slaughtered with method and solemnity. As soon as the detachments employed on this service found it convenient to effect their purpose, at the signal of the first blast of a trumpet they unsheathed their poignards; they aimed them at their victim at the second blast; at the third, they gradually approach their weapons to his breast, "con vero entusiasmo" (with real enthusiasm), in their cannibal language, and plunged them into his body at the fourth signal.

'The four points which are observable after the signature of Pietro Gargaro, indicate his power of passing sentence of death. When the Decisi wrote to any one to extort contributions, or to command him to do any thing—if they added these four points, it was known that the person they addressed was condemned to death in case of disobedience. If the points were not added, he was threatened with milder punishment, such as laying waste his fields, or burning his house.

'The Salentine Republic, the ancient name of this district, was also that destined for their imaginary republic, which they called "un anello della Repubblica Europa," a link of the European Republic.

'The symbols of the thunderbolt darting from a cloud and striking the crowns and tiara; the fasces and the cap of liberty planted upon a death's head between two axes; the skulls and bones with the words, "Tristezza, Morte, Terrore, and Lutto," sadness, death, terror, and mourning, sufficiently characterise this association. Their colours were yellow, red, and blue, which surround the patent.'

With men linked by such ties, a person of Ciro's determined character was not to be put down easily; we therefore find him making the most desperate efforts in defending a farmhouse (Masseria), into which he had thrown himself:—

Worn out with fatigue, Ciro and three companions, Vito di Cesare, Giovanni Palmieri, and Michele Cuppoli, had taken refuge in Scaserba, to repose themselves for a few hours. He had previously provided this and all the farm-houses of the district with ammunition and some provisions. When he saw the militia of S. Marzano marching against him, he appeared very little alarmed, and thought he could easily cut his way through their ranks. He shot the first man dead who came within range of his musket. This delay cost him dear: the militia sent information to Lieutenant Fomaresco, stationed at the "Castello," a strong position between Grottaglie and Francavilla. This officer hastened to the spot with forty men. On seeing him approach, Ciro perceived that a vigorous attack was to be made. He shut up the people of the Masseria in the straw magazine, and put the key in his pocket. He took away the ladder from the tower, and loaded, with the aid of his companions, all the guns, of which he had a good number.

Major Bianchi, informed of what was going on, sent on the same evening a detachment of Gendarmes, under Captain Corsi, and the next morning proceeded in person to Scaserba. The siege was formed by one hundred and thirty-two soldiers; the militia, on which little dependence was placed, were stationed at some distance, and in the second line.

Ciro vigorously defended the approaches to his tower till sun-set. He attempted to escape in the night, but the neighing of a horse made him suspect that some cavalry had arrived, whose pursuit it would be impossible to elude. He retired, after having killed, with a pistol shot, a Voltigeur, stationed under the wall he had attempted to scale. He again shut himself up in his tower, and employed himself till morning in making cartridges. At day-break, the besiegers tried to burst open the wooden gate of the outer wall; Ciro and his men repulsed the assailants by a well-directed fire; they killed five and wounded fourteen men. A barrel of oil was brought, in order to burn the door. The first man who set fire to it was shot through the heart. A four pounder, which had been conveyed to the place, was pointed against the roof of the tower. Several of this calibre had been contrived to be easily dismounted from their carriages, and transported on mules. This little piece produced great effect. The tiles and bricks which fell, forced Ciro to descend from the second story to the first. He was tormented with a burning thirst, for he had forgotten to provide himself with water, and he never drank wine. This thirst soon became insupportable.

After some deliberations with his companions, he demanded to speak with General Church, who, he believed, was in the neighbourhood, then to the Duke of Jasi, who was also absent; at last, he resolved to capitulate with Major Bianchi. He addressed the besiegers, and threw them some bread. Major Bianchi promised him that he should not be maltreated by the soldiers. He descended the ladder, opened the door of the tower, and presented himself with the words, "Eccomi, Don Ciro!"—Here I am, Don Ciro!

He begged them to give him some water to quench his thirst, and desired them to liberate the farmer and his family, who had been shut up all this while in the straw magazine. He declared that they were innocent, and distributed money among them.

He suffered himself to be searched and bound patiently; some poison was found upon him; he asserted that his companions had prevented him from taking it. He conversed quietly enough with Major Bianchi on the road to Francavilla, and related to him the principal circumstances of his life.

In prison, he appeared to be interested for the fate of some of his partisans, begging that they might not be persecuted, and declaring that they had been forced to do what they had done.

He had entertained some hope, till the moment when he was placed before the Council of war, under the direction of Lieutenant-Colonel Guarini. He addressed a speech to him, taking him for General Church. He insisted on speaking to that officer; this was refused, and he resigned himself to his fate, dryly saying, "Ho capito." (I understand—).

When condemned to death, a missionary offered him the consolations of religion. Ciro answered him with a smile, "Lasciate queste chiacchiere; siamo dell'istessa professione; non ci burliamo fra noi."—Let us leave alone this prating; we are of the same profession; don't let us laugh at one another.

As he was led to execution, the 8th of February, 1818, he recognized Lieutenant Fomonte, and addressed these words to him, "Se io fossi Re, vi farei Capitano."—If I were King, I would make you a Captain. This officer was the first to arrive at Scersba with his soldiers.

The streets of Francavilla were filled with people; there were spectators even upon the roofs. They all preserved a gloomy silence.

On his arrival at the place of execution, Ciro wished to remain standing; he was told to kneel, he did so, presenting his breast. He was then informed, that malefactors, like himself, were shot with their backs towards the soldiers; he submitted, at the same time advising a priest, who persisted in remaining near him, to withdraw, so as not to expose himself.

Twenty-one balls took effect, four in the head, yet he still breathed and muttered in his throat; the twenty-second put an end to him. This fact is confirmed by all the officers and soldiers present at his death. "As soon as we perceived," said a soldier, very gravely, "that he was enchanted, we loaded his own musket with a silver ball, and this destroyed the spell." It will be easily supposed, that the people, who always attributed supernatural powers to him, were confirmed in their belief by this tenaciousness of life, which they considered miraculous.

Our readers will perceive, that this is a very curious and interesting volume, and that the author is well acquainted with the subject on which he writes. The facts are, however, stated in so desultory a manner, that it is difficult to form a connected narrative from them. The plates, which are in lithography, are numerous, and include several portraits; with fac-similes of the Patents of the different ranks of Carbonari, &c. The work exhibits a singular picture of the state of society in Naples, and, as containing details of one of the most remarkable institutions of modern times, will be read with great interest.

ON PLAGIARISM.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—Observing some observations in a contemporary literary journal, relative to the imitations, or plagiarisms, of Lord Byron, will you permit me to ask the author of those 'Rivers of Macedon and Monmouth,' whether he has ever read Virgil, or Tasso, or Spenser, or Milton, or Gray?—And if he should chance never to have heard of those transcendent writers, I presume to advise him to spare a few of his leisure hours to their perusal; and when he has done so, for every plagiarist of Lord Byron, that he has pointed out, I will undertake to point out forty in Virgil, thirty-five in Tasso, fifty in Spenser, and one hundred in Milton. A man of an enlarged mind, and of extensive reading, can no more trace the chronology of his thoughts, or know whence he has acquired the stores treasured in the precincts of his imagination, than the ocean can be presumed to know from what mountains the various rivers, which flow into it, derive their sources.

The charge of plagiarism has been brought against Lord Byron, evidently from malice.—But whether the charge be true or not, I will venture to assert, that there never was a GREAT poet, who did not cull flowers from every field within his reach.—To know diamonds when he sees them in the quarry; to polish them; and to set them in his own casket, is the very business of great poets. It is what little poets dare not do, and cannot do.—Their rivulets are easily formed:—to constitute great rivers, vast tracks of country, must contribute their supplies.—This subject is very well elucidated by the elegant author of the 'Beauties, Harmonies, and Sublimities of Nature,' an account of which you gave in one of your recent numbers. PROPOSALS FOR A NEW AND AMPLE MISSIONARY FUND.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—At this annual return of the assembling from all parts of the empire, of the friends and favourers of the missionary cause, to unite their counsels, their exertions, and their substance, to send the gospel to the heathen; allow me, through your paper, to throw in my mite into the evangelising treasury. Circumstances constrain me to say, with Peter and John, when an alms was requested from them, 'silver and gold have I none, but such as I have, give I unto you;' a happy suggestion of a ready and an abundant pecuniary supply. In addition to the weekly penny offerings of children and servants, the large donations of opulent individuals, the society, and the congregational offerings, let all the ministers 'who favour the dust of Zion,' throw off their golden rings that are upon their fingers, and convert them into guineas, in order to promote the conversion of the heathen. Were ever the fingers of the Apostle Paul adorned, disgraced, with the glitter of a gold ring? Nay, were ever the fingers of one infinitely greater than Paul so ornamented? To the honour of the zeal and piety of the venerable David, when his princes and his people were assembled to collect for the building of the Temple of Jerusalem, it is expressly recorded (1 Chron. xxix. 8.), 'And they with whom precious stones were found, gave them to the treasure of the house of the Lord.' Go to now, ye opulent sons of Levi, whose consciences are not the most flexible, see if you can again have the daring inconsistency to lift up your humble, your sparkling hands in all your zealous ardour, eloquently extorting the last farthing from your hearers, without first complying with this requisition. And if all the ladies would imitate the conduct of the Hebrew ladies in the wilderness, who cut off their ear-rings to make the golden-calf, the sum would be rendered ten, nay, an hundred fold.

THE PLEASURES OF SPRING.

'These blessings, friend, a Deity bestowed.'

VIRGIL.

THE time is fast approaching when the citizens, with their sons, daughters, and friends, will be induced to leave their confined dwellings to view the openness of the season and solicit the delicate harmonies of spring. Whatsoever the divine may urge to wean the mind from natural objects of temporary attraction;—whatsoever the man of the world may adduce in support of acquiring heaps of wealth and increase of power, recreation is necessary, and air and exercise are productive of the greatest benefits, and insure the happiest results. Can we then be surprised at the hilarity that shines on the countenances of those walking abroad in the country, who have been for weeks or months incarcerated in this vast metropolis, whose houses are never visited by the sun, and whose atmospheres are never ventilated by the oxygenated air of cheerfulness? The elasticities of our unchained animals are full of encouragement. After jostling in narrow streets and popular entries,—after being moderately stunned with the rattle of coaches, the hammering of copper-smiths, and the clang of trunk-makers,—how grateful the silence of the green worlds around and the blue worlds above! The freedom of space is the gift of heaven, and man is most in his nature and element when the recipient of it. As the beings of one common and bountiful father, we are taught to admire the extent and variety of his works. The very modest-looking primrose gives us sensibility: we separate it from its crinkled leaves, and it seems to teach a lesson of morality to us, by saying, as it were, 'thus soon and thus prematurely may thy dear girl be torn away from thy sympathising love!'—The cloud, shall show us the fleetingness of our joys. The daisy that resists the curling wind and the withering cold to recover its tranquillity, shall tell us, when we have lost our peace, with what difficulty we may regain it, and, when regained, how liable it is to be disturbed! The pensile rush, that combats the elements of air and water, and determines to keep its own likeness on the wave, teaches us perseverance. The voices of birds in the harbouring trees shall invite our spirits to melody and give new energies to our imaginations; they shall remind us of innocence in beauty; allure us to soft pasturage and calm shadows. Such are the pleasures which the rational and attentive observer of nature will enjoy.—But all citizens have not this taste. There are anglers who walk forth equipped in all the paraphernalia of their patient profession; and they are sociable with no one but crudely,—with much tenderness of emphasis, called sport. There are motley groups who form a train from where 'Hicks' Hall formerly stood,' to Hampstead Heath, to try the passions of bull-dogs by their killing one another;—and this is called a trial of skill. There are bucks of the first order who give their fascinating ladies airings of pleasure, and who perform their evolutions wonderfully, if they return without having driven over a child and broken one of the vehicle's wheels! and this is a most successful way to penetrate their fair one's tender bosoms. Heroes of less aspiring character take their pipes, and seem to infer that walking among the flowers and grass, only makes them tired, and to no purpose. These may be said to drink their health truly. Others prefer the skittle-ground, to raise the boisterous laugh, and fatigue themselves with pleasure, like many of their superiors in life,—

'But we are spirits of another sort:

1 with the morning's love have oft made sport;
And, like a forester, the groves may tread,
Even till the eastern gate, all fiery red,
Opening on Neptune with fair blessed beams,
Turns into yellow gold his salt-green streams.'

Midsummer Night's Dream.

Yet, immoderate pleasure is as satisfying, unprofitable, and injurious, as the entire want of it. Let every one, then, seek for recreation in his own way, if it be lawful and just, recollecting that its temperate use will add to his felicity, while its excessive abuse will expose him to the contumely of the world, and injure all his genial relations and social interests.

IMPROMPTU.

'For a few nights only! Il Diavolo Antonio!!
Engaged at an immense expense!!!—Play

THE Coburg Proprietor needs some amends,

He has at length got the 'Devil to Pay.'—L.

SONG.

WILL you gang wi' me, lassie,
To the bonnie bines of Laggan:
A' my care shall be, lassie,
Ever to content ye.

My cottage stands beneath a hill,
Beside a siller-winding rill;
It may be your's, lass, as ye will,
And it may weel content ye.

Will ye gang wi' me, lassie, &c.

The crystal spey runs roaring by,
Reflecting mountains, trees, and sky;
The little birds that round us fly—
Their sweetest numbers chaunt, ay—

Will ye gang, &c.

When summer basks the boughs in green,
And a' things gay and sweet are seen,
The crimson heath-bell crowns the scene,
Sae fragrant and sae dainty—

Will ye gang, &c.

Ye shall have fouth o' milk and meal,
I'll hie the roe-buck o' the hill,
I have a heart that's true and leal,
That beats but to content ye.

Will ye gang, &c.

In Laggan's bonnie flowery glen,
Our snow-white bleating flocks we'll pen;
Wi' modest dames and honest men
We'll live bairn gay and canty.

Will ye gang, &c.

As through the path of life ye go,
Wi' sweetest flowers I'll strew the way;
I'll soothe your ev'ry care and woe,
In ev'ry wish prevent ye.

Will ye gang, &c.

And when auld age shall nip our bloom,
We'll sink together to the tomb,
While neighbours round our grave shall croud,
And wi' kind tears lament us.

Will ye gang wi' me, lassie, &c.

SONNET.

METROUGHT I saw thee, fairer far than light,
Flit on the dark wing of my clouded dream,
Shedding upon my troubled soul a gleam
Of transient hope, that glimmer'd thro' the night.

Of faithless despair, which veil'd my night.
Oh! then my fancy rovd to each past scene;
To cars that are, to joys that once have been—

To love; but then the vision wing'd its flight
To the blue heaven's expanse; as the pale moon

Guided the airy phantom on its way
To those domains of bliss, and left the gloom
That clasp'd the forest in its arms, but soon,
Soon shall I follow thee, by that bright ray
Which lights to happiness beyond the tomb.

SONNET TO MAY.

Inx, flower-crown'd queen, unnumber'd are the songs,
Unnumber'd poets in thy praise have fram'd;
Yet to thee still so sweet a charm belongs,—
Such transports glad our souls when thou art named,

Felt not by heroes e'en nor poets, famed
For inspiration these, and those for arms, (Tho' wreaths of fadeless bay by each are claim'd),

Apollo's heaven-strung lyre and Mar's claims,—

That, May, I would thee liken to the calms
That sleep serenely on a summer sea;

Oh, when our happiest days life's sunbeam warms,—

The space 'twixt manhood and mild infancy,
When nought save pleasure smiles our steps around;

For with thee, month of love, those joys again are found!

ALPHEUS.

THE SIGH OF LOVE: A SONG.

Sorrow is the sigh that friendship knows
When early life is done;

Soft swirls the tear that warmly flows
To pleasures that are gone.

And soft the sigh of evening breeze,
Thro' shady bowers and grove;

But softer sweeter far than these,
The anxious sigh of love.

Quick heaves the traveller's throbbing breast,
His long lost home to view,

And bopes his wearied limbs to rest,
Where being first he drew;

These sighs of grief and sorrow's train
A painful feeling move,—

But us a soft and pleasing pain
That prompts the sigh of love.

Ah! who the mystic joy can tell
Which mutual lovers feel,

When thro' the breast soft tumults swell,
With bliss-bestowing zeal?

Theirs is a joy without control,
Pure as the skies above;

Theirs the soft agonies of soul,
The anxious sigh of love.

Fine Arts.

ROYAL ACADEMY.

In noticing the present Exhibition, we shall not consider ourselves bound to adhere strictly to the numerical arrangement, though we shall not, perhaps, deviate far from it; the field, however, is so ample, that we shall be compelled to brevity in order to notice a due proportion of those pictures which are worthy of remark.

No. 8. 'May-day in the reign of Queen Elizabeth.'—C. R. Leslie. While we do justice to this artist for the correctness of the costume, and his close observance of the manners of the age, which he has displayed in the picture, we must confess it does not give us so lively a picture of those festive sports as Strutt, in his Queen's Hall, and Dr. Aikin, in his Shakespeare, had led us to expect. It is true we have Robin Hood, maid Marian, and Friar Tuck, with the hobby horse, fool, and dragon, but they are not very characteristically drawn; nor is the grouping very happy. Perhaps the best point of time for the May-day sports would have been the procession. The young men and maidens; Robin Hood, with his 'grass-green tunic,' the maid Marian 'elegantly habited in a watch-coloured tunic,' with her bride maids, and the May pole, drawn by eight fine oxen, while the rear was closed by the 'hobby horse and the dragon,' would have afforded fine scope for an artist of Mr. Leslie's talents. He has, however, made an interesting and beautiful picture, and we will not quarrel with him because we think it might have been better.—No. 17.

'Portrait of a favourite Horse.'—T. Woodward, and No. 44. 'Portrait of Tippoo, a favourite Spaniel.'—Mr. T. Ward, are good specimens of animal painting.—No. 20. 'The Vintage.'—T. Stothard, R. A. There is so much ingenuity and inventive talent displayed in this picture, that even a very lengthened description would convey but a feeble outline of its merits. The artist has converted a scene, which former painters always rendered disgusting, into one of delicacy; and, instead of representing the 'Vintage' as a scene of drunkenness and vulgarity, has made it moral and instructive. The time selected is when the grape-gatherers have completed their work, and are returning home. In the principal group, two of them are caressing each other; and behind are several graceful females with their baskets on their heads; one of them is plucking fruit from the vine, while, to the left, a man is enlivening the scene by playing on a musical instrument. Bacchus is not the loathsome being he has hitherto been represented, but the beautiful god of the Greeks. The composition of this piece is very fine, and not in the least laboured; in point of colouring however it is deficient.—No. 92. 'The Burial of Edward V. and his brother the Duke of York, who were murdered in the Tower.'—J. Northcote, R. A. The vigorous pencil of this distinguished artist, has given a very forcible and striking representation of that tragic scene, so well known in English history. The countenances of the murderers, and their eagerness to consign their victims to their ignoble tomb, are well expressed.—No. 23. 'Portraits of Master and Miss Russell.'—T. Phillips, R. A.—is a well finished picture, and represents the children as of a fine playful disposition, and very agreeably employed.—No. 33. 'The Murder of Archbishop Sharp, on Magnus Moor, 1679.'—W. Allan. This is a fine subject for the painter. An aged man, not freed from the consciousness of having wronged his assassins, meeting an awful and unexpected death; a lovely daughter, compelled to witness the sacrifice of her sire; and a band of assassins, perpetrating the crime with a fanatic and enthusiastic zeal, which makes them not only glory in the deed, but feel confident that it is an act of justice and an acceptable sacrifice to that God, who has said, 'thou shalt do no murder.' These afforded ample scope to Mr. Allan, and he has portrayed the scene with a fearful reality.—No. 34. 'Portrait of a Lady in the Character of Uua.'—Sir William Beechey, R. A. This is a pleasing picture, and the portrait is perfectly congenial with the character she is made to represent.—No. 39. 'The Sacred Tree of the Hindoos, which contains an ancient Temple and Idol.'—T. Daniell, R. A. In scenery of this description, Mr. Daniell has long been known to excel, and this is not inferior to his former productions.—No. 58. 'Portrait of Earl Grey.'—J. Jackson, R. A. An excellent likeness.—No. 69. 'Portrait of the Marquis of Londonderry.'—Sir T. Lawrence, P. R. A. If one tenth part of the attention that has been devoted to the robes of the marquis, had been bestowed on the countenance, we should have had a much better likeness. In point of finishing, this is a picture of the highest order, but justice has not been done to the fine expressive features of his lordship.—No. 70. 'Portrait of the late Princess Charlotte;' and No. 180. 'Portrait of Lady Louisa Lambton.'—Sir T. Lawrence, P. R. A. are two delightful pictures. We do not wonder that Sir Thomas is so popular as a painter of females, when he gives them a loveliness so superhuman as the last of these, which, for grace, beauty, and simplicity, exceeds any thing we had before seen even from his pencil.—No. 128. 'Nature Blowing Bubbles for her Children.'—W. Hilton, R. A. An allegorical painting, the idea of which has been suggested from a passage in Crabbe's Library:—

'Blow sportive bladders in the beamy sun,
And call them worlds! and bid the greatest show
More radiant colours in their worlds below;
Tush as they break, the atoms of care remove,
And tell them, such are all the toys they love.'

And tell them, such are all the toys they love.

To embody this idea is somewhat difficult, but the artist has succeeded; and the composition is chaste, simple, and harmonious; Nature, a recumbent figure, is represented with the reed in her hand, by which she has produced the airy toys; while the children around her are beautiful in their forms, and glowing with life and infantine gaiety.

—No. 134. 'The Careless Messenger Detected.'—W. Mulready, R. A.—This picture, which is equal in colour and execution, to any of the artist's former works, is superior in point of composition. It is a picture of nature rather than of manners, and, in this respect, it differs from those of Wilkie or Hogarth, to whom he bears a striking similarity. The subject is a child confided by a mother to the care of a boy, with directions to carry it to a certain place; the boy, meeting with some companions, lays down his infant burden, and plays at marbles. The mother detects him, and is about to inflict a summary chastisement for the neglect, to the great terror of the culprit and the infinite amusement of his companions, whose characters are drawn with a distinctness and peculiarity, which is almost imitable; the action of each, as well as the expressions of their countenances, is strongly characteristic of their respective dispositions. One boy, a tall booby, leans against the wall with his hands behind, as if he had had no share in the business, while a young sneerer is chuckling at the idea of the careless boy getting a good caning. A vulgar blackguard-looking boy plays on with the utmost indifference, totally regardless of the woman's anger or the boy's terrors. This is a picture, of which every one is enabled to judge, from the 'school-boy creeping like a snail unwillingly to school,' to decrepit old age, and we will venture to say, that few will see it without admiring it as much as we do.—No. 139. 'The House of Morpheus.' H. Howard, R. A. This is an allegorical painting, from the following passage in that allegorical poem, Spenser's Fairy Queen:—

'Amid the bowels of the earth, full deep
And low, where dawning Day doth never peep,
His dwelling is: there Tethys his wet bed
Doth ever wash, and Cynthia still doth steep.
In silver dew his ever-drooping head,
While and Night over him her mantle black doth spread.'

We confess, we are not partial to allegorical painting, and we are sorry, that Mr. Howard, whom we admire as a painter of nature, should yield to display the exuberance of his fancy in allegory. This is a pretty picture, but to use a common and a very expressive term among artists, it does not read; for, although we might, perhaps, imagine a youth in deep sleep to represent Morpheus, add that an old woman, about to throw a cloak over him, was intended for Night; yet we could not, without a considerable strength of fancy, fix on an elderly female, in the left corner, as Tethys, or a young one as Cynthia, particularly when they are without those symbols by which they are generally distinguished.

BRITISH INSTITUTION.

This Institution, for the exhibition of paintings by the Old Masters, opened on Monday last. The contributors to the collection include the most illustrious personages in the state. His Majesty, the Patron of the Institution, has taken the lead in adorning the gallery, having sent most liberally from the royal collection several standard works from the various departments of art. Among these are—a fine Landscape, 'Sunset,' by Claude; a female portrait, by Rembrandt; 'Herod's daughter with the Head of John the Baptist,' by C. Dolce; 'a Portrait of Charles II, his brother, and sisters, when children,' by Vandyke; a 'Landscape with a Mill,' by Raysall; a Portrait by Albert Durer; a 'Landscape with Figures,' by G. Poussin; and a 'St. Martin lending his Cloak,' by Rubens.

The Duke of Norfolk has sent the celebrated shield, which was presented by the Grand Duke of Tuscany to the gallant and chivalrous Henry Earl of Surrey, who proclaimed a challenge and tournament in Florence, in honour of his fair Geraldine.

The Duke of Wellington has sent some of his best pictures, including the 'Effects of Intemperance,' by Jan Steen; a 'Musical Party,' by De Hooge; and 'the Embarkation of Van Tromp,' by Backhuysen.

The Marquises of Lansdown, Bute, and Abercorn, with the Earls of Dartmouth, Mulgrave, Coventry, Grosvenor, Spencer and Roseberry, have also sent some of their best works; as have also the Countess De Grey, Lords Dundas, Eardley, Sydney, Carron, and a number of other directors. There are in all 142 works in the exhibition, including some of the best productions of Titian, Correggio, Rubens, Rembrandt, Tintoretto, Vandyke, Velasquez, Giorgioni, Paolo Veronese, Tieners, and almost every eminent master of the Italian, Spanish, Flemish, and Dutch Schools. Mr. West's Picture of 'Christ healing the Sick in the Temple,' for which the Directors gave the Artist 3000 guineas some years ago, is also exhibited. The collection is admirable, and presents a rich treat to the lovers of the fine arts.

MR. GLOVER'S EXHIBITION.

It has been truly said that art is a jealous thing, and demands the undivided homage and attention of those who would acquire pre-eminence. Mr. Glover seems fully aware of this, and has devoted himself with the most unceasing industry to his profession. Those who have had an opportunity of seeing the productions of his pencil a few years ago, and the present valuable collection which he exhibits, will see to what advantage he has studied. As a landscape painter, Mr. Glover stands in the first rank of British artists; and so conscious is he of his own powers, that he has actually placed in the present exhibition one of the most beautiful pictures of Claude Lorraine, and the best landscape of Wilson (the English Claude) that he has been able to procure: and when due allowance is made for that mellowness, which time alone can give to a picture, Mr. Glover need not shrink from the comparison of one of his landscapes at least with these celebrated productions: this is a view of 'Patterdale, in Cumberland'; the variety of landscape, the delicacy of colouring, and the judicious display of light and shade, contribute to render this picture one of the finest landscapes of modern painters; a bridge, the perspective of which is admirable, with its shade reflective on the side of the river, seems the very acme of art.

Nos. 59, 65, 70.—Views of Tivoli, are finely descriptive of that enchanting scene: the rich Italian sky; the beauty of the scenery; the fine, but distant prospect of the Sybil's Temple and St. Peter's at Rome, are delightfully portrayed.

As specimens of the beauty of English landscape,—and, notwithstanding the prejudices against it, England presents as charming scenery as any part of the world,—we would notice Nos. 31, 43, 76, and 84, Views of Ulswater; and Nos. 71 and 85, Views of Harrow; the last, a 'View from Lord Northwick's House at Harrow, with London in the distance,' is a charming picture: the boldness of the foliage, which seems to rise from the canvas, and the manner with which it is executed, would almost persuade us that every leaf had been an object of the artist's care, did we not know that he paints with the utmost facility and expedition. This gallery, so worthy of public attention, is entitled to a more detailed notice, and we shall return to the subject.

SALE OF

SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS'S PICTURES.

THE connoisseurs and professors of art have had the opportunity of possessing themselves of some of the finest pictures of this great artist, which have been sold by Mr. Christie, within the last few days. These pictures were in the possession of the late Marchioness of Thomond, the niece of Sir Joshua, to whom they had been bequeathed. Many exquisite productions of other painters were also disposed of by the hammer. These had formed part of the famous collection of Sir Joshua, which, if not the most extensive, was supposed to be the most unique in Europe. The paintings by Sir Joshua fetched good prices, as will appear by the following list of some of the most prominent:—

The Gipsy Fortune teller, the print from which is well known, 240 guineas.

The Infant St. John, with a Lamb, 72 guineas.

Portrait of a Female employed in Drawing, 161 gs.

Portrait of Lady Hamilton, 202 gs.

Portrait of Mrs. Hartley, as a bacchante, with an infant on her shoulder, 220 gs.

Portrait of a young Girl with a Scarlet Muff, 259 gs.

An elderly Man seated in a Chair, personifying Resignation, 125 gs.

A Portrait of Sir Joshua Reynolds, with a Book. This picture, which excited great interest and a spirited competition, was purchased by the Earl of Mulgrave, for 234 gs.

Another less eminent Portrait of Sir Joshua, fetched 100 gs.

The Girl and Kitten—a once much esteemed picture, but which has been nearly destroyed, either by the effect of the sun or the defect of the colours; but, notwithstanding this, it sold for 295 gs.

The Piping Shepherd-Boy, with his Dog in the back-ground, a Landscape, and a Flock of Sheep, 410 gs.

The celebrated picture of Hope nursing Love, 215 gs.

A young Shepherdess with Lambs, 216 gs.

A Shepherd-Boy and Dog, purchased by Earl Fitzwilliam, 600 gs.

A Peasant Girl and Children with a Torch, 400 gs.

Portrait of Admiral Rodney, 115 gs.
A Nymph and Cupid, usually termed the Snake in the Grass, 510 gs.

Dido on the Funeral Pile, 700 gs.

The famous Designs for the Compartments of the Window of New College, Oxford. These being the finest productions of Sir Joshua, excited much interest, and there was a spirited bidding between Lord Milton and the Earl of Normanton who finally obtained the whole at the following prices:—Charity, 1500 gs.; Faith, 400 do.; Justice, 1100 do.; Hope, 650 do.; Fortitude, 700 do.; Prudence, 350 do.; Temperance, 600 do.

The remaining compartments, Portraits of Sir Joshua and Jarvis as Shepherds, at the nativity, were purchased at 410 gs. for Earl Fitzwilliam.

The most celebrated pictures, not by Sir Joshua, were a Corregio and a Teniers.

The Marriage of St. Catherine, by Corregio, was sold for 215 guineas. This celebrated picture had the thanks of an Italian, to heaven, for possessing it, inscribed upon the back; and a memorandum, by Sir Joshua, dated April 17, 1790, declared that the Italian's feelings were in unison with his own.

The Enchantress entering the Infernal Regions, is supposed to be the masterpiece of Teniers. This picture was held in so much esteem by Sir Joshua, that to obtain it, he offered to cover it twice with guineas, which was refused; however, he afterwards procured it in exchange for several of his own pictures. It sold for 160 guineas.

This sale furnished a strong proof of the interest now taken in the Fine Arts by the higher ranks of society.

The Drama.

COVENT GARDEN.—On Saturday night, her Majesty the Queen, very unexpectedly, honoured this theatre with a visit, to see the metamorphosis play of the Tempest. 'God Save the King' was called for and sung; and, at the conclusion of the play, her Majesty retired amidst the loud plaudits of the audience.

A new farce was produced at this theatre on Tuesday night, entitled The Grand Tour, or Stopped at Rochester, of the plot of which the following is an outline:—Seabright, (Jones), with a friend, Blushington, (Duruset), arrives at Rochester, where the latter accidentally sees and falls in love with the heroine, (Miss Beaumont), whose father (Blanchard) has contracted her to Mr. Violet (Liston), a cockney oilman, of High Holborn. This circumstance, coming to the knowledge of Seabright, through the simplicity of Emery, a Yorkshire servant to Violet, he introduces himself as Mr. Violet to the father, and posts his French Valet (Yates) outside the house to mislead the real Violet, in which he of course succeeds. Seabright pleads so successfully for his friend, that the father agrees to break off the match with Violet, and give his daughter to Blushington; but, on their proceeding to a lawyer's, where the Cockney had been unfortunately led, the whole trick is exploded. New schemes are, however, devised, by which Blushington gains the lady, and Violet contents himself with an antiquated maiden, (Mrs. Davenport.) The farce is too long, but the whole of the characters were admirably sustained. Jones was never in better spirits, and exerted himself to the utmost; Emery played the Yorkshireman with his accustomed excellence; and Blanchard, Yates, Duruset, with Mrs. Davenport and Miss Beaumont, were all very effective, and contributed much to the success of the farce. Liston's Cockney did not afford him a sufficient opportunity. The farce, which is said to be from the pen of Mr. Morton, was completely successful.

SURREY THEATRE.—The new serio comic historic Anachronasmatic Heptadrama of The Seven Champions of Christendom, produced at this theatre, is one of those laughable and spirited burlesques in which Mr. Dibdin is so successful. It combines the whole comic strength of the company, and is certainly a very splendid and amusing spectacle. Narbonne Castle, the Seven Champions, and the Poet's last Shilling present strong attractions, and draw full houses.

SADLER'S WELLS.—The performances at this theatre are continued with great spirit and effect. Mr. Wilkinson has been re-engaged, and is irresistibly comic in Hookey Walker; indeed, this piece is well played throughout, and is much enhanced by the singing of Miss Johnstone and Mr. Paine. Black Beard, a melodramatic pantomime, has been revived, and produced with great attention to stage effect.

The Bee.

Omnia nos itidem depascimus aurea dicta.*'

The fifth day of May
Being airy and gay
And to hyp not inclin'd
But of vigorous mind
And my body in health
I'll dispose of my wealth
And all I'm to leave
On this side the grave
To some one or other
And I think to my brother
Because I foresee
That my brethren in law
If I did not take care
Would come in for their share
Which I nowise intended
Till their manners are mended
And of that God knows there's no sign
I do therefore enjoin
And do strictly command
Of which witness my hand
That nought I have got
Be brought into hotch-pot
But I give and devise
As much as in me lies
To the son of my mother
My own dear brother
To have and to hold
All my silver and gold
As the affectionate pledges
Of his brother JOHN BEDGES.

TO ADVERTISERS.

THE attention of Advertisers is particularly called to the peculiar advantages that must result from their Advertisements being placed in the columns of The Literary Chronicle, over any weekly or daily publication. Besides finding a station in a work not merely of immediate but of permanent interest and constant reference, it must be obvious that they come directly before the eye and under the notice of intelligent readers, who are looking for novelties in literature and subjects connected with the Arts and Sciences. Far different are the views of the readers of diurnal journals, where the news of the day is the principal object of pursuit, and where the crowded miscellaneous advertisements bury or exclude those for which a literary paper is evidently a fitter medium.

. To insure regular insertion, it is requested that Advertisements may be sent by Thursday, at the latest, the extent of the weekly impression of the Literary Chronicle, requiring that the work should go to press early.

Review of New Books.

Oliver Cromwell and his Times. By Thomas Cromwell. 8vo.-pp. 484. London, 1821.

We are persuaded, that to many persons Oliver Cromwell and his Times will appear a subject so completely exhausted by historians and biographers, that no new interest can be given to it. Indeed, the incidents in the life of Cromwell, and the events in which he had so conspicuous a share, are so well known, that there is really nothing new to be said upon the subject, except as to the real character of this extraordinary man, which appears to us never to have been satisfactorily drawn. The same party-feeling, which, in and near his own time, made either a saint or a devil of him, has pervaded, in a greater or less degree, all his biographers up to the present day. To portray the true character of Cromwell, not as he appeared to others, but to shew the true workings of his mind in all the various situations in which he was placed, notwithstanding all that has been said upon it, still remained a desideratum. The author of the present volume has done more towards this than any preceding writer; but, before we enter into the work, we shall briefly advert to the two lives of Cromwell, which have appeared within the last two years. Of one of these, the Memoirs of Cromwell, by his descendant, Oliver Cromwell, Esq. we have already recorded our opinion*, and, therefore, shall only remark, that Mr. Cromwell makes his ancestor an unblemished pattern of all the virtues, whether of the private individual, the statesman, the warrior, the sovereign, or the saint. The other life of Cromwell, to which we alluded, is in French, by M. Villemain, published at Paris, in two volumes, 8vo. 1819. M. Villemain draws a very different character of Cromwell from that of his descendant; but, as all his information was necessarily drawn from English sources, we should look in vain for new facts. Indeed, M. Villemain's work is evidently less intended to supply any chasm in our own information on the events of the time in which Cromwell lived, than to enable the French to apply to their views and situation the conclusions which were to be adduced from the relation of facts, which he considered analogous to the recent and then existing circumstances of France.

The present biographer of Cromwell, though sufficiently strong and liberal in his politics, displays much discrimination in the choice of his materials, and great impartiality in estimating the character of Cromwell; but we differ from him very much, if he thinks that the present situation of this country bears the slightest analogy to that of England in the time of Charles the First, or that we need any new memento, to save us from republicanism or civil war. But passing over a heavy introduction, and a still heavier preface, we shall come to the Memoir itself, which commences with the following well-drawn character of the subject of the work:—

'Of all men living at the era of political and religious conflict just described, Oliver Cromwell was, perhaps, the best calculated, not merely to "ride in the whirlwind and direct the storm," but to direct it so as invariably to promote his own advantage. Himself, past doubt, both a political and religious enthusiast, he was certain, from that circumstance alone, of securing the consideration, applause, and hearty services, of numbers; and, being at the same time gifted with a very extraordinary portion of a most opposite quality, self-command, he could instantly, when his interests required it, bid the current of his own feelings subside, while he continued to avail himself of the full tide of those of others. By turns sincere and a hypocrite; a religionist and a zealous worldling; a man of gravity and (almost) a buffoon; a preacher and a punster; a clown and a gentleman; stately and familiar; slovenly and precise; an orator and without words to express himself; cautious and yet enterprising; ardent and yet methodical; ready and yet invariably politic;—his very defects were made to turn to his account, almost equally with his admirable qualities; and,

This passage is calculated to create a favourable opinion of the spirit in which the work is written; and we can bear an equally favourable testimony to the industry of the author, who appears not only to have consulted every printed work that could assist him, but also to have resorted to the MS. treasures on the subject in the British Museum; selections from which are given in the Appendix.—We shall now proceed to give a very rapid sketch of the life of this most extraordinary individual.

Oliver Cromwell was born at Huntingdon, April 25th, 1599, of a good family, both maternally and paternally; but, notwithstanding the denial of his descendant, Oliver Cromwell, there is no reason to doubt, that his father being a second son, and by no means munificently provided for, engaged in trade, as has been generally asserted. The education of Cromwell corresponded with the situation of his family; at an early age, he was said to be 'aspiring, stubborn, and obstinate,' and of 'no settled constancy.' The story of his quarrelling with Charles I. when both were children, and his dream, we pass over as well known, our biographer inclining to believe in the authenticity of both. From the Grammar School of his native village, Cromwell was sent to Sydney, Sussex College, Cambridge, April 23rd, 1616. The entry in the College Register is as follows:—

'Apr 23. Oliverus Cromwell Huntingdoniensis admissus at Commentum Sociorum Aprilis viciesimo tertio, 1616, Mr. Ricardo Howlet.

'Between which entry and the next, crowded in, and in a smaller letter, his character is thus curiously drawn, by some unknown hand:—

'Hic fuit grandis ille Impostor, Carmifex perditissimus, qui, pietissimum Rege Carolo I. nefaria Coede sublato, ipsum usurpavit Thronum et tria Regna, per quinque ferme Annorum Spatium, sub Protectoris Nomine indomita Tyrannide vexavit.'

* See the review of this work in No. 39 of the Literary Chronicle, Vol. III.

At college, he acquired some knowledge of Latin, but his attainments were inconsiderable, and he was more addicted to rude (and some say vicious) sports than to study. He was soon after sent to town, and entered of Lincoln's Inn, where, instead of studying the law, he learned the follies and vices of the town. But whatever were his early improprieties, they were of no long continuance, and, on returning to Huntingdon, before he was quite of age, his conduct became correct, and even moral. In August, 1620, he married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir James Bourchier, of Fitsted, Essex; and during no less than sixteen years following, he resided either at his native town, or at St. Ives; when his domestic and moral character was irreproachable, and his religious duties carried to an excess. There is strong reason to believe, that during this period he improved his fortune, by carrying on the business of a brewer. In the third Parliament of Charles I., which met, March 17, 1627, Cromwell was chosen to represent the borough of Huntingdon. This parliament was the school of his politics, if not the hot-bed of his ambition; here he studied the temper and characters of many of those with whom he was afterwards to effect such surprising changes in all things, as yet apparently standing on solid bases around him. He spoke with strong sense and manliness on the various topics, that came before the house. In the year 1635, Cromwell, who had been disgusted with the conduct of Charles to the Parliament, was residing at St. Ives, in the capacity of a farmer, and actively engaged in the parochial affairs of the place. His religious conduct was so exemplary, that he is said to have returned several sums of money which he had formerly won by gambling to the losers. It was about this time that he began to entertain a serious design of disposing of his property in England, and of exchanging his native soil for that of North America:—

'The plantation called New England, in North America, was held by the settlers there by patent from the king. Numbers of the people, consequently, both ministers and others, who now sold their estates and set sail for this distant province, naturally hoped, by such an expedient, not to be thought wanting in loyal affection to their prince and country, while they preserved unimpaired their religious liberty. But the court, becoming jealous of the departure of so many subjects, at length issued a proclamation, forbidding any more to leave the island without a royal licence. This proclamation being evaded, the next step taken was by an order in council, authorising "the lord-treasurer to take speedy and effectual course for the stay of eight ships, now in the river of Thames, prepared to go to New England," and for "putting on land all the passengers and provisions therein intended for the voyage."—In one of these vessels were Cromwell, and his compatriot Hampden! How short-sighted thus appear the precautions of tyranny!

When, in 1639, the King made an arbitrary and ill-judged attack on the Earl of Bedford respecting the drainage of the fens, Cromwell both spoke and acted with such eminent ability and effect, in favour of that nobleman, that from this era we may date the rise of his political consequence. The spirited opposition which he made to the commissioners appointed to ascertain how the King might, with a colourable pretext, deprive the earl of the lands he had drained by a grant from the crown, aroused the universal spirit of the country in behalf of the undertakers, and Cromwell received the appellation of 'Lord of the Fens.' Hampden, who was his kinsman, from that day pronounced him one that would 'sit well at the mark;' and his popularity naturally increased with the commendations of a well-known leader, and his already powerful party. Among the most early advocates of Hampden in the affair of the ship-money, was Cromwell, with whom the calm of privacy was now for ever passed, and succeeded by the turmoil of political intrigue, or the bustle of military adventure:—

'Henceforth,' says our author, 'was he a compound of such virtues and vices, of qualities so various and so opposed, that a mind and powers exactly similar to his own, were alone, perhaps, capable of literally developing his career. Religious, to the last, in his private and domestic conduct, he accustomed himself to the practice of a greater or less degree of dissimulation throughout his public life. Enthusiastic to a high degree in the cause he had espoused, he yet calculated consequences one by one, as they occurred, with almost unflinching exactness. So simple were his language and manners, that he appeared incapable of disguising a purpose that had arisen in his mind; yet by penetration and address the most exquisite, did he at the same time so read the hearts, and so accommodate himself to the humours, of all with whom he associated, as at once to make them his firm friends, and footstools to his future elevation over them. His existence became a perpetual harlequinade; his expressions shifting from the spiritual to the coarsely joecular; his conduct, from the pious to the overbearing; from the submissive, to the most vehement contradictions and the boldest opposition. He could be gentle, almost to effeminacy; or rude, almost to brutality; the protector of an insect, or a savage presiding at a human massacre! He was found to have faculties, tempers, tastes, nay, even apparent habits, adapted to all seasons and occasions. Hence, he could pursue an object by the most concealed and devious tracks, or pounce upon it, like the eagle, by a single flight and stoop: he could charm and wile impediments from his path, or shiver them to fragments at a blow: he could enter with an equal zest into the occupations of preaching, fighting, and reigning; was equally at home in the prayer-meeting, the camp, and the palace; and, as hitherto he had braved and farmed, with all a tradesman's tact for the art of business and acquiring wealth, he now bestrode his war-horse with a grace entirely chivalric, and vaulted from the saddle but to sit the throne with an ease that made royalty seem a portion of his nature. Meanwhile, in every change of time and circumstance, religion, be it once again peculiarly observed, far from contracting, enlarged her hold upon his feelings; but, gradually deserting his judgment, while her sphere of influence was lamentably abridged in fact, the success that attended all his undertakings taught his enthusiasm so greatly to extend it in idea, that, finally, his every action appeared to him directed by a heavenly guidance, and his very crimes the offspring of a decreed necessity, or instruments to execute upon earth God's righteous vengeance!—By considerations similar to these only, it is presumed, shall we be able to pursue and to appreciate the future life of Cromwell.'

In the Parliament of 1640, Cromwell was returned one of the members for the town of Cambridge; and in the second Parliament of the same year, he was a second time returned for the same place. This was the famous Long Parliament. The house was divided and sub-divided into more than forty committees, for the consideration of petitions, grievances, &c. Cromwell was one of these; and Sir Philip Warwick, a royalist contemporary, gives the following curious description of his person at that time:—

"The first time (writes Sir Philip) I ever took notice of him, was in the beginning of the Parliament held in November, 1640, when I vainly thought myself a courtly young gentleman; (for we courtiers valued ourselves much upon our good clothes.) 'I came into the house one morning, well clad, and perceived a gentleman speaking, whom I knew not, very ordinarily apparelled; for it was a plain cloth suit, which seemed to have been made by an ill country tailor; his linen was plain, and not very clean, and I remember a speck or two of blood upon his little band, which was not much larger than his collar: his hat was without a hat-band. His stature was of a good size; his sword stuck close to his side; his countenance swoln and reddish; his voice sharp and unattractive; and his eloquence full of fervour—for the subject matter would not bear much of reason, it being in behalf of a servant of Mr. Prynne's, who had daring libels against the Queen for her dancing, and such like innocent and courtly sports; and he aggravated the imprisonment of this man by the council-table unto that height, that one would have believed the very government itself had been in great danger by it. I sincerely profess it lessened much my reverence unto that great council, for he was very much heartened unto. And yet I lived to see this very gentleman, whom, out of no ill-will to him I thus describe, by multiplied good successes, and by real, but usurped power, (having had a better tailor, and more converse among good company,) in my own eye, when for six weeks together I was a prisoner in his viceroy's hands, and daily waited at Whitehall, appear of a great and majestic deportment and comely presence."

We shall not enter into the various disputes between Charles and his parliament, nor into the discontents which were now so numerous as to render the situation of the monarch very critical:—

'Among the signs of those perilous times, (so happily passed,) may be here noticed petitions out of number from vast bodies of the people, assembled throughout the land, stating the resolution of the parties subscribing "to live and die in defence of the privileges of Parliament;" these petitions being from counties, cities, towns, parishes, and various trades, the latter including the porters, who alone it is said amounted to fifteen thousand. The apprentices also petitioned, to the same effect; as did at last even the beggars. Another strong symptom of the revolutionary spirit abroad, was, that the women were generally seized with the mania of politics; and discovered, in a multitude of instances, minds yet more agitated than those of the men; and these also, to the number of many thousands, proceeded with their petition to Westminster.'

Previously to the actual breaking out of the civil war, Cromwell, who had resolved to stand or fall with the Parliament, had proved himself an active partisan, by distributing arms in the town of Cambridge,—raising a troop of horse out of that county and Hunts,—by seizing the magazine in Cambridge Castle,—and by stopping a quantity of plate that was on its way from that university to the King, at York. A just writer of that day says, 'As for Cromwell, he is gone forth in the might of his spirit, with all his train of disciples; every one of whom is a David, a man of war, and a prophet; gifted men all, that resolve to their work better than any of the sons of Levi.' There is not, perhaps, a more decisive evidence of Cromwell's genius, than that he enlisted the religious enthusiasm of the times on the Parliament's side; and first set the courage and resolution of a high tone of religious feeling in array against the same military virtues inspired by high birth and loyalty. Cromwell having become a colonel and a commander, led the van of the forces commanded by the Earl of Manchester, in their attack on the royalists, in October, 1643:—

'At the word, "Truth and Peace," Cromwell's men, himself at their head, advanced, singing psalms; reserving their charge, however, until the enemy's horse had fired. A second salute, and a charge from the King's troops themselves, met their approach to the royal line. By the last volley, Cromwell's horse was killed, and fell with him to the ground; and, ere he was well risen, being now mixed pêle mêle with the combatants, he was again prostrated by the hand of a royalist gentleman, thought to have been Sir Ingram Hopton; again rising, however, he seized a sorry horse from one of his troopers, remounted, and contributed his personal share to the victory obtained.'

The battle of Marston Moor was gained almost entirely by the extraordinary courage and conduct of Cromwell, who, when the battle seemed lost, rallied his troops and gained an important victory. In the decisive battle of Naseby, Cromwell, who was then Lieutenant-General, again displayed his military talents to great advantage, gaining a complete victory over the royalists. In all the negotiations or attempts at negotiation, that were made after the person of the king had been seized, Cromwell showed himself as wary a politician as he was a skilful general; and his aims at ascendancy were evident throughout his whole conduct; although he appears to have afterwards given his consent to the king's trial with reluctance. When the king was brought to his capital for this purpose, he was escorted to Sir Robert Cotton's residence by the river side:—

'On this occasion, a characteristic incident is related by Sir Furbeck Temple, who was one of the judges named by the Commons, but who refused to act. His narration, given in evidence on the trial of Henry Marten, the regicide, after the restoration, is to the effect that, having concealed himself behind the hangings of the room in which the commissioners were met to determine on the mode of trial, in such a manner as to be able both to see and hear what passed, news came that the King was landed at Sir Robert Cotton's stairs; when Cromwell ran to a window which overlooked the water, to observe him as he came up the garden, and "returned as white as the wall!"—exclaiming to the board—"My masters, he is come! he is come! and now are we doing that great work that the nation will be full of. Therefore, I desire you, let us resolve here what answer we shall give the King when he comes before us; for the first question he will ask of us will be, by what authority and commissions we do try him?" To which, "none answered presently;" but that, "after a little space, Henry Marten rose up, and said, "In the name of the Commons and Parliament assembled, and all the good people of England." What a picture have we of the state of Cromwell's mind in this simple circumstance! However others might be deluded into the crime they were about to commit, by unfeigned though erring notions of duty or necessity, to him the just bearing of the case was manifest; he knew they could possess no "authority or commission" to adjudge their sovereign; his late conduct had evinced, that he was sensible of the line that should be drawn between the lawful deposition (in very extraordinary circumstances) of a King, and his secret or formal murder;—and every feeling that could be prompted by native humanity, or the deepest sense of religion, aroused by a glimpse of the unhappy monarch, whom, in spite of his convictions, he had resolved on devoting to destruction; he "returned as white as the wall;" and his exclamation, "My masters, he is come! he is come!"—joined with the pertinent question to the board that followed it—may be supposed to have escaped him with a degree of pathos, an affecting solemnity, which, together with his very unusual hurry of manners and paleness of countenance, had so staggering an effect upon the assembly, that none could "answer presently," but all shrunk, appalled for the moment, from the awful business they had taken in hand.'

Recollections of a Classical Tour through various Parts of Greece, Turkey, and Italy. By P. E. Laurent. (Concluded from p. 385.)

In an account of the Acropolis, Mr. Laurent contrasts Pausanias's description with the modern state of this once splendid citadel, and while he deplores with true classic feeling, the cannonading of the Venetian artillery, and the dilapidations of Turkish masons, he severely censures 'the purloinings of classic virtuosi,' who have joined in the spoiliations of the magnificent temples on this celebrated rock. Lord Elgin's purchasing the basso-reliefs of the Pantheon, has been severely censured both by the French and by many persons in this country; and a satirical line was cut upon the walls of the Pandroseon:—

'Quod non fecerunt Goti hoc fecerunt Scoti.'

Mr. Laurent, after noticing the general complaints on the subject, says,—

'Before I quitted Athens, I, however, saw enough to convince me that it is proper that the magnificent works of the Greek sculptors should be placed under the safe-guard of a nation fond of art, rather than be left exposed to the senseless fury of the Turks, the depredations of private collectors, and the insults of ignorant travellers. Hardly do any persons quit the Acropolis, without clipping from its monuments some relic to carry back to their country: this rage for destroying has been carried so far, that the elegant Ionic capitals, which I before mentioned, have nearly disappeared, and not one of the Caryatides now stands entire. The last time I visited the citadel, when taking a farewell view of the Pandroseon and the Hall of Erectheus, I was much displeased at seeing an English traveller, an officer of the navy, (for such his uniform bespoke him to be), standing upon the base of one of the Caryatides, clinging with his left arm round the column, while his right hand, provided with a hard and heavy pebble, was endeavouring to knock off the only remaining nose of those six beautifully sculptured statues. I exerted my eloquence in vain to preserve this monument of art.'

The mutilated remains, however, convince the spectator that the buildings were not unworthy the praises lavished upon them by the writers of antiquity. Although the roof of the Parthenon has been destroyed by a Venetian bomb, and has been deprived of its finest ornaments of sculpture, so that naught but a few columns are left standing, yet, says Mr. Laurent, 'never, so long as memory remains, shall I forget the effect produced on my mind when first those pillars presented themselves to my sight: my ideas were all absorbed in a mingled feeling of wonder, of awe, of regret. Let him who denies the sublimity of Grecian architecture, travel to Athens, view the ruins of the Parthenon, and be silent.'

The Greeks of Athens possess none of those majestic features which characterized the sculptors of the ancients: 'jet black and glossy hair, sharp diminutive eyes, shaded by thick brows, meeting in the middle of a high forehead; hooked nose; thick lips; dirty stunted teeth; narrow chin; a skin tawny and coarse;—such is the general portrait of a modern Athenian.' All shave their heads, leaving only a small tuft on the crown, and none but the priests wear beards. The dress of the lower class consists of a coarse linen shirt, a pair of blue loose cotton drawers, a woollen jacket, a small red scull-cap, and a narrow blue turban of coarse cotton. The middle class dress nearly in the same manner, but with the addition of cotton stockings, and French or Italian shoes.

A public school and library is established at Athens, which is supported by the subscriptions of those who visit the town; and the name of her present Majesty graces the list of members. The plain and village of Marathon, the Tumuli, the Sacred Way, and every thing worthy of notice in the vicinity of Athens, have been so often and so minutely described by preceding tourists, that we pass over our author's account of them. On the 21st September, Mr. Laurent quitted Athens, and embarked for Epidaurus, a port of the Morea, nearly opposite to Athens. He reached Lygurio at the time of the vintage, and learnt the method used there of making wine. 'To extract the juice from the grapes, a vat has been erected, having its floor made of plaster, and declining gradually towards a spout, which led to a reservoir; the grapes were thrown in by a hole in the roof, and a peasant trod them with his naked feet.' This wine would be tolerably good, were it not spoiled by a mixture of plaster or lime, and of the turpentine extracted from the apple of the pine-tree. From the remaining part of Mr. Laurent's Tour, we shall now select a few more passages:—

Antiquaries.—'The eager desire of tourists to obtain some relics of antiquity is so well known in Argos, that, when walking the streets, you are repeatedly stopped by the natives to examine the articles they have found in the vicinity. A kaloforos, or monk, drew from his breast, with great care, what he conceived to be a precious antique; it was a Roman crucifix, broken from its cross. This recalls to my memory a similar scene, which I witnessed at Athens. A young man shewed me a French half-penny, of Louis the Fifteenth, imagining it to be a valuable medal; one of my companions inquired, with pretended eagerness, the price he asked for the coin; the youth significantly raised the fingers of his right hand, and pronounced the words, "επτά χεῖρα," (five pisters).'

St. Paul.—At St. Paul remained at Corinth some time, you may readily conclude that a relic of this holy man must still be shewn. While we were examining the Phirman chambers, a young Greek had offered to conduct us to the grotto of

Paul, (Spelia tou agiou Paulou;) we followed him by a craggy path to the foot of the walls of the citadel. A natural cave is seen, where the saint is said to have dwelt during part of his stay at Corinth. A seat in the stone is pointed out also, as having served him for a bed; and a small rock, perhaps once covered with earth, is said to have furnished him with his humble fare. On this spot a small chapel has been erected: it is greatly venerated by the Greeks of Corinth, who, once a year, make a procession hither from the town, with as much pomp as the extreme poverty of the church will allow.'

Reckoning of Time.—'What o'clock is it?' was usually the first question I had to answer any Greek traveller whom I met on the road; this proceeds, perhaps, rather from their mode of calculating by time distance between places, than from mere curiosity; nothing, however, pleases a Romic peasant so much, as a sight of the machinery of a watch; when very small, he gazes at it with wonder. Most of the richer individuals among the Turks, carry in their girdle a large watch, generally of London manufacture, inclosed in a tortoise-shell case, and fastened round their necks with a silver chain; this they shew with no small pride to the Frank traveller, and a smile of content never fails to cross their frigid countenances when they hear pronounced the word "London," written on the dial; so attached are they to goods of English manufacture. The Turks reckon their hours from six in the morning to six in the evening, so that mid-day falls with them at six o'clock. This mode of reckoning time is, perhaps, in part derived from the Italians, who reckon, at least in the southern part of Italy, from sun-set to sun-set, twenty-four hours; by this means they have the extreme disadvantage of starting from a variable point; and it is only by a reference to their almanack that they can set their watch so as to give them twenty-four o'clock at sun-set. Our mode of keeping time is known in Naples by the name of "ora di Francia," or "di Spagna."

In visiting Tripolitza, Mr. Laurent was disgusted with the conduct of some of his countrymen who had preceded him, and which he justly censures. A part of the fortress now serves as a coffee-house, and the white walls are on all sides covered with the names of Greeks and Turks, and of some Frank travellers; an English hand has traced, in different parts of the room, some of the words which disgrace the walls of London; to perpetuate their indecency by obscene inscriptions on the walls, is a custom which both Turks and Greeks have to learn from more civilized nations:—

Sparta.—The ruins of Sparta are now, like many others in Greece, distinguished only by the general denomination of "Palais Chorio;" they are situated on the western side of the Eurotas, and are very extensive. We easily distinguished the theatre, which must have been a most magnificent edifice: we saw also the broad hill on which stood the citadel. We were shewn likewise a bridge of one arch, made of large uncemented stones; it crosses the Tivaris, and, to judge from its shape, must be very ancient; it is situated near a small Greek chapel, sacred to "Agios Giorgios." Some square ruins of walls, constructed from very massy stones, are also seen in different parts.

I regretted much not having a better guide; the person who conducted us, a Pardonioti, seemed completely ignorant of the place; our questions were answered in barbarous accents, which, by their roughness at least, called to the memory the language of the Dorians. The common answer to every question is, ίστερα γο, κνω! (Στεφ. 179.)

The peasantry near the Eurotas are evidently much less civilized than those of the northern parts of the Morea; they greet, however, the travellers, whom curiosity leads to cross their lands, with a welcome which we were told proceeded not from the lips only; the hand is placed on the heart, and the words kale erchetai, difendi mou,—"welcome sir," are pronounced with the smile of hospitality. Some were harvesting the rice in the marshes, near the banks of the Eurotas; while, on the citadel of ancient Sparta, others were beating out the maize: for this purpose, twelve horses were fastened abreast, and driven circularly round a post, about which the ears had been scattered.

Monasteries.—A Greek monastery is inhabited by two descriptions of monks—the kaloieros and the papa. No one is admitted into either of those classes, without the consent of the whole fraternity; no member of the society can marry without forfeiting his character of monk. The kaloieros or kalogeros, (for the word is of disputed orthography, some affirming that it is derived from καλός and ιός; others, that it is deduced from καλός and τίσις;) is of the inferior order; his duty is to clean the chapel of the building, to tend its flocks and herds, and to wait on the papas or fathers. The little community is governed by a person, the nomination of whom depends upon some rich neighbouring Greek, or the bishop: he is called the egoumenos; he must always be in priest's orders, and his duty is to assemble and take the opinion of the papas in all cases of mutual interest—as the nomination of a new member, the exaction of the pasha, or the purchase of new lands. Each monastery pays a certain tribute, according to its revenue: that of Vourkano pays yearly eighteen hundred piasters; but this does not always suffice to preserve them from the sacrilegious depredations of the Moslems. When the monastery is in the vicinity of a Turkish settlement, the fathers, if rich enough, provide a guard of some Albanian soldiers, or a Turkish janissary.

Although generally plunged in the deepest ignorance, it is not to be inferred that all the monks who inhabit these sacred buildings are entirely without the advantages of literature. The acquisitions of many are such as surprise those who consider the difficulty of obtaining knowledge in this secluded land; those acquisitions are, however, confined to a smattering of their own theology, a slight acquaintance with the ancient Greek or Hellenic, and a knowledge of the lives of their saints. Books are rarely met with in the interior of the Morea, and it is not improbable that it is one of the causes of the barbarism which pervades this part of Greece. As in Italian, so in modern Greek, every syllable is pronounced, and each letter bears constantly the same sound; children consequently learn to read Romaine and Italian with a rapidity much greater than one accustomed only to the slow progress made in the English schools, would easily be brought to believe. I am, therefore, convinced, that the distribution of improving and entertaining books would be speedily followed in these provinces by an extension of knowledge—the only incentive which will ever rouse the Greeks from their present degrading torpidity.

Santa Maura.—The canal which separates Santa Maura from Albania, is not above half a mile broad; it is frequently crossed in canoes, or monoxyla, and, at certain seasons of the year, the inhabitants find no difficulty in wading from shore to shore; in milder weather, the wind blows up this canal in an easterly direction, from sun-rise till past noon; it then shifts, and generally blows from the west. The modern town is built in the most unhealthy part of the island, and close to several salt-pits; these are formed on the coast, and separated from the sea by sluices, which admit the water into a shallow preserve, the heat of the sun sufficing to effect crystallization. The fort is placed between the town and the opposite shore of Albania, at the extremity of a peninsula, joined to the land by a narrow and semi-circular isthmus, three miles long, and is surrounded with shoals, abounding in fish of different kinds. A shorter communication is obtained by the remains of a narrow Turkish aqueduct, which crosses the shallows: it consists of above three hundred arches, and, in windy weather, the passage is by no means safe, as the pedestrian runs the risk of being blown into the sea. The garrison consisted of about three hundred men, commanded by Captain Ross, a gentleman whose hospitality is unbounded.

A beautiful road, shaded by olive-trees, leads from the modern town to the ancient Leucas. About three miles distant, the ruins are seen on an eminence, covered with vineyards, at the foot of which is a copious fountain, adorned with a pompous Veneto-Latin inscription; the walls are of Cyclopean masonry, and very extensive; no edifices can be clearly traced, although heaps of ruins are seen on all sides. We were shewn an ancient mill, dug up on this spot; it was hewn in the infancy of mechanic art; a hemispherical stone, revolving within a corresponding vase of granite, reduced the corn to powder. On the opposite shore of Albania is seen a castle, containing a garrison of soldiers belonging to Ali Pasha.

Near the ruins of Leucas, a gibbet has been erected, from which, inclosed in a cage of iron, hangs the corse of an inhabitant of this island; he murdered his father, his mother his brothers, and his sisters, and then fled from his country; but the long arm of justice seized the parricide; he was taken in the Morea, brought to Santa Maura, and executed. His example struck with indelible terror the Ionians, few of whom dare approach the spot where the body is exposed. The execution of this individual took place at the time General Campbell commanded in these islands. The necessary, although severe justice of this gentleman, produced a most salutary effect; the islanders then learnt, for the first time, that pardon was not, as before, to be obtained by money.

We crossed several fine groves of olive. The green turf under the trees produces abundance of mushrooms. The peasants were gathering the fruit; some, standing on the branches, were beating down the olives, striking, according to Pliny's advice, always in one direction, and with a gentle force; others were picking them up, and transporting them in hamper to the town.

Patriotism.—Negotiations were carrying on, during our stay at Corfu, between the lord high commissioner of the Ionian states, and an ambassador from Ioannina. An anecdote was mentioned to us which I cannot refrain from repeating, as it affords an example of honest patriotism and noble disinterestedness, which would have honoured a Phocion or a Fabius. The ambassador, it seems, had received orders from his sovereign to hasten the negotiation by making some presents to the secretary of the high commissioner: in one of their conferences the Mussulman made known his intentions; the secretary led him to a window of the palace, and, pointing to the highest mountain of the island, told him, "Were that mountain a mass of gold, and your master to offer it to us, he would not obtain Parga one moment ere the dictates of justice had been fulfilled."

There is an Appendix to this work, which does not add much to its value. It contains a copy, in Italian, of the treaty of Paris, by which the Ionian Islands were ceded to Great Britain; and a copy of the constitution of those islands.

Although it will be seen from the extent of Mr. Laurent's tour, and the limitted size of his work, that he must necessarily have written with great brevity, yet he has a good taste in the choice of his subjects: he intersperses classical and antiquarian research with acute reflections and interesting portraits of existing manners; and we consider his work a valuable addition to the information already known respecting those interesting portions of the globe, — Greece, Turkey, and Italy. If he had not so frequently quoted Pausanias, we should not have liked him the less, but we cannot withhold our humble tribute of praise for the entertaining and instructive volume with which he has furnished the public. The embellishments consist of several coloured engravings.

AFTER making an accurate survey of Winter Harbour, where the vessels had been locked up nearly eleven months, Captain Parry determined to quit, and which was done on the 1st of August, when the sea wore a flattering appearance to the westward. The vessels, after being stopped by the ice, near Cape Hay, penetrated to the longitude of $113^{\circ} 48' 22''$, being the westernmost meridian hitherto reached in the Polar sea, to the north of America. The difficulty of navigating the ships now became excessive, and there was little hope of making further progress to the westward in this latitude. An investigation was now commenced of the state of the ships, provisions, fuel, &c. The ships were almost as effective as when they left England; the provisions, at a reduced allowance, would last until November, 1821; and the fuel would be exhausted in about the same period; the health of the men was good, but if they had remained another winter, the whole of both crews must have been brought on board the Hecla. The lemon-juice, the only antiscorbutic left, was nearly exhausted; and this, coupled with the circumstance of their having to crowd nearly one hundred persons into the accommodation intended only for fifty-eight, would be likely to endanger their health. These considerations induced Captain Parry to consult his officers before he formed his ultimate decision as to the measures most proper to be pursued. It was their unanimous opinion, that any further attempt to proceed to the westward would be fruitless, and that the plan adopted of running back along the edge of the ice to eastward, in order to look out for an opening towards the American continent was most advisable. This was on the 26th of August, and in pursuing the course determined on, several small islands were discovered. Having traced the ice the whole way from the longitude of 114° to that of 90° , without discovering any opening to give a hope of penetrating to the southward, Captain Parry determined to return to England.

Deeming that it might be of some advantage to the whale fishery, he made a general survey of the western coast of Baffin's Bay, of which he has given an admirable chart. On the 3rd of September, they passed some icebergs, which were a hundred and fifty or two hundred feet above the sea. They soon after met with some whalers, and the master of one of them telling Captain Parry, that he had met with some Esquimaux in the inlet, named the river Clyde, in 1818, he determined, if possible, to communicate with them. They soon came up with four canoes, each containing an Esquimaux, who approached the ships, and were taken on board by their own desire. One of them was an old man, about sixty years, and the other three, from nineteen to thirty years of age. They were much pleased, and expressed their delight by jumping, and by loud and repeated ejaculations. They were much better behaved than the Esquimaux who visited our ships in 1818, and, although there was no interpreter, they bartered several articles, (the Esquimaux shewing they were no strangers to traffic) and prevailed on the old man to sit pretty quiet while Lieutenant Beechey made a drawing of him: a drawing was also made of one of the young men. On the next day, Captain Parry and some of his officers went on shore, to have a little more intercourse with the Esquimaux: —

‘To shew their disposition,’ says Captain Parry, ‘to do us what little service was in their power, he afterwards employed himself in sharpening the seamen's knives, which he did with great expertness on a flat smooth stone, returning each as soon as finished, to its proper owner, and then making signs for another, which he sharpened and returned in the same way, without any attempt, and apparently without the smallest desire, to detain it. The old man was extremely inquisitive, and directed his attention to those things which appeared useful, rather than to those which were merely amusing. An instance of this occurred on my ordering a tin canister of preserved meat to be opened for the boats' crews' dinner. The old man was sitting on the rock, attentively watching the operation, which was performed with an axe struck by a mallet, when one of the men came up to us with a looking-glass. I held it up to each of the Esquimaux, who had also seen one the preceding evening, and then gave it into each of their hands successively. The younger one was quite in raptures, and literally jumped for joy for nearly a quarter of an hour: but the old man having had one smite at his own queer face, immediately resumed his former gravity, and, returning me the glass, directed his whole attention to the opening of the canister, and when this was effected, begged very hard for the mallet which had performed so useful an office, without expressing the least wish to partake of the meat, even when he saw us eating it with good appetites. Being prevailed on, however, to taste a little of it, with some biscuit, they did not seem at all to relish it, but ate a small quantity, from an evident desire not to offend us, and then deposited the rest safely in their canoes. They could not be persuaded to taste any rum, after once smelling it, even when much diluted with water. I do not know whether it be a circumstance worthy of notice, that, when a kaleidoscope or a telescope was given them to look into, they immediately shut one eye, and one of them used the right, and the other the left eye.’

‘The two Esquimaux tents, which we were now going to visit, were situated just within a low point of land, forming the eastern side of the entrance to a considerable branch of the inlet, extending some distance to the northward. The situation is warm and pleasant, having a south-westerly aspect, and being in every respect well adapted for the convenient residence of these poor people. We landed outside the point, and walked over to the tents, sending our boats, accompanied by the two canoes, round the point to meet us. As soon as we came in sight of the tents, every living animal there, men, women, children, and dogs, were in motion, the latter to the top of the hill out of our way, and the rest to meet us with loud and continued shouting; the word ‘pit-tel-yay’ [give me] being the only articulate sound we could distinguish, amidst the general uproar. Besides the four men whom we had already seen, there were four women, one of which being about the same age as the old man, was probably his wife; the others were about thirty, twenty-two, and eighteen years of age. The first two of these, whom we supposed to be married to the two eldest of the young men, had infants slung in a kind of bag at their backs, much in the same way as gypsies are accustomed to carry their children. There were also seven children, from twelve to three years of age, besides the two infants in arms, or rather behind their mothers' backs; and the woman of thirty was with child.

We began, as before, by giving whatever they had to dispose of, in exchange knives, axes, brass kettles, needles, and other useful articles, and then added such presents as might be further serviceable to them. From the first moment of our arrival until we left them, or rather until we had nothing left to give, the females were particularly importunate with us, and "pillettay" resounded from the whole troop, wherever we went: they were extremely anxious to obtain our buttons, apparently more on account of the ornament of the crown and anchor which they observed upon them, than from any value they set upon their use; and several of these were cut off our jackets to please their fancy. When I first endeavoured to bargain for a sledge, the persons I addressed gave me distinctly to understand by signs, that it was not their property, and pointed towards the woman who owned it; though my ignorance in this respect offered a good opportunity of defrauding me, had they been so inclined, by receiving an equivalent for that which did not belong to them: on the owner's coming forward, the bargain was quickly concluded. The pikes which I gave in exchange underwent the usual ceremony of licking, and the sledge was carried to our boat with the most perfect understanding on both sides. In another instance, an axe was offered by some of the Griper's gentlemen, as the price of a dog, to which the woman who owned the animal consented. To shew that we placed full confidence in them, the axe was given to her before the dog was caught, and she immediately went away with a kind of halter or harness of thongs, which they use for this purpose, and honestly brought one of the finest among them, though nothing would have been easier than to have evaded the performance of her contract. The readiness, however, with which they generally parted with their commodities, was by no means the effect of fear, nor did it always depend on the value of the articles offered in exchange: for, having, as I thought, concluded a bargain for a second canoe belonging to the old woman, I desired the men to hand it down to the boat: but I soon perceived that I had misunderstood her, for she clung fast to the canoe, and cried most piteously till it was set down; I then offered a larger price than before, but she could not be induced to part with it.

The stature of these people, like that of Esquimaux in general, is much below the usual standard. The height of the old man, who was rather bent by age, was four feet eleven inches, and that of the other men from five feet four and a half to five feet six inches. Their faces are round and plump in the younger individuals; skin smooth; complexion not very dark, except that of the old man; teeth very white; eyes small; nose broad, but not very flat; hair black, straight, and glossy; and their hands and feet extremely diminutive. The old man had a grey beard, in which the black hairs predominated, and wore the hair rather long upon his upper lip, which was also the case with the eldest of the three others. One of these, we thought, bore a striking resemblance to our poor friend John Sackhouse, well known as the Esquimaux who accompanied the former expedition, the want of whose services we particularly felt on this occasion, and whose premature death had been sincerely lamented by all who knew him, as an intelligent and amiable man, and a valuable member of society.

The grown-up females measured from four feet ten to four feet eleven inches. The features of the two youngest were regular; their complexions clear, and by no means dark; their eyes small, black, and piercing; teeth beautifully white and perfect; and although the form of their faces is round and chubby, and their noses rather flat than otherwise, their countenances might, perhaps, be considered pleasing even according to the ideas of beauty which habit has taught us to entertain. Their hair, which is jet-black, hangs down long and loose about their shoulders, a part of it on each side being carelessly plaited, and sometimes rolled up into an awkward lump, instead of being neatly tied on the top of the head, as the Esquimaux women in most other parts are accustomed to wear it. The youngest female had much natural bashfulness and timidity, and we considered her to be the only unmarried one, as she differed from the other three in not being tattooed upon the face. Two of them had their hands tattooed also, and the old woman had a few marks of the same kind about each wrist. None of the men or children were thus distinguished.

The children were generally good-looking, and the eldest boy, about twelve years of age, was a remarkably fine and even handsome lad. They were rather scared at us at first; but kind treatment, and a few trifling presents, soon removed their fears, and made them almost as importunate as the rest.

The dress of the men consists of a seal-skin jacket, with a hood, which is occasionally drawn over the head, of which it forms the only covering. The breeches are also generally of seal-skin, and are made to reach below the knee, and their boots, which meet the breeches, are made of the same material. In this dress, we perceived no difference from that of the other Esquimaux, except that the jacket, instead of having a pointed flap before and behind, as usual, was quite straight behind, and had a sort of scollop before in the centre. In the dress of the women, there was not so much regard to decency as in that of the men. The jacket is of seal-skin, with a short pointed flap before and a long one behind, reaching almost to the ground. They had on a kind of drawers, similar to those described by Crantz, as the summer-dress of the Greenland women, and no breeches. The drawers cover the middle part of the body, from the hips to one-third down the thigh, the rest of which is entirely naked nearly as far as the knee. The boots are like those of the men, and besides these they have a pair of very loose leggins, as they may be called, which hang down carelessly upon the top of the boots, suffering their thighs to be exposed in the manner before described, but which may be intended occasionally to fasten up, so as to complete the covering of the whole body. The children are all remarkably well clothed; their dress, both in male and female, being in every respect the same as that of the men, and composed entirely of seal-skin, very neatly sewed.

The tents which compose their summer-habitations, are principally supported by a long pole of whalebone, fourteen feet high, standing perpendicularly, with four or five feet of it projecting above the skins which form the roof and sides. The length of the tent is seventeen, and its breadth from seven to nine feet, the narrowest part being next the door, and widening towards the inner part, where the bed, composed of a quantity of the small shrubby plant, the Andromeda Tetragona, occupies about one-third of the whole apartment. The pole of the tent is fixed where the bed commences, and the latter is kept separate by some pieces of bone laid across the tent from side to side. The door, which faces the south-west, is also formed of two pieces of bone, with the upper ends fastened together, and the skins are made to overlap in that part of the tent, which is much lower than the inner end. The covering is fastened to the ground by curved pieces of bone, being generally parts of the whale; and the tents were ten or fifteen yards apart, and about the same distance from the beach.

It is pitiable to record of these rude inhabitants of so ungenial a climate, that they were perfectly honest in all their dealings, and not a single instance occurred of their pilfering the most trifling articles, although they had sufficient opportunities to have done it. Captain Parry now took leave of his new acquaintance, and directed his course for England. On the 29th of September, he landed at Peterhead, with Captain Sabine and Mr. Hooper, and arrived in London on the 3rd of November.

The Appendix, which has been principally arranged by Captain Sabine, contains much valuable scientific information, including tables of the going of the chronometers, lunar and magnetic observations, observations to determine the latitude and longitude by the chronometers, on the variation of the compass, a table of day's work, or progress made each day by the Hecla, tide table in Winter Harbour, experiments to determine the acceleration of the pendulum in different latitudes; with remarks on the state of health and disease. From the last we make an extract, which shows the effects of severe cold:—

'A house, erected on shore for scientific purposes, caught fire by accident during the winter. A servant of Captain Sabine, in his endeavours to extinguish it, exposed his hands in the first instance to the operation of considerable heat; he afterwards remained in the open air in much distress of mind, at having been, in some measure, the involuntary cause of the accident, and was almost unconscious of the effects of a temperature of 45° to 44° below zero of Fahrenheit, upon his naked hands. He was at length noticed in this situation, and sent on board.

'His hands presented a strange appearance; they were perfectly hard, inflexible, colourless, possessing a degree of translucency, exhibiting more the external character of pieces of sculptured marble, than those of animated matter. They were immediately plunged into the cold bath, where they continued for upwards of two hours ere their flexibility was completely recovered: the abstraction of heat had been so great, that the water in contact with the fingers congealed upon them, even half an hour after they had been immersed. During the cold application, a considerable degree of re-action took place, attended by acute pain, from which the patient became so faint and exhausted, as to necessitate his being conveyed to bed. In less than three hours, very active inflammation had supervened, extending high up the arm, and soon afterwards each hand, from the wrist downwards, was inclosed in a bladder, containing upward of a pint of viscid serous fluid. There were, however, three of the fingers of one hand, and two of the other, in which this vesication did not form; they continued cold, and perfectly insensible; and whilst arterial action was powerful, as far as the first joints of these fingers, the vessels of their extremities were in a perfect state of collapse. During the employment of antiphlogistic remedies to reduce the inflammatory symptoms, various stimuli were used ineffectually, to restore animation to the fingers: when the inflammation began to subside, a separation took place between the dead and the living parts, and eventually the amputation of them became necessary.'

In a preceding number, we quoted Captain Parry's opinion as to the probability of a north-west passage; he also shows, that whatever may be the result of any future attempt to decide this great geographical question, great benefit has already been produced to the whale-fishery by the expedition of 1818; the whalers, since that, have penetrated, with safety, to latitudes where they previously dared not venture. As the whales are found very plentiful in Baffin's Bay, Captain Parry suggests, that the whalers need not waste the months of April, May, and June, which they have hitherto done, since, 'by entering Davis's Strait no earlier than the first week in July, I feel (says he) confident, that a ship may ensure a "payable" cargo of fish before the end of the season, without incurring half the anxiety or risk which must always attend the navigation of that sea at an earlier period of the season.'

In taking our leave of Captain Parry, we know not which to admire most, his enterprising and undaunted character, his amiable disposition as a commander, or the modesty with which he narrates his success. Even as a literary production, his work is entitled to the highest praise, and might serve as a model for journals of this description. The charts, are admirably well executed, and the engravings are very beautiful: they are engraved by Westall, from views taken on the spot, by Lieutenants Borchey and Hopponer.

If there should be any of our readers who may not see Captain Parry's work, and we should be sorry that one of them should lose the treat, they may, perhaps, express some surprise at the very different manner in which it has been spoken of by a cotemporary, who calls it a 'dry journal,' 'meagre of novelty,' 'minutely tedious,' and 'scandalously dear,' and not containing 'one farthing's worth of intelligence more than Fisher's Narrative.' The plates, says this liberal critic, in his first half-column notice of one of the most important publications of the year, are 'paltry catch-penny things,' although, the week after, he says, 'the charts are admirable, and the plates indifferent.' To those who have seen Captain Parry's work, it cannot be necessary to say one word on the illiberality (to use no harsher term) of these remarks; and we should have passed them over in silence, but for an assertion, which is still more reprehensible.

As a key to this conduct of the reviewer, it is only necessary to state, that the publisher of Mr. Fisher's work is the principal proprietor of the journal to which we allude. We have already observed, that all the journals kept on board the ships were given to Captain Parry, and in his introduction, he says, he has sometimes availed himself of them, in which case he has always given the quotation in inverted commas, and stated the name of the individual to whom he had been indebted. The reviewer, however, after devoting three distinct notices to Mr. Fisher, says, as an apology for not entering into any detail of the other work, 'Captain Parry has availed himself largely of Mr. Fisher's journal in the composition of his work.' Now, although we have gone very carefully over Captain Parry's work, we do not find that he has quoted Mr. Fisher's Journal in a single instance, although he frequently mentions him, as making experiments on the specific gravity of the ice, killing eighteen bears in two sporting excursions, erecting a monument on Melville Island, &c. And these notices of him are not from his journal, but either from Captain Parry's own observation or from the reports made by Mr. Fisher at the time. Mr. Fisher, we believe, is a very meritorious officer, and we are only sorry he has got so injudicious an advocate.

Queen Mab. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. 8vo. pp. 182. London, 1821.

MR. SHELLEY furnishes one of the most striking and melancholy instances of the perversion, or rather prostitution of genius, that we ever met with. With talents that, if properly directed, might have made him universally admired and esteemed, he has made such a total wreck of his character, that he has not only armed society against him, but has almost put himself out of the pale of human laws. While we cannot but feel some portion of pity for a man of enlarged intellectual powers thus debasing himself, we feel disgust at his licentious and incestuous principles, and horror at his daring impiety; and his very name—

'Comes over our memory,
As doth the raven o'er th' infected house,
Boding ill.'

The history of the poem of 'Queen Mab' is as curious as the subject is impious. Whether, when it was first written some years ago, a trader in blasphemy was not to be found, or that the author felt some dread at the injury a general diffusion of his work might occasion, we know not; but it was only circulated privately among the author's friends; it was afterwards, we believe, printed in the 'Theological Enquirer'; and the first three cantos also appeared under the title of 'The Demon of the World;' the notes being printed in a separate pamphlet. The whole are now, for the first time, brought together, and, as it would appear, without the knowledge of the author; the poem contains much powerful writing and many beautiful passages; but these make but a miserable atonement for the principles which it inculcates. The author is an avowed Atheist, who would shake off all laws, human and divine, and have a society rioting in lust and incest, and, as he himself terms it,—

'Unchecked by dull and selfish chastity.'

We shall not quote another line from this baneful production, and shall only observe, that the private life of Mr. Shelley is said to be in anison with his principles; and that—

'His own example strengthens all his laws;
And he's himself the monster that he draws.'

Of the character of this poem, we might have been spared the labour of criticism, since a court of equity deemed its principles such, that the author ought not to be intrusted with the guardianship of his own children, of which he was in consequence deprived. A man of Mr. Shelley's cultivated mind, cannot but possess strong feelings, and he must sometimes reflect on the ruin he has brought on himself, and on the probable injury he may have done to society; if he does so reflect, he must have a hell in his own conscience, which will torture him more severely than even the scorn of society and the abhorrence of all good men; and to that we consign him, sincerely wishing that this may be his only punishment, and that it may never be aggravated by the consciousness of having destroyed the happiness of others, either by his preceptor example.

De Renzey; or, the Man of Sorrow.
Written by Himself, Edited by his Nephew. [A Novel, by R. N. Kelly.] 3 vols. 12mo. London, 1821.

SUCH readers as prefer a series of interesting scenes and adventures, to the consistency or probability of the story, will be much pleased with 'De Renzey.' This novel is well written, and contains many striking passages; the hero is truly a man of sorrow, and has experienced almost every misery and affliction that misfortune can pour upon his victim. The scene is laid in Ireland, during that period when the country was convulsed in rebellion. The story is one of deep and melancholy interest, and the events succeed each other with a rapidity which prevents all tediousness. The reflections that are interspersed, are those of a man of cultivated mind and good moral feeling. We shall not analyse the story, but shall quote one passage, which may serve to shew the author's style, although we confess it can give but an imperfect idea of the merits of the novel. De Renzey, who was at this time in the army, had the misfortune to kill, in a duel, a brother officer, by whom he had been challenged; in consequence of which, he was committed to prison, to await his trial for murder. While there, his colonel visited him, and in a mild but dignified tone of admonition, thus expressed himself against the too prevalent custom of duelling:—

'Young man! by the laws of your country you have forfeited your life; by the laws of our service you have forfeited your commission; and by the laws of morality you have forfeited your honour; but I would not too harshly judge you. I admit the provocation was truly great, and such as might, amongst mankind in general, excuse the step you have taken. Yet do not from this infer, that any thing can exculpate the man who bids defiance to his country's laws, and takes upon himself to be the umpire of his cause. Review dispassionately the only object of a duel,—revenge: and even could we sanction such a claim, the attainment of it rests upon a doubtful chance. The young and inconsiderate man of fashion will tell you much of honour, but in thus asserting it, he undermines the very base on which he seeks to raise his towering column. I see my friend," continued he, taking me by the hand, "that you feel the impropriety of your conduct—I see that you are truly sensible of the error, which a mistaken notion of manly courage has led you into. It is with satisfaction I have observed, that you have hitherto resisted all those inducements to wanton pleasures, and all the examples of fashionable excesses with which the military life so plentifully abounds. Your present fault would more command my pity than my censure. There are abuses existing in society over which the law holds no control:—there are poignant wounds too often inflicted on the feelings of mankind, and inflicted with impunity, because the bounds of justice reach them not. To curb those lawless ruffians, who would thus destroy the peace and interrupt the harmony of society, man has been led to assert himself the justice of his cause; and did he reserve his prowess only to chastise the real injuries he might sustain, there would be solid benefits arising even from an evil source. But when we see from air-built trifles the life of man assailed,—when we see unthinking coxcombs sporting with the sacred gem of honour, and enrolling themselves in the calendar of fashion, by the very means which ought to sink them in eternal infamy, we scarcely know where to draw the line of discrimination. This is more particularly applicable to the profession of arms. The first thing impressed upon the young officer, is the necessity of maintaining his honour, and that he alone can be the arbitrator of his cause. Big with the important trust, his vigil fancy is ever on the watch lest he might unthinkingly permit some whispering breath to tarnish his new raised reputation. Thus every word or action of your life may be caught at by some untutored youth, who scarcely knows where reason or where honour lies. These are the evils against which the law provides; and let my friend reflect how incumbent it is on him, who would enjoy the blessing of society, to view such beneficial laws with that deference and awe which can alone uphold them in the public estimation.'

THE elegant translator of the Russian Anthology, Mr. Bowring, is, we have been told, an excellent linguist, and is master of we know not how many dead and living languages; he is more,—he is acquainted with one which can neither be called dead nor living—the language of Jeremy Bentham, and has actually given a very intelligible version of one of that gentleman's MS. productions. The pamphlet before us is well written, and contains much sound argument, to prove that the selfishness of our commercial policy, which fetters trade by its restrictive and prohibitory laws, is baneful and ruinous.

A Letter to the Creditors of the State concerning the National Debt. By a Barrister. 8vo. pp. 16. London, 1821.

WE see nothing of the 'Barrister' in this pamphlet, except that all its statements and arguments are ex parte and superficial. The author wishes to prove, that the fundholders have no moral or legitimate claims on the nation for the payment of the national debt; and threatens them, that unless they relinquish a portion of their claims at once, they shall, by and by, have nothing. We trust the British government will not break its faith with the public creditor, and that whatever difficulties we may labour under, our maxim will still be Fiat justitia, ruat cælum.

Hints to Teach Children the First Principles of Music. 12mo. pp. 75. London, 1821.

The author of this little work has, in the course of eighteen dialogues, so simplified the theory, or grammar, of music, as to render it intelligible to children at a very early age; and we recommend it to such parents and instructors as wish their infant charge to be instructed in this elegant accomplishment.

HORTICULTURE made astonishing progress from the time of Miller. The general introduction of forcing houses gave it a new feature. There were green-houses in England in the beginning of the 17th century; but no structures roofed with glass and heated by fire, till the commencement of the eighteenth. The skill and attention requisite to bring forward the fruits, &c. grown in these buildings, became a powerful stimulus to practical gardeners, who vied with one another in the earliness and excellence of their productions. This circumstance, together with the general diffusion of botanical knowledge, and the great number of foreign plants annually introduced, and which gradually found their way from the metropolis to the remotest provinces, rendered it necessary for gardeners to scrutinize into the native habits of plants, in order to determine their mode of culture, and thus a spirit of improvement on scientific principles was raised up and matured. The culture of the pine-apple and the grape was carried to great perfection between the years 1760 and 1790, at Welbeck, in Nottinghamshire, by Speechley, who introduced several new sorts of both fruits, and contributed by his writings to spread a knowledge of their culture. Every walled garden had now its vinery and peach-house, and many had stores for pines. New varieties of the hardy fruits, as the apple, pear, cherry, &c. were raised from seed; and almost all the culinary vegetables were improved, either by British gardeners or by importing the best sorts from Flanders and Holland, countries still pre-eminent in horticulture.

No branch of gardening made much progress in Scotland, till within the last fifty years; for the progress of every art is relative to the influx of wealth; and Scotland, till lately, has been more remarkable for producing excellent operative gardeners for other countries, than for employing them in her own. The first Scottish work on gardening was published in the early part of the last century, by J. Reid. Subsequently appeared the 'Scott's Gardener's Director,' an original work, by a great enthusiast in gardening, James Justice, of Crichton, near Edinburgh. Dr. Gibson published a valuable tract on fruit-trees; and, in 1744, Keil produced a treatise on peach-trees; the practical works of the late Walter Nicol are so recent as to be sufficiently well known.

Crichton Garden was accounted the richest in Scotland, during the life of the proprietor, who laid out great sums on it; subsequently, (i. e. from 1760 to 1785,) that of Moredun, near Edinburgh, claimed the priority, and may be considered as the first in that country in which forcing was carried to any degree of perfection. The late Baron Moncrief, its proprietor, used to boast, that 'from his own ground, within a few miles of Edinburgh, he could, by the aid of glass, coals, and a good gardener, match any country in Europe, in peaches, grapes, pines, and every other fine fruit, excepting apples and pears;' these, he acknowledged, were grown better in the open air, in England and the north of France. Dr. Duncan informs us, that on the 10th of June, 1817, a bunch of Hamburgh grapes was presented to the Caledonian Horticultural Society, 'weighing four pounds, the berries beautiful and large.' At this early season, it is added, such grapes could not be obtained at any price, either in France, Spain, or Italy. This and many other circumstances might be adduced to prove the rapid progress which this science has made in Scotland within a very short period.

In horticulture, Ireland is left an immense distance. The first stimulus given to territorial improvement there, was by Cromwell's soldiers, and chiefly by Walter Blythe, the author of a well-known and very ingenious work, 'The Improver Improved.' From Cromwell's time, things remained nearly stationary till the establishment of the Dublin Society, in 1749, when planting began to be attended to; previously to the union, however, little was done. No original work on horticulture has yet appeared; and, till within the last ten years, there were not, as we are well assured, above ten gardens in that kingdom which had forcing-houses. Now, however, improvement of every kind is rapidly taking place.

Gardening is, perhaps, more than any other art, under the influence of geographical circumstances. It is true, nature has adapted a variety of vegetables to every climate; and those which are the most useful to man, as the farinaceous grains will be found attending him almost in every country where he has fixed his habitation; still there are some climates eminently fitted for culinary vegetables, and others for fruits, and none in which the best sorts of both can at once be brought to a high degree of perfection in the open air. The finest fruits are natives of Syria, Persia, and the Indies; but the most succulent and best flavoured legumes are produced in the low moist climates of Holland and Britain.

The horticultural productions of Britain may, in variety, excellence, and quantity, be truly said to surpass those of all other countries. Not to speak of the innumerable gardens of private persons, where the richest fruits, as the pine, grape, peach, melon, &c. are raised to as great perfection as in their native countries, let us confine ourselves to the supplies sent to Covent Garden Market, and to the London fruit shops. The quantity of pine-apples, at all seasons, is astonishing; and we are informed, on good authority, that there is more certainty of being able to purchase a pine, every day in the year, in London, than in Jamaica or Calcutta. Forced asparagus, potatoes, sea-kale, rhubarb-stalks, mushrooms, and early cucumbers, are to be had in January and February. In March, forced cherries and strawberries make their appearance, with kidney beans, and various other articles. In April, grapes, peaches, and melons, with early peas. In May, all forced articles in abundance. In June, July, &c. to November, a profusion of all summer fruits. In October, grapes, figs, melons, several sorts of peaches, and the hardy fruits. In November and December, grapes, winter melons, nuts, pears, apples, plums, and, as before observed, at all times pines.

With respect to culinary vegetables, the excellence of the cabbage, borecole, and broccoli tribe, and all the endless varieties of the edible roots, presented in the greatest abundance in January, February, and March, cannot be surpassed. The quantity of radishes, lettuce, onions, asparagus, sea-kale, tart-rhubarb, &c. brought to market in April and May, is perfectly incredible; as is that of the pease, cauliflowers, and new potatoes presented in June. The rest of the season is equally well furnished, not only with every ordinary vegetable, but with such as are only used by foreigners, or occasionally in demand; such as asumpfires, burnet, saucealone, nettles-tope, dandelion, &c.

The supply of forced flowers, roses, mignonette, hyacinths, of green-house plants, and, in summer, of hardy flowers and shrubs, is equally rich, varied, and abundant; and of curious herbs for domestic medicines, distilleries, &c. upwards of five hundred species may be procured at the shop of one herbalist.

It is not enough to state that all these articles are produced; it ought to be added, that they are produced in such abundance, as to be sold at very moderate rates; and a substantial tradesman may, whenever he desires, have on his table a desert, and in his drawing-room an assemblage of flowers, not surpassed by the first nobleman of the empire, and such as could not be procured by any sovereign in the other countries of Europe. Such are the combined effects of our climate, skill, and wealth.

Notwithstanding this state of things, however, there is still ample room for improvement in British horticulture. The same results may, in many cases, be produced by more simple means, and if that which now costs a shilling can be produced for sixpence, or even ten-pence, the advantages are great and obvious. New and improved varieties, both of herbaceous vegetables and fruit trees and shrubs, may be produced, some of better flavour, others more prolific, or early or late, or larger, or more hardy. Of excellent fruits, we do not yet possess a tythe of the sorts known in warm countries. Many of these are figured and described in Rumphius's Hortus Amboynensis, Roxburgh's Coromandel, &c.; the Durior, Mangostan, and Mango, are among the number. The first two are reckoned by many superior to the pine-apple; and Sir Joseph Banks, (Hort. Trans. vol. i, p. 151,) ventures to predict, that 'ere long these and other valuable fruits will be frequent at the tables of opulent persons; and some of them, perhaps, in less than half a century, be offered for sale on every market-day at Covent Garden.'

Much also remains to be done in the way of diffusing the comforts of horticulture among the lower classes. Very few farmers know how to make the most of their gardens. Pollard trees in hedges might be advantageously replaced by the pear or the apple; and even the hedges themselves, as is done in some parts of Clydesdale, by lines of damson plums, a native fruit of great utility both for wine and pies, and which will ripen in every season. How much the comfort and happiness, the attachment to their homes, families, and country, and the improvement in manners and in morals of the labouring classes, might be increased, by improving their cottages and gardens, it is not easy to determine. It is a general remark of travellers, which holds true over all Europe, that the condition of the cottager may always be known by his garden. But we have only to compare one part of Britain with another, to be convinced how much is wanting in this respect. In short, there are few modes in which a landed proprietor could confer so much happiness at so little expense with so much eventual benefit both to himself and the country, as by rendering every cottage on his estate a commodious and comfortable habitation, adding to each a small garden. A little additional labour of his gardener would supply them with fruit trees, seeds and plants of useful culinary vegetables, and instruct the tenant in their culture: premiums or other means might be adopted for rewarding such as kept their plots in the best order. Much might be done by the horticultural societies in this way; and we intreat their attention to so benevolent and patriotic an object.

We have but little room to speak of ornamental gardening, in which much improvement may also be made by simplifying the modes of culture, acclimating tender species, and improving the popular varieties. The rose, dahlia, and chrysanthemum, shew what may be done. This branch, indeed, has prospered wonderfully during the last half century. The total number of exotics, hardy and tender, introduced into this country, appears to be 11,970, of which the first forty-seven species, including the orange, apricot, pomegranate, &c. were introduced previously or during the reign of Henry VIII.; 533 during that of Elizabeth; 578 during the reign of the two Charleses and Cromwell; 44 in the short reign of James II.; 298 in that of William and Mary; 930 in that of Anne; 182 in that of George I.; 1770 in that of George II.; and no fewer than 6756 in the reign of George III.; above half the whole number of exotics now in the gardens of this country! For this proud accession to our exotic botany in the last century, the public are chiefly indebted to Sir Joseph Banks, and Messrs. Lee and Kennedy, of the Hammersmith Nursery. There is still ample room for improvement, and as this, though generally the work of individuals, is always rendered more effectual when sanctioned by wealth and influence, it furnishes additional motives for the establishment of Horticultural Societies.

The London Horticultural Society owes its origin, in some measure, to T. A. Knight, Esq. of Downton Castle, its president. This gentleman began so early as 1795, to send papers to the Royal Society on grafting and other horticultural subjects. Finding a congenial mind in the president and some of the fellows, a sort of private Horticultural Society was formed in 1805, and finally incorporated by royal charter, in 1809. The charter states the object of the society to be the improvement of horticulture in all its branches; empowers it to purchase funds to the annual value of 1000*l.* and to make and alter bye-laws, &c. The society has held meetings and read papers from 1805; a volume of their Transactions appeared in 1812, a second in 1818, and a third in 1820. In 1817, the society became occupiers of a small garden near Hammersmith; and they have a much more extensive one in contemplation. They have corresponding members in almost every part of the globe, from many of whom they have already procured seeds and plants. They have also sent a gardener to India and China, to collect and bring home in a living state, plants of the finer oriental fruits. The society distribute gold and silver medals as premiums, as well to amateurs as to practical gardeners. Practical gardeners, it is to be observed, are admitted as fellows at a more moderate rate than amateurs, and those who are not admitted as fellows, if deemed eligible, may be admitted as corresponding members; thus the society consists of about three parts of amateurs, and one of practical gardeners.

The Caledonian Horticultural Society originated from a Florists' Society, which existed in Edinburgh, from 1803. It enlarged its views, and became the Caledonian Society, in 1809. Its objects are the same as those of the London Society; but it embraces also some branches of domestic economy unnoticed by the former, such as the management of bees, and the manufacture of British wines. It also extends its views to planting. It has published three octavo volumes of memoirs, the last in 1819. Its members are classed similarly to those of the London Society; it has procured, or is about to procure, an experimental garden, and it distributes gold and silver medals. Three-fourths of its members are practical gardeners.

Both the societies distribute medals and premiums; those given by the London Society have been chiefly presented to patrons of gardening, rather than to practical gardeners. The medals and premiums of the Caledonian Society have, however, been confined almost entirely to practical men, and the objects selected have been very judiciously chosen. The success of both these societies has been proportioned to their merit; they are a stimulus to exertion, and not only have tended considerably to improve the cultivation of our native productions, but are continually adding new stores to that bounty with which nature has stocked our 'seagirt isle.'

SOCIETY OF ARTS.

ONE of the most numerous and respectable meetings we have for a long time witnessed, took place, on Wednesday, at the Freemason's Hall, in Great Queen Street, for the purpose of hearing the Annual Report of this society, and witnessing the distribution of honorary medals to the successful candidates in the several branches of fine arts, manufactures, &c. The report contained many interesting facts, strikingly illustrative of the success of the exertions of the society. After it had been read, his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, who presided, distributed the honorary rewards, accompanying each with some appropriate observations. The first gentleman named was C. Fyfe Palmer, Esq. M. P. to whom were given two large gold medals and a large silver medal; the two first for planting 280 acres with 893,490 forest trees, and 30,700 oaks for timber; the latter for sowing 216 bushels of acorns on 240 acres. The next was a large gold medal, given to Thomas Wilkinson, Esq. of Fitzroy Square, for sowing 240 bushels of acorn on 260 acres. The small, or Ceres gold medal, was given to Sir W. Templer Pole, Bart. Shute House, near Axminster, for raising 896,000 oaks from acorns. To Henry Potts, Esq. the large silver medal, for planting 194 acres with 528,240 forest trees; and to Edward Dawson, Esq. the large gold medal, for embanking 166 acres of marsh land from the sea. To the candidates in the polite arts, there were 41 medals of different kinds distributed. Mr. W. Salisbury, of Brompton, received the Ceres silver medal, for matting made of the Typha latifolia, or bull-rush, which promises to be a source of employment to many poor persons. The Isis gold medal, was given to Mr. Bishop, for his discovery of mill-stone of superior quality. In mechanics, there were fourteen inventions. Lieut. N. H. Nicholas, R. N. received the large silver medal, for a semaphore of superior construction. Mr. S. Barlow, of the Royal Academy, of Woolwich, received the large gold medal, for the invention of an instrument to correct the local variation of a ship's compass. The gold medal was also granted to Mr. Jacob Perkins, of Fleet Street, for a most important invention of instruments to ascertain the trim of a ship, whether loaded or unloaded, at sea or in harbour. This gentleman also received the large silver medal, for the discovery of a method of ventilating the holds of ships, and warming and ventilating apartments.

Original Poetry.

THE PARTING: A DRAMATIC SKETCH.

Scene.—A GARDEN.—Albert and Amelia.

ALBERT. Nay, do not weep thus, dear Amelia!

But lessen the keen pangs of separation

By thinking of a sure, though distant, day

When we shall meet,—meet happily again.

Amelia. I hope so, Albert;—but 'tis hard to part,

'Tis very hard—why, even in infant days,

When we lay these things heavily to heart,

I could not bear to be deprived of thee.

Even for a day—while my companions played,

I sat alone, weeping, that thou wert gone—

And now thou'rt going so—so far away—

Mountains shall rise—and waves shall roll between us.

And thou wilt gaze upon the mighty things

The world has store of—soon forgetting me.

Albert. Forgetting thee, Amelia! scarce a pang

Thus leaving thee inflicts, can equal that

Thy words now give—forget thee! never—never!

Amelia. But thou wilt see the bright, the beautiful,

The wily fond—the fascinating fair

Of sunnier climes, and thy warm heart will yield

An easy prey—I know, I fear it will.

Albert. O, trust me, dearest, the true heart that roves

Unwillingly from thee—and would not go

Could it remain with safety, or with that
Which most I prize—with answer to myself;
O, trust me, my own dear Amelia,
That fond and faithful heart shall never own
Another mistress, and may never meet
A lovelier, fonder, gentler, truer one!—
And is thy love so cold and unconfiding,
That thou believest chance or change can shinke

My steadfast soul and alter my heart's truth?
And is our parting then so free from pain,
That thou must conjure up these ideal griefs
To rack thy mind withal?—Believe me, dearest,
If thou art destined ne'er to taste of pain,
Save such as my desertion would inflict,
Few maidens will be happier.

Amelia. My love,
Forgive me, if I wronged thee—I am now
A prey to fears—to doubts which ne'er before Oppressed me.

Albert. Try to conquer them, dear love.
Amelia. How conquer them!—his easy to give counsel,

But thou wilt soon be very far away.

And I shall be left lonely, sadly here.

Then how can I ensure thy love for me.

Thus far thou hast been constant, but the mind

Of man is fickle, and his heart is frail,

And wilt thou teach me to forget how Charles

(Burton, I mean, your friend and prototype)

Vow'd to poor Julia everlasting love,

And broke his vow in a far distant clime,—

Wedded that foreign girl, and brought her here

To laugh at his first love, poor Julia?

Now, Burton seemed as generous and true,

As lofty-soul'd, as thou art, and his words

Were framed to promises of constancy

As thine now are,—and my heart-broken friend

Exalted attractions far exceeding mine!

Yet he was false to her, and thou may'st be—

But I am wrong,—I see my doubts distress thee.

Albert. My sweetest self-tormentor! could I think

That thou wert earnest in these unkind thoughts,

I might again protest;—but no, these fears

Spring from thy o'erwrought feelings, and I can

Forgive, and need not seek to controvert them;

Save by repeating love's all-binding oath

I never will forget thee, or prove false

To my first love where'er I stray!

Amelia. 'Tis as thou say'st—despair runs

my mind—

I know not what I say—I am ungod

To suffer, and this sorrow makes me mad!

Albert. For thy sake, dearest, I regret that

thou

Hast notions of such deep intensity;

But, as for myself, since they prove thy truth,

My feeling is a strangely mingled one—

Sorrow with nothing satisfaction mix'd.

Thy love, I feel, will very safely pass

Through the ordeal of absence and of years!

Amelia. And must we part, and must I say—farewell!

O, God!

Albert. We shall meet

Again, dear love!

Amelia. But we must never now.

Should we not meet on earth, as something whispers

My shrinking heart we shall not—yet thank

God!

We shall unite again in heaven, and there

We lose not those we love—No, Albert, no!

In heaven there are no partings; we shall meet

Again in the bosom of love.

Albert. Why should'st thou deem that we now part for ever?

We shall be happy here when I return,—
As I most surely shall! In the meanwhile, Cherish my little favourites, (she has
Your hair and eyes, and something in her voice Almost as sweet as yours,) the lovely Anne—
That bright child, shining in such loveliness,
As seldom deigns to dwell upon the earth,—
An angel infant, in whose gentle smile
My love has lived when thou hast been away;
I know thou lovest her, and for my sake wilt Woo her from her mother, and let her be
The lightener of thy sorrows; now—farewell!
Adieu. That dreadful word again—I can —not say it!

Albert. One kiss on thy pale forehead—
And I am gone! [Exit.

TO A WILD FLOWER.

ALL hail to thee, beautiful thing!
That sprindest thy face to the sun—
Thou seemest to welcome the spring,
As I in my rapture have done.
Thou smilest amid the green grass
That's bending about the pale flower,
As over the zephyr like pass
The breezes of many a bowyer
And yet in thine innocence sweet,
Thou kissest the bosom of the day,
Like one who ne'er dreamt of deceit,
Who knows not that man will betray.
And thou, like a devotee thing,
Art spurn'd to go away, alas!
Because thou dost far away fling
Thy fragrance amid the green grass.
And yet thou art sweeter I ween,
The beautiful pastures amid—
Than all, that in gardens have been
Where, to enter, the sun is forbid!
Too like the poor peat root thou,
That's born where misfortune presides—
He feels the neglect of the proud, and must bow
To the scuder, who genius derides.

STANZAS

To ———

An: why did I ever yield my heart—
To the bright influence of thine eyes,
Since then canst not set the cruel part,
And figh to scorn my burning sighs!

A curse upon the fascination,
Which thus can lend my steps astray;
While lost in beauty's admiration,
To honour's fane I slight the way.
Yet, oh! I cannot thus deceive me,
With thoughts of what can never be;
The breath of heaven would sooner leave me,
Than woman's soft idolatry.
Then still exert thy tyranny—
Thy law's a smile—thy power's a tear;
He, who in all else would be free,
Is yet content thy chains to wear.

FINE ARTS.

MR. HOFLAND'S EXHIBITION.
WHILE we acknowledge with pleasure the important services that have been rendered to the Fine Arts by the institution of the Royal Academy, we cannot but regret that any circumstances should exclude works of real merit, or that any system of favouritism should be adopted in conducting its affairs. That the apartments at Somerset House are too confined, and very insufficient for the display of the numerous clever productions that are sent, and that the walls are fully covered,
we will admit; but that a picture by Mr. Hofland, and one of the best he has ever produced, should be excluded, or that a doubt should be expressed as to its admission, is much to be regretted; and this the more so, as the present exhibition of the Royal Academy might have been weeded, (and improved by it too), to have made room for twenty such pictures as that of Mr.
Hofland. Why, in the name of common-sense, is that wretched lumbering picture, 'The discovery of the Regalia in Scotland,' suffered to occupy the largest portion of its walls, while some beautiful productions are placed in situations where they are completely lost? This is a subject worthy of consideration, and the present president cannot do a better service to the arts, than by seeing that, in the management of the affairs of the Academy, equal justice is done to all.

Every person who has been in the habit of frequenting the exhibition of the Royal Academy, will recollect Mr.
Hofland's beautiful landscapes, of which he has sent nearly forty during the last ten annual exhibitions. This year he sent a single picture, when learning that a doubt was expressed whether it would be hung up or not, he withdrew it, and now exhibits it with his other pictures, in a gallery of his own. There are, in the whole, thirty-nine pictures; the principal one, which had been sent to the Academy, is No.

29, 'Richmond, from Twickenham Park.' The Emperor of Russia, on his visit to this country, declared Richmond Hill to be the most beautiful scenery he had ever beheld. We do not name the imperial autocrat as the best judge of landscape, but in this he only affirms what has been said by almost every traveller. To the metropolitan public the scene is sufficiently familiar, and, therefore, they will be able to appreciate the merit of Mr.
Hofland's delightful view of it. The admirable brilliance and clearness of the sky, when all nature seems to join to render her favourite spot beautiful, the stream of sunshine in the foreground, and the fidelity of tone and richness of colouring in the distance, all bespeak the hand of a master. The coup d'œil is beautiful; but the figures in the fore-ground are too stiff and formal, and they do not group harmoniously. It is, however, a charming picture, and nothing would please us better,—the scene itself, of which it is so lively a representation, excepted.
That such a picture should have been excluded from the Royal Academy, gives us an unfavourable opinion of the taste or partiality of the council who have the decision in these matters.
'No. 11,' 'A View from Richmond
Hill—Evening,' is another charming picture, in which the artist has, with the poet, traced—

'The matchless vale of Thames
Fair winding up, to where the muses haunt
In Twickenham's bowers.'

Among other pictures, we confess we were much pleased with No. 8, 'White Knights,'—No. 19, 'Sheffield by Moonlight,'—No. 34, 'Crickhowell
Bridge, on the River Ux,' and No.
31, 'Windsor, from Clewer Meadows,' in which the landscape is touched off with great delicacy; and the whole picture wears an aspect of cheerfulness which is quite delightful. The whole exhibition is calculated to add to Mr.
Hofland's well-earned reputation, and is highly creditable to the state of the Fine Arts, and well worthy of public patronage.

MR. WEST'S NEW GALLERY.

THE sons of the late venerable President of the Royal Academy have erected a gallery for the exhibition of his paintings, which may be considered as one of the most splendid ornaments of the metropolis, as well as one of the most magnificent exhibitions that ever was furnished by a single individual. The gallery is said to be the most extensive private room in England, measuring 76 feet in length, 45 in breadth, and 25 in height. This room contains nearly 100 pictures, principally of large dimensions, and on scripture subjects. If the 'Death on the Pale Horse,' the 'Christ rejected,' the 'Moses receiving the Tables,' were the subjects of universal admiration when exhibited singly, it may easily be judged how much the public attention must be excited to see these with nearly all the principal works of this great artist, collected together, and presenting a coup d'œil of unrivalled splendour and magnificence. The genius of West is here displayed to due advantage, and shews a surprising versatility of talent, which could contract itself to a beautifully finished cabinet picture, delighting by its delicacy, or expand to immense historical compositions, which astonish by their grandeur and magnitude.

SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS'S PICTURES.

The most valuable of Sir Joshua Reynolds's pictures having been disposed of, Saturday last was devoted to the sale of his unfinished paintings, sketches, first designs, &c.; these excited great interest among the artists, who, as might be expected, were the principal purchasers.

The first article of consequence put up, was a Sketch Book of Sir Joshua, being the rough note book of his tour in Italy. It contained cursory memoranda of his opinions on the great works of art in that country, interspersed with coarse sketches apparently illustrative. This book, which from its age and service, presented no very handsome appearance, excited a very spirited bidding, and was purchased by Mr. Herschel for 100 guineas.

Several similar books of stitched leaves were put up, many of them with scarcely any thing in them. One with 96 leaves sold for 25 gu. to Mr. Soane, R. A. Three small ones 30 gu. Another with 84 leaves, filled principally with designs, 30 guineas and a-half to Mr. Soane.

The unfinished pictures were sold separately: the principal were—

A Portrait of Mrs. Barrington, 17 gu. — An unfinished Portrait of Sir Joshua, by himself, 38 gu. to Mr. Jackson, R. A. — Sketches for the Portraits of the Marquis of Rockingham and his Secretary, Mr. Burke, 11l. 6s. — A Miniature Portrait, in oil, of their late Majesty, 14 gu. — A do. of his present Majesty, when Prince of Wales, 14 gu. and a-half. — An early Sketch of Sir Joshua, 20 gu. and a-half. — Moses in the Bullrushes, 42 gu. — Sketch of a Holy Family, 33 gu. — A Copy of Rembrandt's Head, 31 gu. — A Picture of Miss Beauclerc, as Una, 37 gu. The mahogany easel of Sir Joshua, very much out of repair, 6 gu.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—The benefits have commenced at this theatre very auspiciously. On Monday night, that excellent and deserving actress, Miss Kelly, had the due compliment paid to her worth and talents in a very crowded house, which was honoured with a visit from her Majesty. The play was the comedy of A Bold Stroke for a Husband, which was admirably supported in all its leading characters.

COVENT GARDEN.—A new tragedy, entitled Damon and Pythias, was produced at this theatre on Monday night. It is founded on the well-known story of those celebrated friends, which being too simple for the ground-work of a drama, the author has resorted to his invention in order to make up for the paucity of characters and incidents in the original story. How far he has succeeded in the attempt of adding to his materials without weakening the interest or violating the consistency of his main plot, will best appear from a brief sketch of the fable, as it is developed in the drama itself. The principal characters were thus cast:—

Dionysius.....	Mr. Abbot.
Damon.....	Mr. Macready.
Pythias.....	Mr. C. Kemble.
Damocles.....	Mr. Egerton.
Lucullus.....	Mr. Connor.
Cleante.....	Miss Dance.
Hermion.....	Miss Foote.

The tragedy opens with the designs of Dionysius to subvert the republic of Syracuse, in which he succeeds. Damon, a disciple of Pythagoras, indignant at the usurpation, enters the Senate while they are in the act of surrendering their liberties and appointing Dionysius their king. Failing in his endeavours to avert the calamity by reasoning with the Senate, Damon attempts the life of the tyrant; but is seized and condemned to die.

While these transactions are going on, his friend Pythias is engaged at the altar of Hymen with the fair Cleante; but the marriage ceremony is interrupted by a messenger, who informs him of Damon's sentence. Pythias flies to meet his friend, and, imploring Dionysius in his behalf, obtains permission for him to visit his wife Hermion before he suffers. His prayer is granted upon the condition that he shall remain in Damon's place, and undergo the sentence in case he should not return.—Dionysius, resolving to put Pythias to the severest trial, assumes a disguise, and informs him that means have been taken to intercept Damon and prevent him from keeping his promise. He contrives also to bring Cleante and his father into the dungeon to enforce his persuasion, and induce him to escape. But their arguments and entreaties fail. Pythias remains unshaken. The visit of Damon to his home gives rise to an affectionate scene between him and his wife and child, and the device of Lucullus, to save his master's life by killing the horses on which they were to travel, creates a suspense at the moment when it is most necessary. The preparation for the execution of Pythias, the agony of his wife, and his own anxiety, fill up the interval until Damon arrives just in time to rescue him from the axe. The friends embrace, when Dionysius appears, and in person pronounces pardon to the condemned in admiration of the friendship which they had mutually exhibited.

As a deviation from the history of this striking instance of friendship was unavoidable, the question is, whether the alteration made by the author is the most judicious; to us it does not appear so, for the overwrought anxiety of Pythias for the return of Damon at the critical hour, though very natural to a man in such circumstances, interferes with and degrades that fine sentiment of friendship which he was born to dignify. This might certainly have been avoided, if the author had made these two friends rivals for the hand of Cleante, and Damon the favoured lover; the friendship of Pythias would then have been heightened (if such friendship could receive any augmentation), by placing himself in jeopardy for his friend. Another defect in this tragedy is not only the want of interest, but the similarity between the few incidents of which the drama consists. The interviews between Damon and his wife resemble those between Pythias and his wife too closely, for the situations are the same, and the sentiments dictated by those situations cannot be widely different. Each wife implores her husband to save himself, and each is unsuccessful in her entreaties. Their respective sufferings originate in the same cause—the apprehension of losing those to whom they are the most attached; there is consequently a monotony in their grief, which prepares our feelings, not for sympathy—but resistance.

Notwithstanding these defects, the tragedy has abundant redeeming merit. Much ingenuity is displayed in the construction of the plot, which is so judiciously arranged and divided into acts, that the interest accumulates with the progress of the story. The language is good, and there are many poetical passages of great force and beauty. The throes and struggles which tear the bosom of Damon and Pythias, when by turns they are called on to sacrifice the tenderest feelings of the heart at the sacred shrine of friendship, impart to the principal scenes an intensity of interest which we seldom meet with in modern tragedy. Every advantage has been taken, which the subject afforded, of producing stage effect, and no expense has been spared by the managers in bringing it out. The acting was admirable throughout, Macready displayed great vigour, and, in some passages, quite electrified the audience. C. Kemble was very impressive in the character of Pythias, and in the enthusiasm which he displays, when he beholds his friend returning, but wishes he may be mistaken, he was very fine. Miss Dance and Miss Foote were very effective in their respective characters. The tragedy, we understand, was originally written by a Mr. Benham, of Dublin, and afterwards retouched and adapted to the stage by Mr. Shiel. It was completely successful.

Literature and Science.

Musical.—We understand that a very curious invention, or discovery, we know not well which to call it, has been made in the art of musical composition. As it has been described to us, cards are prepared, on each of which a bar of an air is arranged according to a certain rhythm and key. Four packs of these cards, marked A, B, C, and D, are mingled together; and as the cards are drawn, and arranged before a performer in the order of that series, it will be found, that an original air is obtained. The cards hitherto made, we have been told, are as waltzes, and succeed perfectly. The invention may be called Musical Permutation. It has received, however, improperly, the name of The Musical Kaleidoscope.

LUCRETII.

Lalla Rookh.—Moore's gorgeous descriptions of eastern scenery and manners, had given a new direction to the regal magnificence of the Prussian court, at a fete at the Castle of Berlin, on the 27th of January. It was supposed that the royal couple, Lalla Rookh and the Prince Abris, along with Aurenzeb and Abdallah, attended by their queens and the people forming their courts, were present at the representation of the principal episodes, by tableaux vivans formed by people, whose attitudes, remaining unchanged for a certain time, convey the idea of a living picture. For this purpose a theatre had been constructed in the hall, in which these pictures were exhibited. They consisted of scenes taken from the four poetical narratives interwoven in the poem. Each of these performances was precluded by a song from the pen of Dr. Spiker. Lalla Rookh was represented by her Royal Highness the Grand Duchess of Russia, daughter of his Majesty, and the Prince Abris by his Royal Highness the Grand Duke Nicholas of Russia. Aurenzeb was Prince William, brother of his Majesty; and Abdallah, his Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland. The rest of the royal family appeared as Indian or Bucharian princes, sons, daughters, and nobles of Aurenzeb and Abdallah, all in the dresses they were to represent. The last tableau was followed by a ballet executed by the ladies and gentlemen of the court, in the national dresses, and wearing wreaths of roses. The number of people present, is estimated to have amounted to more than 4000.

American Criticism.—As some of our readers may entertain a better opinion of American criticism than ourselves, we copy the following profound remarks on the last novel of Kenilworth, from the New York Evening Post, of April 14th. The editor, Mr. Coleman, we believe, must have a strange taste, and we leave him to all the enjoyment it is capable of affording him, and to prefer, if he wishes it, the novels of Mackenzie or Miss Burney to the Heart of Mid Lothian.—Ed.

'I will make but a single observation on this novel, for which I must beg pardon of its numerous delighted readers, or at least those who affect to be so, which is, that I have found it, (as I have found most of those from the same pen), made up of improbable incident and frivolous dialogue; quite unworthy of that serious portion of time consumed in perusing it, and which is very inadequately compensated for in the neatness of style in which it must be allowed its inanity is conveyed. Beautiful traits, it undoubtedly possessed, after all, it is a grain of wheat hid senses, as is the case with most of them, in a bushel of chaff. The world of novel readers appear to me to be infatuated in their predilection for the works of this author; who I can never believe is Sir Walter Scott, after the gross ignorance he discovers in the Heart of Mid Lothian of the laws of evidence and the practice of courts. For artless pathos, natural incident, interspersed with moral and sentimental reflections, the Julia de Roubrine of Mackenzie is worth the whole brood. In broad humour, Smollett, (bating his coarseness and obscenity;) in genuine wit, Fielding; and in busy and interesting incident, Miss Burney, (not Mrs. De Arblay;) are, I think, much his superiors.'

TO ADVERTISERS.

THE attention of Advertisers is particularly called to the peculiar advantages that must result from their Advertisements being placed in the columns of The Literary Chronicle, over any weekly or daily publication. Besides finding a station in a work not merely of immediate but of permanent interest and constant reference, it must be obvious that they came directly before the eye and under the notice of intelligent readers, who are looking for novelties in literature and subjects connected with the Arts and Sciences. Far different are the views of the readers of Journal journals, where the news of the day is the principal object of pursuit, and where the crowded miscellaneous advertisements bury or exclude those for which a literary paper is evidently a fitter medium.

* * * To insure regular insertion, it is requested that Advertisements may be sent by Thursday, at the latest, the extent of the weekly impression of the Literary Chronicle, requiring that the work should go to press early.

Review of New Books.

Travels in Georgia, Persia, Armenia, Ancient Babylonia, &c. &c. during the Years 1817, 1818, 1819, and 1820. By Sir Robert Ker Porter. With numerous Engravings of Portraits, Costumes, Antiquities, &c. In two Volumes. Vol. I. 4to. pp. 720. London, 1821.

Just as the last number of the Literary Chronicle had gone to press, we found that Sir Robert Porter's valuable work was that day published, and, however anxious we are ever to be the first to give an account of every work of interest, yet we would not even purchase that advantage at the expense of our critical independence. Although a bulky volume, as the one before us is not to be digested like a half-crown pamphlet, yet we trust that we shall, (the short space that we have had to examine it and our other avocations duly considered,) this week be enabled to furnish our readers with the marrow of the principal part of it.

Few persons combine so many qualifications for a traveller as Sir Robert Ker Porter, who is an elegant scholar, an accomplished gentleman, a skilful artist, an intelligent observer, and an agreeable writer. To such an individual, the countries he has travelled presented a field of incomparable riches and abundance; and, as he gleaned copiously, yet with great discrimination, he has produced one of the most valuable and interesting works of the day.

Sir Robert Porter commenced his journey on the 6th of August, 1817, from St. Petersburg to Odessa, on the Black Sea; and during the three years that he was travelling in the east, he kept a regular journal of all he saw worthy of observation, and wrote his remarks with the impression of the moment. From this diary, sanctioned by opportunities of comparing his own remarks with others, he collected the materials of two volumes, the first of which is now presented to the public. It will readily be conceived, that it must far exceed our limits to endeavour to give an itinerary of our traveller's route, nor would this be the most interesting; we shall, therefore, select such passages as appear to us the most important, without detaining our readers from the author by speculative opinions or unnecessary remarks.

Odessa, one of the most flourishing cities of the Russian empire, contains upwards of thirty thousand inhabitants. Several ancient churches ornament the city, but none of its buildings equal the theatre in beauty. This edifice stands in a fine situation, on a sort of square, over-looking the sea, and presenting a portico, which, at a distance, reminds the spectator of the Temple of Minerva, at Athens:—

Personal labour at Odessa and its dependencies, is excessively high. A soldier may gain three rubles per day for manual work; a regular carpenter, seven; consequently all articles of living are dear; and to lessen the expense of labour, every expedient is adopted to effect its purpose with the fewest hands. One attempt is, to divide the corn from the ear without flail or threshing machine. Several four-wheeled carts are filled with stones, and each drawn by two horses; they are then driven in a regular circle over the sheaves as they lie on the ground, carefully disposed in rows. Some of the proprietors perform a similar operation by the tramping of horses without carts.

This used to be the practice in the east, and it was a part of the Mosaic law not to muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn. During our travellers short stay at Koblinka, he witnessed a grass-fire, a calamity almost peculiar to the farmers of the Ukraine, and which often spreads a temporary desolation over vast tracts of this country:—

This terrible accident generally happens by the carelessness of the bullock-drivers, or of persons belonging to caravans of merchandise, who halt for the night on the open plain, and on departing in the morning, neglect to extinguish their fires. Wind, or some other casualty, brings the hot embers in contact with the high and dry grass of the Steppe; it bursts into flame, and burns on devouring as it goes with a fire almost unquenchable. That which I now behold, arose from negligence of this kind, and soon extended itself over a space of forty wrosts; continuing its ravages for many days, consuming all the outstanding corn, ricks, hovels, in short, every thing in its devastating path; the track it left was dreadful.

The grass-fire is scarcely less destructive to the crops of grain, than a little worm (peculiar to the Black Sea) is to the fleets of Russia:—

The progress of that worm is as certain and as swift as the running grains of an hour-glass. It preys on the ships bottom, and when once it has established itself, nothing that has yet been discovered can stop the ravages. Even coppered vessels are ultimately rendered useless, when any small opening admits the perforation of this subtle little creature.

At Kherson Sir Robert Porter visited the tomb of the philanthropic Howard; which is an obelisk of whitish stone, sufficiently high to be conspicuous at several miles distance. About six miles from the ancient city of Sardis, is still to be seen part of the great tumulus erected in memory of Alyattes, father of Croesus, and which has been described by Herodotus as of prodigious height; and by Strabo, as two hundred feet high in his time; the circumference being three-quarters of a mile. At New Tcherkask, the capital of the Donskoy country, our traveller paid his respects to the celebrated Attaman Platoff, who received him with the utmost kindness and hospitality. The palace of this chief is a fine building; a guard of Cossacks kept the gate; others, with naked swords, stood at the great door of entrance; while officers in waiting, orderlies, and every other degree of princely and military state, occupied the passages and anti-rooms:—

On being ushered as a stranger into an apartment, where I was met by the Attaman's secretary, (the only person in his establishment who could speak French,) I mentioned my name to him, and the good gentleman's joyous surprise was no unpleasant token of his chief's welcome. I did not delay being conducted to the Attaman's presence; and words cannot express the hospitable greeting of the kind old man. He embraced me, and repeatedly congratulated himself on the events, whatever they might have been, which had induced me to change my route to that of his territory. When he could spare me to proceed, he said, he would pledge himself that I should have every facility in his power to bring me to Tiflis in safety. The police-officer of Tcherkask being in the room, was ordered to provide me suitable quarters in the town; but the Attaman's table was to be mine, and he commanded an equipage to be placed entirely at my disposal. I urged that my stay must be short; but he would not hear of my leaving him till I had shared with him the honour of a visit he was then expecting from his imperial highness the Grand Duke Michael. Anxious as I was to lose no time in crossing the Caucasus, I could not withstand persuasions flowing from a heart so kindly to myself, and grateful to my country. He expressed, in the most enthusiastic language, his sense of the attentions bestowed on him by all ranks of persons during his stay in England, in the year 1814; he said, that, independent of private respect for individuals, he must always consider himself fortunate when circumstances brought any Englishman into the Donsoyko country, to whom he might evince his gratitude.

I passed the remainder of the day with my venerable host; and on my return to the city, found most comfortable quarters, to which, in my absence, my carriage, servants, &c., had been carefully transferred. All were placed under a guard of honour, which was to hold attendance there during my stay at Tcherkask.

Next morning Count Platoff called upon me to see how his hospitable orders had been fulfilled. He took me to dine with him at his house in Tcherkask, whither he was going to inspect the preparations he had ordered for welcoming his imperial highness [the Grand Duke Michael.]

The hour of dinner, in this country, is generally two o'clock; but Count Platoff always dined at five, or sometimes a little later. The manner of serving the repast differs in nothing from the style at Moscow, excepting that more wine is drank. The wines most in use, came from the Greek islands; yet his excellency boasts his own red and white champagnes of the Don, which, when old, are hardly inferior to the wines of that name in France. I drank at the Attaman's table another sort of red wine, as excellent as any from Bordeaux. It is made by a family of Germans, whom his excellency brought from the Rhine. And, from these specimens, I have little doubt that were the like culture of the grape, and similar treatment of the juice when pressed from the fruit, pursued throughout the country, the Donsoyko vineyards would produce wines that might rival, not only those of Greece, but of France and Germany.

Game is abundant here, and of the most delicious sort, particularly bustards, pheasants, partridges, &c. &c. Fish, too, is in equal plenty; and, as a luxury, sturgeon holds an eminent place. Indeed, good cheer of all kinds is procured at a very moderate expense; and, if it may be allowed to judge, by the liberal examples I saw, the bounties of nature are neither neglected nor churlishly appropriated by the natives of the Don.

Our author speaks in high terms of the Cossacks of the Don, as robust, fair, and handsome, hospitable, brave, honourable, and scrupulously religious; the Cossack women are inferior to the men in personal endowments, as well as in mental ability:—

'The usual female appearance is short stature, faces of strong Tartar features, with eyes, however, almost invariably large and dark. The style of dress is decidedly fashioned from the east. A sort of chemise, (or small shift,) of coloured linen, buttoned round the neck, and with sleeves to the wrist; a pair of trousers, of similar stuff, are covered by a silk caftan, reaching as low as the ankles. This upper garment is fastened from the neck to the bottom of the waist, with buttons of small pearls, in form and workmanship like those in gold or silver from the Brazils. The waist is bound with a girdle also, ornamented with pearls, and frequently clasped by a diamond buckle. The heads of married ladies are adorned with, literally, a silken night-cap, which is wrapped about with a gaily-coloured handkerchief, in the form of a fillet. The unmarried, (like the damsels in Russia of the lower class,) wear their hair in a long plait down their backs; but with this difference from the Russian girl,—instead of a bunch of ribbons at the termination of the plait, the handkerchief with which the head is bound, twists round the braid, nearly to its end, something in the manner of the Corsican caps.'

The author's animated description of the stupendous mountains of Caucasus, is one of his most picturesque scenes. He says,—

'No pen can express the emotion which the sudden burst of this sublime range excited in my mind. I had seen almost all the wildest and most gigantic chains in Portugal and Spain, but none gave me an idea of the vastness and grandeur of that I now contemplated. This seemed nature's bulwark between the nations of Europe and of Asia. Elborus, amongst whose rocks tradition reports Prometheus to have been chained, stood, clad in primeval snows, a world of mountains in itself, towering above all, its white and radiant summits mingling with the heavens; while the pale and countless heads of the subordinate range, high in themselves, but far beneath its altitude, stretched along the horizon, till lost to sight in the soft fleeces of the clouds. Several rough and huge masses of black rock rose from the intermediate plain; their size was mountainous; but being viewed near the mighty Caucasus, and compared with them, they appeared little more than hills; yet the contrast was fine, their dark brow, giving greater relief to the dazzling summits which towered above them. Poets hardly feign, when they talk of the genius of a place. I knew not who could behold Caucasus, and not feel the spirit of its sublime solitude arising his soul.'

The author describes, with great minuteness, the dangers and difficulties he had to encounter in passing Mount Caucasus, an attempt in which numbers of persons perish annually. On arriving at Annanour, he was obliged to perform four days' quarantine, and sleep in a hut, on a floor overgrown with mushrooms, and the windows and door admitting the rain and storm. After the first night, he preferred sleeping in his own carriage. At Tiflis, in Georgia, which is 2627 versts, (about 1700 English miles,) from St. Petersburg, there is a mountain stream, pure and cold at its fountain-head, but mingling here with the hot springs which take their rise in the adjacent heights, it derives all those medicinal properties whose fume gave birth to Tiflis. Over this steaming flood the public baths are erected. The water which supplies the bathing-houses, both for the men and women, which are distinct, is strongly impregnated with sulphur. Its degree of heat may be reckoned at about from fifteen to thirty-six degrees of Reaumur, in the several basins; but at the source of the hot stream it is about forty-two. The baths of the men are described as extremely filthy; what those of the women are will appear from the following extract. Our author says,—

'I was urged by the gentleman who accompanied me, to try if we could not get a glimpse into the baths dedicated to the fair sex. The attempt seemed wild; but, to please him, I turned towards the building, and, to our astonishment, found no difficulty in entering. An old woman was standing at the door; and she, without the least scruple, not only showed us the way, but played our sybil the whole while. In one of the bathing-rooms nearest to the door we found a great number of naked children, of different infantile ages, immersed in a circular bath in the middle of the chamber, where their mothers were occupied in washing and rubbing them. The forms of children are always lovely; and, altogether, there being a regularity, and its consequent cleanliness, attending the adjustment of their little persons, we looked on, without receiving any of those disagreeable impressions which had disgusted us in the baths of their fathers. Passing through this apartment, without any remark of surprise or displeasure from the mothers of the children, we entered a much larger chamber, well lighted, and higher vaulted in the roof. No water was seen here; but a stone divan, spread with carpets and mattresses, was placed round the room, and on it lay, or sat, women in every attitude and occupation consequent on an Asiatic bath. Some were half-dressed, and others hardly had a covering. They were attended by servants, employed in rubbing the fair forms of these ladies with dry cloths, or dyeing their hair and eyebrows, or finally painting, or rather enamelling, their faces. On quitting this apartment (which we did as easily as we entered it, without creating the least alarm or astonishment at our audacity), we passed into the place whence they had just emerged from the water. Here we found a vast cavern-like chamber, gloomily lighted, and smelling most potently of sulphuric evaporations, which ascended from nearly twenty deep excavations. Through these filmy vapours, wreathing like smoke over the surface of a boiling cauldron, we could distinguish the figures of women, in every posture, perhaps, which the fancy of man could devise for the sculpture of bathing goddesses. But, I confess, we were as much shocked as surprised, at the unblushing coolness with which the Georgian Venuses continued their ablutions, after they had observed our entrance; they seemed to have as little modest covering on their minds, as on their bodies; and the whole scene became so unpleasant, that, declining our conductress's offer to show us farther, we made good our retreat, fully satisfied with the extent of our gratified curiosity.

* Persons who bathe for health do not remain longer than a few minutes, or whatever time may be prescribed, in the water; but when the bath is taken for pleasure, these people are so fond of it, that, like the Turks in the case of opium, they profling its application to such an extent, as ultimately to be equally injurious to their strength and personal appearance. Some pass many hours every day in this debilitating atmosphere, independent of one whole day in each week; great part of which, however, is spared from the water, to be spent in making up their faces, blackening the hair, eyebrows, and eye-lashes, so as to render only occasional repairs necessary during the ensuing week. Thus occupied in the vaulted room, these Eastern goddesses, growing in renewed beauty under the hands of their attendant graces, meet each other in social conference; discussing family anecdotes, or little scandals of their acquaintance; and, not unfrequently, laying as entertaining grounds of retaliation, by the arrangement of some little intrigue of their own. For, I am told, there are days in the week when any lady may engage the bath for herself alone, or with any other party she may choose to introduce as her companion. The good dame who was our conductress, I understood, is never backward in preparing such accommodation.

There are many singular traditions respecting the mountain Elborous, which is sixteen thousand seven hundred feet above the sea. The inhabitants say, that during the subsiding of the deluge, the ark, while floating over these mountains, smote the head of Elborous with its keel, and the cleft it made in the mountains has remained ever since. Heathen traditions and classical writers affirm, that Elborous was the huge and savage rock of the Caucasus, to which Prometheus was chained; and there is still a tradition among the natives, that bones of an enormous giant, exposed there by divine wrath, are yet to be seen on its small summit.

Sir Robert, who appears very partial to the Russian government, describes Georgia as having been much improved since it has been annexed to Russia. At a banquet given by the Governor of Georgia, General Yarnoloff, our author had an opportunity of witnessing the dances and music of the Georgians, of which he does not give a favourable account; he also saw several Circassians, whom he describes as no way inferior in beauty to the long-celebrated charms of their fair country-women. The costume of the Circassians is martial and graceful; and, to show how expert they are in the use of the fusil, as well as in the management of the horse, he states, that,—

* One morning, while riding with the Circassian Prince and Colonel Yarnoloff, the governor's nephew, the former put his horse off at speed; and while going the distance of a verst, he loaded and discharged his gun six times, taking, at the same time, very deliberate aim in various directions.

The Circassians have nothing like a written law among them, but are governed by a sort of common right. On momentous occasions, the great bulk of the people meet in the open air, when a certain number of grave personages are selected to represent the nat, and are called elders; and if these agree with the prince and the nobles on the measure proposed, it is adopted. These meetings resemble the wittenagemots of our ancestors. The women of Circassia are brought up in simple and domestic habits by their mothers, a mode of education that must make the act of being torn from their parents and country (so frequently the case) doubly distressing to the youthful victims:—

* They are taught by their mothers not merely the use of the needle in decorative works, but to make their own clothes, and those of the men of their family. Soon after a female infant is born, her waist is encircled by a leathern bandage, sewn tight, and which only gives way afterwards to the natural growth of the child. It is then replaced by another; and so on till the shape is completely formed, according to the taste of the country. The first night of her nuptials, the husband cuts the cincture with his poniard; a custom something dangerous, and certainly terrific to the blushing bride. After marriage, the women are kept very close, not even their husband's own relations being suffered to visit them; but what seems an extraordinary inconsistency, a man has no objection to allow that privilege to a stranger, whom he permits to enter the sacred precincts of his home, without himself to be a guard over its decorum. For it is a rule with the Circassians never to be seen by a third person in the presence of their wives; and they observe it strictly to their latest years.

* On the morning of the celebration of a marriage, the bride presents her intended husband with a coat of mail, helmet, and all other articles necessary for a full equipment for war. Her father, on the same day, gives her a small portion of her dowry; while he, at the same time, receives from his son-in-law, an exchange of genealogies; a punctilio, on which they all pique themselves with as great a nicety, as on any point of personal honour; every man being more or less esteemed, according to the purity and illustrious names of his descent. When the first child of the marriage is born, the father of the bride pays up the residue of her fortune to the husband; presenting her, at the same auspicious moment, with the distinguishing badges of a married woman (never put on with this tribe until offspring is the fruit of union,) which honourable marks are, a long white veil over a sort of red eol; all the rest of the dress being white also. Indeed, white is universal with the women, married and single, but the men always wear colours. The wife has the care of her husband's arms and armour; and she is so habitually anxious he should not disgrace them, that if she have the most distant idea, he has used them with less bravery, in any particular action, than his brethren, she never ceases assailing him with reproach and derision, till he washes away the stain of imputed cowardice, either in the blood of his enemies or his own. At present, the professed religion of these people is Mahometan; but this sort of female heroism, speaks more like the high mind of a Spartan virgin or a Roman matron, than one of the soulless daughters of the Arabian prophet. Formerly the Christian faith had made some progress among them, but not a vestige of its ordinances is now to be found. Hospitality, however, is an eminent virtue with the tribe of the true Circassians; and it is a no inconsequential one, in the remote regions of savage men, and more savage hostility. One of the courtesies peculiarly reserved by this tribe, to do honour to strangers, I have already mentioned; that of admitting them to the sacredness of their domestic hearth; but this sort of welcome goes still farther, and even to a preposterous length (to say the least of it) amongst other tribes of the Caucasus, and particularly that of the Kity. When a traveller arrives at one of their abodes, the host orders one of his daughters to do the honours of his reception, to take care of his horse and baggage, to prepare his meals, and when night comes on, to share his bed. The refusal of the latter part of the entertainment, would be considered as a great affront to the young lady and her father. The natives of a part of Lapland, not very far from Torneo, have a similar custom; but then it is the wife of the host, whom he delivers into the bosom of his guest; and she remains with the stranger as his exclusive property, during the whole of his sojourn under her husband's roof. This fact I learnt while I was in that part of the world, during the months of December and January, in the severe winter of 1812-13.

It is remarked, that every seven or eight years, an overwhelming avalanche takes place in the Caucasus. One of these, in November, 1817, which blocked up the course of the Terek, was full twenty eight fathoms, or one hundred and eighty-six feet high, and its extent more than four English miles:—

'The pale summit of the mountain Kasibek, on the side which shelves down into the dark valley between Derial and the village which bears the mountain's name, had been seen abruptly to move. In an instant it was launched forward; and nothing was now beheld for the shaken snow and dreadful overshadowing of the falling destruction. The noise that accompanied it was the most stunning, bursting, and rolling onward, of all that must make death certain. As the avalanche rushed, huge masses of rock, rifted from the mountain's side, were driving before it: and the snows and ice of centuries, pouring down in immense shattered forms and rending heaps, fell like the fall of an earthquake; covering, from human eyes, villages, valleys, and people! What a awful moment, when all was still! when the dreadful cries of man and beast were heard no more; and the tremendous avalanche lay a vast, motionless, white shroud on all around.'

A similar avalanche stopped the course of the Terek, in June, 1776; when it impeded waters rose to the height of two hundred and fifty-eight feet, and suddenly tore a passage through the rocky barrier of that tremendous defile, and rushed onward in a devastating flood. At Amamluo, a wild haunt of a burrow-like character, our traveller experienced the kindness of the inhabitants, although their dwellings were extremely unpromising, and in form like a large rabbit hole:—

'Within is a room which fills the whole compass of the house, being from sixteen to eighteen feet wide, and often of still greater length; a size we might deem ill-proportioned to the outward lowness of the dwelling; but it is dug three or four feet below the surface of the earth, which gives a height to the apartment, not to be anticipated from without. At one end, commonly near the door, a space is always left, untouched by the spade, sufficient to form a sort of distinct chamber; but not otherwise divided from the sunken part, than by the more elevated floor. At one side of this superior quarter, we find the hearth with its chimney; and opposite to them, a small hole in the roof, to admit light. The floor is the bare earth, beaten very hard; but coarse carpets are spread along the sides for the people to sit and sleep on. No table or stools are visible. The walls are merely dried mud, with something like cup-boards left in them, to hold the little property of the family. Directly over the fire place, we find a small hollow of the same kind, for the reception of a hand-lamp, and this they never failed lighting up, whenever I happened to be their guest, though I always, on such occasions, burnt my own candles. So much for the human-habitable part of this sepulchral-like abode; the rest of it, that is, the pit, was assigned to the pigs, sheep, horses, &c. of the family.'

On entering, the Persian frontier, at Kutchivan, our traveller was particularly struck with the depopulated state of the country. The wildest steppes of Russia were nothing to its desolation, 'proofs standing every where of a once flourishing people, now swept from the face of the earth; the remains of great cities, of towns, of villages, all over the plains and valleys; with the lines of their wide communications marked by numerous watch-towers, still existing on the spots whence they had dispensed protection.' Sir Robert rested at a Mahometan village on the side of the Moschian hills: his escort, seeing a flock of sheep, plunged in among them, and seizing two or three, soon had them dressed and eaten. This was nothing more, in their opinions, than a mere exercise of their horses, and as much their right as the air they breathe.

Sir Robert Porter is of opinion, that the ark of Noah rested between the two heads of Mount Ararat, distant 12,000 yards, and called Great Ararat and Little Ararat. The height of this stupendous mountain has never been ascertained correctly; though Captain Monteith, of the Madras Engineers, has gone nearer to the mark, perhaps, than any preceding traveller. By trigonometrical observations he made at Ecrivan, he found, that from that place to the highest point of the loftiest head, was fifty-two thousand yards, and from the same spot to the minor head, fifty-five thousand yards.

Various attempts have been made, in different ages, to ascend these tremendous mountain pyramids, but in vain; their form, snows, and glaciers, are insurmountable obstacles; the distance being so great from the commencement of the icy region to the highest points, cold alone would be the destruction of any person who should have the hardihood to persevere. Our author contradicts the assertion of Dr. Reinig, that there was a volcanic eruption in Mount Ararat, in 1783, for, on arriving at the monastery of Eitch-mai-adzen, and discouraging with the fathers on the subject, he found, that 'a register of the general appearance of the mountain had been regularly kept by their predecessors and themselves, for upwards of eight hundred years, and that nothing of an eruption, or any thing tending to such an event, was to be found in any one of those notices.' They further assured him, that although several of them had been resident in the plain for upwards of forty years, that during the whole of that period, they had never seen even a smoke from the mountain.

The monastery of Eitch-mai-adzen had long been celebrated for its relics, so minutely described by Chardin; among these are the stone on which St. Gregory sat, or, perhaps, more properly, slept during his celestial vision, and the spear head, with which the soldier pierced the side of our Lord. The spear-head is very large, and has a Greek cross cut in its centre; a testimony that may be received of its former lodging, at Constantinople (as mentioned by several writers), but a direct contradiction to the pretended evidence of its having belonged to a heathen soldier. Another relic is also shown here:—

'A fragment of the ark, which had happened in the mountain, under whose shadow this venerable monastery has continued for so many centuries in perfect safety. The circumstances which brought the relic into the possession of the fathers is thus related:—Many hundred years ago, a certain pious monk of the order, undertook the hitherto unattempted (and unaccomplished) task of ascending the top of the mountain, to find the remains of the sacred vessel, and to bring away some part of it, to receive a due shrine in the church at the foot of Ararat. But ere he had gone far over the snows of the last terrible regions of ice and cold, he fell asleep, and an angel appearing to him, in a vision, told him, that beyond such a point no mortal since the descent of Noah was permitted to pass; but that, in reward to the singular piety of the content, a heavenly messenger had been commanded to bring to this, its devout brother, a plank of the holy ship; which, at his awaking, he would find at his side. When the monk arose, he found it was as the angel had said, and the remainder of the long story may easily be guessed at.

The Third Tour of Dr. Syntax in search of a Wife. A Poem. 8vo. pp. 279. London, 1821.

A WRITER who has contributed so largely to the amusement of the public, as the author of Dr. Syntax, though certainly entitled to retire at his own time, cannot, however, be quitted without regret; and although he is an octogenarian, and it would seem cruel to send a person of his age again on his travels, yet we confess we are sorry that he declares this to be his last tour, and has actually consigned the worthy hero of his muse to the tomb. The 'Third Tour of Dr. Syntax' is written in the same pleasantly tripping style as the preceding ones; the incidents are all natural, and are narrated so familiarly as to present themselves before us at once, they are not aided by the excellent designs of Rowlandson. The doctor, in his search for a wife, meets with a variety of adventures, and after making some overtures to ladies who did not entertain them, he at length met a more compliant fair, and was married. The happy pair retired to the rectory, where they had only passed two summers, when, during a fishing excursion on the Lakes, Mrs. Syntax fell into the water, when the doctor instantly—

Plung'd into the wave,
The darling of his life to save,—
When Patrick follow'd, nothing loth,
And found 'ring, nearly drown'd them both;
But they were near the grassy shore,
And all the danger soon was o'er.

The consequences were, however, fatal to the doctor, who was taken ill the next morning; the lancet and blisters were applied in vain, and he was conveyed to bed:—

Torpor then o'er his senses crept,
And he appear'd as if he slept;
But Death had given the final stroke,
For from that sleep he never woke;
Now will he o'er again awake,
His Creation's self shall shake,
And the last trump its silence break,

To call him, with a life renew'd,
To the bright gerdon of the good.'

The funeral of the worthy doctor concludes the volume:—

'When the good man had breath'd his last,
Poor Mrs. Syntax stood aghast;
Then clasp'd her pale cheek to his face,
And clasp'd him in a long embrace:
Nor did she on the horror wait,
To contemplate the work of fate;
But to the hall in hurry hied,
With little Johnny by her side.
She told her state, pale as despair,
And fill'd the house with sorrow there.
Thus SYNTAX clos'd his life's career,
With all to hope and nought to fear.
The frequent tear still in his eyes,
Worthily prepar'd the obsequies—
With all due rites to grace the end
Of his belov'd lamented friend.
O 'twas a melancholy scene,

When he was borne along the green!
With train of mourners did appear,
And scarce an eye without a tear:—
No toll the hurst field display'd,
It seem'd grief's mournful holiday:
The village wept,—the hamlets round,
Crowded the consecrated ground;
And waited there to see the end—
Of pastor, teacher, father, friend!
When in the cold ground he was laid,
Poor Patrick, from his trembling spade,
Could scarce the light dust scatter o'er
The form which he should see no more.
At first the bursting sorrow came
In floods, upon the widow'd dame;
But, by affection's care consol'd,
Unruly grief was soon controul'd;
Religion, too, had taught her mind,
In law divine, to be resign'd;
Though, for the mangled heart-felt wound,
A perfect cure was never found.

O 'twas a loss! the blessing few—
Th' enjoyment and the prospect too!
It was a tranquil calm delight;
No glare,—but ev'ry day was bright.
Though life's lone way she travell'd on,
In gloomy guise, with Little John,
The relief of the man they lov'd,
She still the Worthies' kindness prov'd;
While Dicky Bend, and his fond wife,
Had been and were her friends through life.
But, once a year, affection's claim,
The pilgrim widow always came
To Somerden, to shed a tear
Beside his tomb who died for her;
And Little John, as there he knelt,
Was taught to weep for what she felt;
And, as he wept, he scarce knew why,
Lap'd the instinctive agony.

The tomb, near path-way side appear'd,
By Worthies' sudden'd friendship rear'd:
Near it, the dark o'erhanging yew,
Sheds tears of morn and evening dew;
And, as the sculpture meets the eye,
'ALAS, POOR SYNTAX'—with a sigh,
Is read by every passer by;
And wakes the pensive thought sincere,
For ever sad!—for ever dear!
My verse has now no more to tell,
The story's done.—SYNTAX—farewell!

'Alas! poor Syntax,' was involuntarily exclaim, but cannot yet say 'farewell,' until we have introduced thee to our readers in a less painful character than in thy tomb. In the tour of the doctor, he encounters a Miss

Crotchet, who he was told prided herself on her musical attainments; the doctor, therefore, to please the lady, mentioned the subject of harmony:—

'Please her it did, for off she ran
With the same thought,—and thus began.

"You doctor, as I understand,
Are fit to aid an opera band;
And, therefore, you may scarce incline
To add to such a cross as mine:
But if your powers will condescend
To treat me as a common friend,
You shall, sir, in the evening try
My little school of harmony."
It is not oft 'mong ladies seen,
But I play on the violin.

To touch the harp and the piano,
Is what each farmer's daughter can do;
And therefore 'tis I wish to move
With those who by their science prove
An honour to the art I love.
Hence my fond mind is solely bent
To chase this arduous instrument.
I have a foreign person here,
Who at our dinner will appear,
A widow of the music tribe,
Whom I with handsome sal'ry bribe
To live with me in friendly guise,
As mistress of my harmonies:
She plays the bass, blows the bassoon,
And keeps the instruments in tune;
Teaches the parish boys to sing
Psalms, anthems, and God say the King."

'At length came the appointed hour
When, in the garden's softly bow'rd,
Where flowers and climbing plants o'erlaid,
Comb'd in to form a shaded scene,
These voices of sweet sounds appear
To wake Apollo's list'ning ear
—Miss C— began with furious force,
The doctor follow'd her of course,
While the old dame, with slower pace,
Came rumbling after on the bass;
But 'ere they got to the conclusion,
Th' harmonious piece was all confusion.
If great Corelli, from the dead,
Could have rais'd his list'ning head
And just then heard his mangled strain;
He would have wish'd to die again.
Miss was too fast by many a bar,
The old one was behind as far,
While Syntax strove their faults to cover
By smooth'ring one and then the other.
"O ho," he whisper'd, "this same trio
Will shortly end in my Adieu."

—He thought at least he would be civil
And try to check the coming evil;
For he saw in Miss Crotchet's face
That rage was working his disgrace.
If music be the food of love,
Let us another trip prove,

Syntax exclaim'd; when she replied,
'I tell you I am petrified;
To me, you humstrum, it appears,
That you have neither eyes nor ears,
You could as well bestride the moon,
As keep your time or stop in tune;
And 'twas, in an extreme degree,
Impertinence to play with me."
—Instead of time he thought he'd best,
With all good manners a retreat;
But in retiring from the threat,
With which he thought he was beat,
He overtook the o'ergrown fiddle,
And set his foot plump in the middle!
The crash produc'd a shriek of rage,
Which might he utter'd could assuage,

When, to avoid the rout and roar,
He quickly pass'd the mansion door,
And driven by Discord, sought to fly
From this strange scene of harmony,
While, with vociferating halloo,
He call'd on his man Pat to follow.

The coloured engravings are highly characteristic and humorous; and, to the lovers of light reading, few productions will afford so rich a treat as the Three Tours of Dr. Syntax.

Oliver Cromwell and his Times.

By Thomas Cromwell.

(Concluded from p. 339.)

IN the trial of Charles, Cromwell does not appear to have taken any prominent part, although his name stands the third in the list of signatures to the warrant for beheading the unfortunate monarch. 'Cromwell,' says our author, 'to hide the perturbation of his soul, enacted his part with an affectation of sport.' The sport, it appears, consisted in joking with Henry Marten, by marking each others faces with the pen, previous to subscribing their names to a mandate that consigned their sovereign to an ignominious death. It has been often asserted, on the authority of a passage in Spence's Anecdotes, that Cromwell wished to save the King, but there appears little ground for the assertion, and if he did not give an active, it was at least an un-interrupted acquiescence in all the proceedings against him.

The death of the King was followed by the abolition of the House of Peers, which was declared to be 'useless and dangerous.' A 'council of state was appointed, and the commons, to put the finishing hand to their work, ordered the statues of the late King at St. Paul's and the Royal Exchange, to be taken down, and in the niche where the latter stood, they caused the following inscription to be substituted:—
'EXIT TYRANNUS REGUM ULTIMUS.'

Six months after the death of the King, Cromwell was sent to Ireland as the Parliament's Lord-lieutenant, where, by the celerity of his movements, his military severities, and his well-timed clemency, he in less than nine months reduced the island to submission. His career in Ireland is described by his biographer as 'executioner-like,' and his ferocity in the military slaughter of nearly three thousand men within the walls of a subdued town, which he directed and personally superintended at Drogheda, is an indelible stain on his memory.

Cromwell's next campaign was against the Scots, and his Declaration, in the name of the Parliament, setting forth the grounds of his hostile march, was singularly enough addressed,—

'To all that are saints, and partakers of the faith of God's elect in Scotland.' In the early part of the war, he was not very successful, and his army had from various causes suffered immense losses, which made him determine to retreat:—

'Previously to resolving upon this step, Cromwell, stung by the pertinacity of the Scots, himself, on one occasion, headed a 'forlorn' against two or three thousand of their horse, who were drawn out on the west side of the city, hoping to bring them to a conflict; but they retreated immediately upon his appearance. One of them, however, fired a carbine at him as he "went before" his men; upon which Cromwell hallooed to the Scotchman, that "if he had been one of his soldiers, he would have cashiered him for firing at such a distance!" The man, having formerly served in England under Leslie, knew the general, and, coming over to him, told him he was "Cromwell himself," and that he had seen him in York-shire with his master, (Leslie).'

Cromwell, drawing his force, which scarcely numbered twelve thousand men, towards Dunbar, shipped his heavy baggage and the sick, when the Scots' army, twenty-seven thousand strong, closely followed him. A battle was now inevitable, and Cromwell, though feeling the difficulties of his situation, was not dismayed;—

'Accordingly, on the night preceding the memorable 3rd of September, 1650, he called his principal officers together, and gave general instructions to his army—to "seek the Lord," the customary expression for prayer in that day. After their devotions, he assumed his wonted serenity of manner and countenance; and feeling, as he said, his heart enlarged, and his spirits quieted, he bade them "all take heart, for God had certainly heard them, and would appear for them." As the daylight broke, they walked in the Earl of Roxburgh's gardens; from whence, through the morning mists, they could indistinctly trace the extended (too extended) position of their enemies. On the preceding evening, Cromwell's tact had detected an error in the posture of their right, towards the sea, from which he thought an advantage might be derived; noticing this to those around him, they concurred with him in the idea; and he had dispatched, during the darkness, a detachment to turn the flank of the Scots in that direction. This detachment attacked the enemy at six in the morning, on the eminence where they were posted, and put them in some disorder. Just as the manoeuvre on this flank was, therefore, taking effect, Cromwell, still watching the Scots through his prospective glass, perceived a general stir throughout their camp; upon which he at once daringly exclaimed, "God is delivering them into our hands!—They are coming down to us!"

He had not purposed waiting the general attack; and, instantly arraying all his remaining forces, he led them to meet the deluge of Scottish war that in reality was soon seen sweeping from their hills. Coming up with the rear of the troops who were still in close conflict with the Scottish right, he ordered an extension of his line, by which he brought both armies into a position to be "engaged all over the field." The meeting on either side was more than commonly determined; the Scotch rushing forward with the confidence resulting both from their individual bravery and the sense of their to great superior strength; the English advancing with that cool energy, the source of so many triumphs recorded in their history, and which, on so many other occasions, has taught them how to derive victory from desperate circumstances. Almost from the first clash of the hostile weapons, it became apparent to which side the victory would incline. Never did Cromwell more enthusiastically, and yet more calmly, exert himself: never, with his highly silvered locks, and piercing looks of stern composure, did he appear so like the ancient genius of war, less contending for an uncertain triumph, than assuring it to every soldier of the little band in whose every breast his energies expanded. In the thick of the fight, the sun then rising in majesty from the sea, he seized upon his appearance with a poet's feeling, united with an intense conviction of the presence and favour of the god of battles; crying aloud, "Now let God arise, and his enemies shall be scattered!" And, in truth, vain were all the advantages which the Scots derived from their numbers, and from the pouring of their masses down, while the English had to toil and fight their way up, the steep hills of this bloody contest. In something more than an hour, during which, but for Cromwell's well-judged flanking attack, (whereby several bodies of the Scots, when once routed, themselves routed entire regiments in their rear,) every man in his army might have been at least twice met by an opponent, the enemy were thrown into unextinguishable confusion. In a few minutes the route along their own line was then complete, and the English had "the chase and execution of them near eight miles."

When Cromwell returned from his Scottish campaign, he began seriously to aim at absolute power, and consulted Whitelock on the subject of the probable consequences of a man taking 'upon him to be a king.' Whitelock was against it. Soon afterwards Cromwell dissolved the Parliament by a military force; and it is one among the thousand instances of the subversion of the public journals to the powers that be, to find in the 'Mercurius Politicus,' the authorized gazette of the time, the following notice of this event:—

"Westminster, April 20. The Lord General delivered in Parliament divers reasons wherefore a present period should be put to the sitting of this Parliament; and it was accordingly done; the Speaker and the members all departing. The grounds of which proceeding will (its probable) be shortly made public."

Every day and every measure tended to strengthen the power of Cromwell, and on the 16th of December, 1653, he was ceremoniously inaugurated Lord Protector, in the Chancery Court, at Westminster, in which office he gained the respect of all the courts of Europe; and it must be admitted that, during the time of his government, the character of England was maintained with all foreign powers.

Cromwell called a new and what he called a free Parliament; but he assumed an unwarrantable dictatorship, and although he found it tolerably compliant, yet he dissolved it on the 22d of January, 1655. His speech to the members on this occasion, contains some curious passages. Speaking of the necessity he should be under to raise money and do other things 'for the benefit of the nation,' without parliamentary authority, he observes that some may,—

"Object—it is an easy thing to talk of necessities, when men create necessities. Would not the Lord Protector make himself great, and his family great? Doth not he make these necessities?—And then he will come upon the people with this argument of necessity. This were something hard indeed; but I have not yet known what it is to make necessities, whatsoever the judgment or thoughts of men are. And I say this not only to this assembly, but to the world, that man liveth not, that can come to me, and charge me that I have in these great revolutions made necessities. I challenge even all that fear God; and, as God hath said, 'My glory will I not give unto another,' let men take heed, and be twice advised, how they call his revolutions—the things of God, and his working of things from one period to another—how, I say, they call them necessities of man's creation; for, by so doing, they do vilify and lessen the works of God; and rob him of his glory, which he hath said he will not give unto another, nor suffer to be taken from him. It was (say some) the cunning of the Lord Protector, (I take it to myself); it was the craft of such a man, and his plot, that hath brought it about; and, (as they say in other countries) there are five or six cunning men in England, that have skill; they do all these things. Oh! what blasphemy is this! because that men are without God in this world, and walk not with him, and know not what it is to pray or believe, and to receive returns from God, and to be spoken unto by the spirit of God, who speaks without a written word sometimes, yet according to it. Therefore, whatever you may judge men for, and say,—this man is cunning, politic, and subtle,—take heed, again I say, how you judge of His revolutions as the products of men's inventions."

Whatever may be said in favour of Cromwell's government, so far as related to foreign policy, it is certain that he was a tyrant at home:—

Once he did not hesitate to imprison counsel of the first eminence, (Maynard, Twisden, and Windham,) in the Tower, for merely pleading the cause of their client at the bar; and would not release them, but upon their petition, couched in the humblest terms. Many also were imprisoned by him, upon warrants under his own hand alone; or without cause assigned; or secured in Jersey, and other islands, without the reach of a habeas corpus. Nay, sometimes, the civil officers received their instructions from him in the following laconic terms: "Sir, I pray you seize A. B., &c. and all others whom you shall judge dangerous men; do it quickly, and you shall have a warrant after it is done." These are facts which can be substantiated by genuine historical documents; or by the journals of the House, containing the reports of committees of Parliament after Cromwell's death, and his son Richard's accession: well were it for his credit, as a consistent character, if their authenticity could be disputed; for they are certainly rival the most flagrant acts for which Charles had been deposed, as they prove the criminal weaknesses, that are liable to beset the strongest minds, when ambition has hurried their passions beyond the bounds which reason and duty prescribe to them.

But the most sweeping instance of his tyranny was the establishment of a military government, by dividing the whole kingdom into eleven districts, and placing a military officer over each, in quality of major-general, with the most arbitrary and unlimited powers. The disturbed, though not inglorious reign of Cromwell, now drew to a close:—

An old age of cares and troubles, rather than of years, had overtaken him; and his pictures taken at this time, are strongly marked with the lines written by iniquity, in his features. Robust as he had been, the madness of parties, the estrangement of friends, the increasing disaffection of that vast army, whom to support, without parliamentary supplies, had plunged him into very considerable pecuniary embarrassments, exhausted his frame, while they lacerated, and at length greatly weakened, his mind; in so much, that the recollection of the numerous schemes for his assassination, that he had either himself discovered, or had been informed of, haunted him continually; he grew pensive, melancholy, and seemed devoured with self-disatisfaction and chagrin. Gradually, he became more and more difficult of access, and would seem uneasy in the presence of strangers; never travelled, unless surrounded with his guards; and seldom slept on two successive nights in the same apartment.

This wretched state of existence terminated on his 'beloved and victorious' third of September, 1658. He was buried with more than regal pomp, his requiem being sung by a thousand bards; and his son quietly succeeded to his power, which, however, he soon resigned, and the royal family was restored. The Appendix contains many valuable documents illustrative of the subject, and including several of Cromwell's letters; the puritanical style in which his correspondence was always written, is, however, so well known, that we do not deem it necessary to extend this review by any further extracts. We shall, therefore, only add, that, notwithstanding some inaccuracies and inelegancies of style, our author has given a very interesting memoir of Cromwell, and has better enabled us to form a due estimate of the real character of that extraordinary individual, than any preceding biographer or historian.

THE PERCY ANECDOTES.

Part XVIII. Anecdotes of Shipwreck.

OF all the miseries to which a life of adventure is subject, that of shipwreck is, perhaps, the most afflicting. It is not merely contending with the warring element in the storms of the ocean, but when the wretched mariners are fortunate enough to survive the disasters which it occasions, it is often only to perish on an inhospitable shore, or to encounter new dangers and difficulties, in all the varieties of hunger, fatigue, and savage hostility. Of all the subjects which the brothers Percy have selected for anecdote, that of shipwreck, though one of the most interesting, is the least novel; and we unavoidably meet with much that we have before seen; the only merit, therefore, that this work possesses, is, that the narratives are much condensed, and related with great spirit, by which means, the substance of half a dozen octavo volumes is compressed within the narrow limits of a half-crown 18mo.

We select three anecdotes, which, though neither the best nor the most interesting, appear to us as not the most generally known:—

'Negro Devotion.—An English gentleman and his lady, who were on their passage to the East Indies, in one of the vessels of an English fleet, paid a visit to the admiral's ship, leaving two young children in the care of a Negro servant, who was about eighteen years of age. A violent storm arising during their absence, the ship containing the two children was fast sinking, when a boat arrived from the admiral's ship for their relief. The crew eagerly crowded to the boat; but the Negro lad finding there was only room for him alone, or the two children, generously put them on board, and remained himself on the wreck, which, with the generous boy, was immediately engulfed in the ocean.

This interesting circumstance has been made the subject of the following lines, by Sellbeck Osborn:—

" Tremendous howls the angry blast!

The boldest hearts with terror quake!

High o'er the vessel's tottering mast

The liquid mountains fiercely break!

Each eye is fix'd in wild despair,

And death displays its terrors there!

Now plunging in the dread abyss,

They pierce the bosom of the deep;

Now rise where vivid lightning glows,

And seem the murky clouds to sweep—

Thro' the dark waste dread thunder roll,

And horrors kill the fugid soul!

The storm abates; but shattered sore,

The leaky vessel drinks the brine;

They seek in vain some friendly shore,

And, spirits sink, their hopes decline!

But, lo! what joy succeeds their grief,

Kieft Heaven grants the wish'd relief.

See, on the deck, young Marco stands,

Two blooming cherubs by his side,

Entrusted to his faithful hands.—

'A mother's joy, a father's pride—

Thro' black his skin, as shades of night,

His heart is fair; his soul is white!

Each to the yawl with rapture flies,

Except the noble generous boy;

'Go, lovely infants, go,' he cries,

'And give your anxious parents joy.

No mother will for Marco weep,

When fate entombs him in the deep!

Long have my kindred censur'd to grieve,

No suter kind my fate shall mourn;

No breast for me a sigh will leave,

No bosom friend wait my return.

He said, and sinking, sought the happy shore,

Where toil and slavery vex his soul no more."

'Greenland Solitude.—A Greenland whale ship from Archangel, with fourteen men, destined for Spitzbergen, was driven near an island, called by the Russians, Little Broun, in the year 1743. The vessel was suddenly surrounded by ice, and the crew reduced to a very dangerous situation. In this alarming state, a council was held; when the mate, Alexis Himkoff, informed his comrades, that some of the people of Mesen had formerly intended wintering on this island, and had erected a hut at some distance from the shore. The crew conceiving that they most inevitably perish in the ship, dispatched the mate and three others in quest of the hut. Two miles of ice intervened between the ship and the shore, and rendered reaching it very difficult. Having provided themselves with a musket, a powder horn, containing twelve charges of powder, and as many balls, an axe, a kettle, about twenty pounds of flour, a knife, a tinder box, some tobacco, and such a wooden pipe, the four men left the ship, and soon reached the island, where they discovered the hut alluded to, about a mile and a half from the shore.

Rejoicing greatly at their success, they passed the night in the hut, and next morning hastened to the shore, impatient to communicate their good fortune to their comrades; but what was their astonishment on beholding an open sea instead of ice; and not a remnant of the ship, which they doubted not had been dashed to pieces. This unfortunate occurrence, for a while, deprived them of utterance:—

" The pale mariners on each other star'd, With gaping mouths for issuing words prepared;

The still-born sounds upon the palate hung,
And died imperfect on the falt'ring tongue."

Astonishment gave way to horror and despair; and without the hope of ever being able to quit the island, they returned to the hut. Their first attention was directed to the means of providing subsistence, and repairing their habitation; which had suffered much from the weather. The twelve charges of powder and ball procured them as many rein-deer, with which the island fortunately abounded.

The Russians collected a quantity of wood on the shore, with several bits of iron, some nails five or six inches long, and an iron hook. They also found the roof of a fire-bent nearly in the shape of a bow, and of which one was soon formed; but a string and arrows were still wanting. Unable, at present, to procure either, they resolved to make two lances to defend themselves against the white bears. Tools they had none, and materials very few; but " The art of our necessities is strange,

That can make vile things precious."

The iron hook was fashioned into a hammer; a large pebble served for an anvil; and a couple of rein-deer horns supplied the place of tongs. By means of such tools, two spear heads were made, which were afterwards fixed on two strong shafts; and thus equipped, the Russians ventured to attack a white bear, which, after a most dangerous encounter, they killed. This was a new supply of provisions, which was much relished. The tendons being divided into filaments, served for strings to their bow; and some bits of iron which they pointed and fixed on fir rods, for arrows. They now were enabled more easily to obtain food; and during their abode in the island, they killed not less than two hundred and forty rein-deer, and a great number of blue and white foxes. They killed only ten white bears, and that at the utmost hazard, for these animals are amazingly strong, and defended themselves with great fury. Nine of these were killed in self-defence, for they even ventured to enter the outer room of the hut.

To prevent the scurvy, Ivan Hinkoff, who had wintered several times on the coast of West Spitzbergen, advised his companions to swallow raw and frozen meat in small pieces, and to drink the blood of the rein-deer as it flowed warm from the veins of the animal. Those who followed his injunctions, found an effectual antidote; but Feodor Wereglin, who was of an indolent habit, andaverse to drinking the blood, was soon seized with the scurvy; and under this afflicting distemper passed nearly six years, his humane companions being obliged to attend on him, and feed him like a new-born infant. When they had passed nearly six years in this dismal abode, he died in the winter, and was buried in the snow, which was dug as deep as possible to receive his corpse.

Various were the expedients of these poor men to alleviate their sufferings; a lamp was made of clay, oakum, and cordage, found on the shore; and afterwards, pieces of their shirts and drawers supplied the wick, and rein-deer fat served as a tolerable substitute for oil. The skins of rein-deers and foxes, served for bedding; and some were tanned for clothing, by steeping them in water, until the hair could be rubbed off; and then putting rein-deer fat upon them, which rendered them soft and pliant. The want of awls and needles, was supplied by bits of iron which they collected. Of these they made a kind of wire, which being heated red hot, was pierced with a knife, ground to a sharp point, which formed the eye of a needle. The sinews of bears and rein-deer, split into threads, served for sewing the pieces of leather together, which enabled them to procure jackets and trousers for summer dress; and a long fur gown, with a hood, for their winter apparel.

After passing six years and three months in this useful solitude, a Russian vessel, driven from the place of her destination, unexpectedly came in view, on the 15th of August, 1749. As soon as they perceived her, they hastened to light fires on the nearest hills; and then ran to the beach, waving a flag made of rein-deer's skin, fastened to a pole. The prince on board observing the signals, and coming to an anchor, took the wretched sufferers on board. Tears of gratitude, trickled down their cheeks at such a deliverance; for true it is, that—

" Pleasant joys,
Waxen in fulness, seek to hide themselves
In drops of sorrow."

When they embarked, they took on board about two thousand weight of rein-deer fat, many hides, the skins of the blue and white foxes they had killed, and all their tools and weapons, which had become sanctified in their misfortunes. The vessel then set sail; and on the 25th of September, 1749, arrived safe at Archangel, where they were received with transports of joy by their friends and relatives, who had abandoned all hope of ever seeing any of them again.

'Blowing up.'—The Amphion frigate, commanded by Captain Israel Fellow, while getting her foremast repaired at Plymouth, in September, 1796, blew up with a dreadful explosion. It is believed, that there were two successive explosions. The first threw Captain Fellow, Captain Swaffield, and the first lieutenant, who were drinking wine together, from their seats, and struck them against the ceiling of the upper deck. Captain Fellow, with great presence of mind, flew to the cabin windows, and with an amazing leap, which the sense of danger alone enabled him to take, threw himself upon one of the hawser, and was taken up by a boat. The first lieutenant saved himself in the same manner, but Captain Swaffield perished.

'The exact number of individuals who suffered is not known; but as the frigate was to have sailed on the following day, there were nearly a hundred men, women, and children on board, above the ship's complement. The survivors, who did not exceed ten in number, were most miraculously preserved. The fore magazine had taken fire; four men, who were at work on the tops, were blown up, and fell into the water without much injury from the explosion. The fate of a child was still more singular; the terror of the shock having made its mother grasp it fast, the under part of her body was blown away, while the upper part remained with the child fast locked in her arms.

'At the moment of the explosion, the sentinel at the cabin door happened to be looking at his watch; he felt it dashed from his hands, after which he became insensible, and how he escaped he was ignorant; but he was carried ashore very little hurt. The boatswain was directing the men in rigging out the jibboom, when he felt himself suddenly thrown upwards, and he fell into the sea. He was taken up by a boat, without any other hurt than a broken arm. One of the seamen (a Gascon we are afraid) declared that he was below when the frigate blew up, and went to the bottom in the hull; that he recollected having a knife in his pocket, with which he cut his way through the companion into the gun-room; already shattered by the explosion, and rising to the surface of the water, swam unharmed ashore.

'This part is very appropriately dedicated to Sir Murray Maxwell, of whom an excellent portrait is given.

Rhymes. By G. C. 12mo. pp. 64.

We love brevity and modesty, and this title suits us. These 'Rhymes,' unlike such productions in general, were not written for sale, (though, if known, they would scarcely fail to ensure a pretty extensive one,) but merely for private circulation among the author's friends, and we are not certain but our giving them this publicity may be deemed a somewhat unwarrantable liberty. The poems, which display an amiable and moral feeling, are written with unaffected simplicity, and the versification is easy and harmonious. We quote two short pieces as specimens:—

'INTEMPERANCE.

Where dread Phlegethon follows her burning stream

In night eternal! save the lurid gleam
From choking sulphur's vlow consuming fire,
To show the horrors of these regions dire:
Hell's grisly King, whom mortal ne'er beheld,
His fiends conven'd, and solemn council held,
To choose for premier in the shades below,
Who peopled most those realms of pain and woe.

When bending Age, by shaking Palsy led,
Tottering, approach'd the monarch of the dead,
Who justly own'd his certain final doom,
But deem'd too slow his steps towards the tomb;
The lengthen'd day by peaceful Virtue given,
Would thicken his realms, and people bated heaven.

Bade him return; since, if he held the sway,
Death's stroke were lost in unperceiv'd decay.

Next Fever came, with inward flame oppress'd,
And Phosphy rose her palpitating breast;
Then Woe Consumption shew'd her hectic cheek,

And lifted Apoplexy essay'd to speak;
While Suicide, to self-destruction arm'd,
With lurid glare, grim Death had nigh alarm'd;
Now lurking Murder shook his reeking knife,
And War and Rapine told their bloody strife;
High in the air their gleamy furies war'd,
And all their master's ghastly terrors brav'd.
Giant Famine next came stalking in their path,
And grin'd exulting on their ghastly death;
Swold Pestilence now clos'd the dreadful train,
Boasting the myriads his breath had slain.

In Hell's abyss none dared with these contend,
And Death now paused, which fiend to hail his friend.

But in the Vices rush'd! Hell view'd with dread

The desperate throng, by hot Intemperance led,
Who reud blasphemous on. When Death aloud

Exulting thus address'd th' infernal crowd:
'Ye Gods! ministers of justice here below,
Who most delight in blood and human woe,
Behold my choice! The Parent of ye all!
This bloodied form whom men Intemperance call!

Who'er within her foul embrace lies,
The wretch infatuated, lingering dies;
Or, from her arms, to thy dire vengeance given,
Is thus at once bereft of life and Heaven.

HOPE.

Oh! never say, that Hope deceives,
When she the aching breast relieves;
Of pangs too much to bear;

'Tis those insatiate vain desires,
Which every mortal bosom fires,
And seem her smile to wear.
Love shrinks from Poverty's dread name;
Sleep, too, deserts the couch of Pain;
Time hastens on our doom—
But Hope, dear Hope! man's constant guest,
Still pointing how he may be blest,
Attends him to the tomb.

DISCOVERY EXTRAORDINARY!!

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—Allow me to inform you that I have contracted an awkward habit of stooping in the shoulders, of which I find it is now too late to get rid, though I confess it exposes me to a good deal of unpleasant remark from the ladies.

There is, however, one advantage attending this graceless carriage of the body, which may occasionally compensate for its unpleasant qualities; I mean the chance a person of this description possesses of discovering any thing which may have fallen from careless pedestrians, and have been overlooked by more upright walkers than himself. For myself, I certainly cannot boast of having been very fortunate in this way till last Saturday morning, when, as I was hurrying along the Strand, to your attractive office, for the purpose of purchasing my weekly treat, I espied a paper, folded letter-wise, lying in rather a dirty condition on the pavement, near a certain office, not a hundred miles from your own. I found that this packet contained a quantity of verses written on the envelopes of letters addressed to A. A. W. Esq. These unfortunate effusions were written partly with a pen and partly with pencil, and much that had been traced by the latter was nearly obliterated, a circumstance which will account for the many chasms I shall be obliged to leave in the following copy of this interesting MS. I call it interesting, and am induced to send it you, because it is connected, in some measure, with a subject which has occupied the minds of several of your ingenious correspondents. Having said this much by way of preface and explanation, I will now, Mr. Editor, with your leave, proceed to lay before you as much of this poem as I have been able to make out:—
'Tear off the veil that darkens eye and mind—
Be ye no longer duped, ye senseless many!
Long have I warned, but ye continued blind,
Nor would accept your critic's proffer, when Offer'd him labours to enlighten you.

Who might, with obstinacy dull and hard,
Still say that Byron is a genuine bard.

Well, Byron's fate is certain, and his fall is Fix'd and immutable; he must decline,
Since I, by duty urged and not by malice,
A passion which I swear was never mine,
Have pour'd o'er certain volumes, and do call his Best poems, which the world deems wondrous poems fine,

No more than stolen goods, for—every word
He uses in them has before been heard.

His truth to nature he has stol'n from Scott,—
His elegance and tenderness from Moore,
His energy from—whom I have forgot—
(The name is in my book of written lore.)
His mystery from Goethe, whose sad lot
I mix with a fellow-feeling do deplore;
Him and myself, whom all the public sneer at, Lord Byron steals from; (by Jove they shall hear that!)

But not in English bards alone he cozens.—
To foreign stores all recklessly he flies,
And pilfers from Italian bards by dozens,
Deeming them all fair game and lawful prize.

All this we have, and will expose, that us
hence—

Forward he may fear—but not despair!
For we will pull down the Byronic towers,
And, with the scatter'd fragments, build up ours.

This work we will accomplish in despite
Of all our foes who may take his part;
We know what's true, and understand what's right,

And we will wreck his fame by force or art;
Our motives are our own, and they are white,
While he is villainous—plague on his heart!
We do not base enough the other day,
To recommend Lord Oxford's holiday?

And when thus did he not then declare
(The lying calist!) that for full five years
He had not read an English paper where
He has been roaming?—This to us appears
A falsehood palpable, yet this to swear,
That he would accuse us, we have our fears,
Although we know his publisher to send him
Every new book that's likely to befuddle him!

But we can see through this, and the plain fact is,
(We state it with contempt and not regret),
Before we honestly exposed his practice
Of mean deception, he is in a pet;
And so the meaning of this word and act is To make folks think he sees not our gazette!

But Galignani quotes us, and my lord Reads him—for this, at least, we have his word!

Here, Mr. Editor, follow some stances which I cannot wholly read, in consequence of the accident I stated above; their drift, if I may judge of it by such of the lines as are rather more legible than their companions, is to convey an idea that it is more pleasant than profitable to the "Cannynge Advertizer" to enrich himself now and then with a paltry wood-cut or so. That Surgeon Fisher's work is much cheaper, and, in many respects, much superior to Captain Parry's, a thing which he tudoity initiates may be easily accounted for, Surgeon F. being a very particular friend of his. . . —

A hint to Mr. Moore, that it is extremely improper to let Irish patriots
ism intrude itself into Irish Melodies, and an Eulogium on Mr. Craly, for heightening the effect of beautiful poetry, by mingling with it furious expressions of triumph over a fallen foe! . . .
He then makes a sudden transition, and exclaims:—
'Percy Bysshe Shelley! the unearthly bright-

And wild expression of thy fearful eye Prove thou hast forfeited thy bosom's whiteness,
And lusted thy soul to shame and perdition.
And then thy 'gait perturbed,—its wondrous lightness,—

Thy long unequal strides—all these supply
The clearest proof, that if thou'rt not the devil,
Thou art his equal in all kinds of evil.

Percy Bysshe Shelley! while almost a child,
You wrote a profligate and wicked book,
At which it seems you ne'er were weak or wild
Enough to let the public have a look;
But one it seems has printed it, beguiled
By hope of gain,—and so, by hook or crook, We'll bop on you slander, reproach, and shame,
And play the very devil with your name.

Here, Mr. Editor, in a fit of virtuous indignation, our author seems to have thrown over his ink-standish; since, in consequence of a huge stain, I cannot make out a line, though many seem to have been written, till I arrive at the following concluding stanza, which I have carefully copied, that you may perceive that yourself and your facetious correspondent, W. L. B., together (by anticipation) with Z., have been honoured with the notice of our enraged detector of plagiarisms:—

A curse upon the Literary Chronicle
For doing what no journal else has done!
Through it have we been struck by the ironical
W. L. B., whose pen's a powerful one
And keen; and now there's the laconical
More serious double Z, who carries on
This fearful combat, which is fearful only Because we in the fight are standing lonely.

I have, now, Mr. Editor, sent you all I can read of this valuable gift of fortune; and I trust you will justly appreciate my liberality in transmitting to you, without delay, a treasure, for the recovery of which, I have no doubt that a handsome reward will speedily be offered. Disdaining, however, all idea of lucre, I leave it in your hands to be treated as it may deserve.

And I am, Mr. Editor, &c. &c.
Your obedient humble servant,
J. W. D.

P. S. I forgot to state, that the original MS. is now lying in my hands, for the inspection of the curious, and may be seen upon application.

ON THE

PLEASURES OF A CHOP-HOUSE.

Particularized by W. B. L., Gourmand,
&c. &c. &c.

THERE are few pleasures to be placed in juxtaposition with those afforded by a CHOP-HOUSE; and, indeed, had we said, that all descriptions would suffer by the comparative view, we had not,
we think, overstepped the modesty of nature. For ourself, we may most truly say, that we were totally ignorant of true happiness until we had participated in that which a CHOP-HOUSE is so fitted to induct;—we had experienced our share too. To such an extent do our propensities that way extend, we even scruple not to advance, that had the divine PLATO tasted its delights, the world would have never seen (nor needed) his mighty speculations. In truth, we much marvel, that in those days of profundity, chophouses were never 'dreamt of in man's philosophy'; but, perhaps, it is better as it is; for it is a self-evident thing, that PLATO and a CHOP-HOUSE could not, by any possibility, have existed in the same age. With the incorrigible Liston, the admirers and the followers of each, would for ever have been at contentious purposes, each, perhaps, assuming for their motto,—"Plate! oh
thou reason'st well!"

Reader, we solemnly assure thee, upon our honour, (and we place our hand upon our breast most emphatically) that if thou wouldst know true and unalloyed delight, thou must enter a chop-house. Within its doors are to be found food for both body and soul —feasting for corporeal cravings and cravings intellectual—nourishment for the faculties, mental and bodily; there you may invigorate the brain while you satisfy the palate, and feed the mind with good things while you devour your mutton chop, and suck in huge dainties of wisdom while you drink your pot of porter.

A chop-house is a little world of itself.—A world!—it is an absolute universe in miniature!—and has its own peculiar system and planets, and satellites, and fixed stars, and revolutions, and its motions, annual and diurnal,
in all the wide diversity of waters, cooks, sauce-pans, stoves, and smoke-
jacks. Not Pythagoras, Philolaus, Archimedes, Ptolemy, Aristotle, Copernicus, nor all the sages that ever drew breath, with our glorious Newton to boot, ever dreamt of a theory half so exquisite, or afforded to man a treat so delicious.

In it there is provender for philosophers and fools, stoics or epicureans—contemplation for genius of all denominations,—and it embraces every species of science and of art (having an especial eye to the art of cookery). It compasses all that is worthy of the sublimest faculties and capacities of the soul. It is the resort of all that is good and glorious on the earth, the needy and the noble, the wealthy and the wise. Its high estimation is acknowledged on all hands; it has the suffrage of the world. At all times, and in all seasons, its supremacy is admitted, and its influence recognized. The name, the very name alone is sufficient to excite all that is pleasant to our senses (five; or seven, how many sever there be.): A chop-house! at that word, what a clashing of knives, and forks, and plates, and pewter-pots, and rushing of footsteps, and murmurings of expectant hosts, enter into our delighted ears—what gay scenes of varied beauty, and many-natured viands and viscous soups rise before our visual nerves—what fragrant perfumes and sweet-scented odours, and grateful gales of delicate dainties stream into our olfactory perceptions:—

Like the sweet south,
Upon a bank, a bank of violets, giving
And taking odour.

Its power is as vast, as wonderful, and goodly, and extends over all animal and animated nature, biped and quadruped, the earth, the air, the sea, and all that therein is. By its high decree, the beast may no longer bask in the noon-tide of its nature—the birds must forsake their pure ether, and the piscatory dwellers of the deep may spread no more their finny sails towards their caves of coral. The fruits and the upgrowings of the habitable world, and all created things, by one wave of the mighty wand, are brought together into this their common tomb. It is creative, too; of the lordliest independence of spirit. It excites the best passions of the heart. It calls into action every kind and generous feeling of our nature. It begets fraternal affection, and unanimity, and cordiality of soul, and excellent neighbourhood among men. It will correct antipodes; for its ministerial effects will produce a radical advantage. Its component parts go down with the world, and its principles are well digested.

But it is not alone admirable as a whole; its constituent and individual beauties are as provocative of respect as the mass is of our veneration. From forth of its unimpeachable excellencies, let us, for an instance, select one, which should ever be uppermost in our thought and beneath our contemplation. What is more delightful than a beef-steak?—Spite of lexicographers, there is something of harmony even in its name—it seems to be the key-note of our best constructed organs (organs differing from all others, only because they have no stops). It circles all that is full, rich, and sonorous; not in its articulated enunciation (we grant)—for there, to waive discussion, it may be somewhat weak and impoverished,—but, in its internal acception, there—there, we feel all its strength and diapason of force and quantity.

If, however, it were our purpose (which it is not) to descend into the detail, we should have commenced commentement, and begun with Tom the waiter: for Tom is the civilist and best tempered fellow in the globe; he is the personification of the abstract exquisite, and is endeared to every body by that eternity of smile which is hovering o'er his lips, day and night; now and for ever. Yes, Tom! thou art a good dog, and I will surely give thee immortality, ere long, by portraying thee in the CHARACTERS.

Collectively, what, would we seriously and with due gravity ask,—what is more worthy the incense of men than a chop-house? what more deserving the speculations of the wise? what more fitted to display the vastness of the human intellect? Reader, ponder; consider well what we have said, and be by us assured, that—

The proper study of mankind is A CHOP-HOUSE.

The Lotus.

THE lotus, or water lily, has been supposed by some writers to allude to the ark; but it must be remembered that the Egyptians in very early times made of the lotus a sweetish bread, so that this flower was as natural a type of plenty amongst them as ours of wheat became afterwards in Greece.

The Pygmæi.

The Pygmæi are described as a small but remarkably strong race of men; and it is singular that the same tradition exists to this day in Scotland concerning the Pechts, or Picts, whose name may be of the same origin.

America.

That there was in the western ocean a rich and happy island, or large continent, was a vague tradition or superstition among ancient nations; but of its history no one pretended to have the slightest knowledge. We can hardly think that the notions which they entertained of it were any thing more than the mere dreams which all rude people have of some happier clime and country than their own, at a distance beyond the limits of sea, or mountain, or desert, to them impassable. This traditional belief, however, was generally prevalent, down to the time of the actual discovery of the western hemisphere. One of the most ancient poems now extant in the old English language, is founded entirely on it; beginning,—

Far in sea by west of Spain
Is a land bright Colcaigne.

This land of Colcaigne, or Coquina, from whence our word cockney is derived, was the supposed seat of idleness and sensual pleasure; the graver philosophical poets placed in the same situation the abodes of spiritual purity and celestial happiness.

Lines

Overlaid spreading Lord Byron's Dedication to the Prophecy of Dante:

Endy, for the cold and cloudy clime
Where I was born, but where I would not die.

LORD BYRON.

My native isle, the cold thy clime.

Thou'rt very dear to me,

And twain'd around my very heart

Is lasting love for thee.

For art thou not the house where I

Who trust and prize me best

And if we were not so, I'd pray

Thou might'st have been

I could not wish so foreign clime

The grass might o'er my grave

Oh no! In the land that gave me birth,

Pray bless me I find a grave.

There's beauty in thy sweet green fields

To my partial eye

Beyond the orange grove and lemon tree

Of far fair Italy.

There are noble hearts and hands that dwell

Beneath the cloudy sky

That in the cause of their oppressors

Would bravely freely die

Oh! noble men, can't thou then

A land like this forget?

Surely, tho' thou canst not rightly speak

Thine heart must feel regret.

The birth-place of an only child,
Oh! let that parent bless,
And if it be but for her sake,
Learn to despise it less.

ELIZA.

THE INQUIRY.

WHAT sorrow binds Eliza's soul,
What fears her senses chain?
What doth her woe's grief control,
And what her tears restrain?
Has she not lost a virtuous friend?
Has death not closed her eyes?
And will not grief its powers lend
When her companion dies?

Say, shall her love for Mary cease,
Because that virgin's dead?
No; rather should her woe increase
That 'tis a sister's fled.
Can she not weep, or will not tears
Their dueful office do,—
Can she not weep, or why appears
That face of ghastly hue.

Sore 'tis affection binds her soul,
And doth her senses chain;
Sure 'tis distress her woe control,
And all her tears restrain.
The heart that silent suffering lives,
And weeps but when unknown,
No sorrow to another gives,—
Its woes are all its own.

TO A CHILD SLEEPING.

Emblem of innocence, in slumber there,
Offspring of her to whom thy cheek is pressed,
In thy light breathings there is thought of care,
And the warm signs that heaven thy gentle breast,

Send forth no token of unquiet rest,
But soft they come as summer's fragrant air.
Sleep on, while yet with quiet slumbers blest'd,
Sleep on, the hours too soon advance, when care

May come, and thou, no more of peace possess'd,
May 't be to ev'ry blast of fortune bare.

And thy young form, in purest beauty dress'd,
Will fade, and thy soft cheek time shall not spare.

Sleep on, while pleasure o'er thee spreads her wings,
Morn comes apace, and sorrow with her brings.

TO *****

CAN I forget; can't thou forget
The hour of pleasure we have known?
Or will thy heart with mine regret
To think how quickly they have flown?

Will thou with me one sigh bestow,
Or will with mine thy bosom heave,
Or will thou feel with me the glow,
That joys like ours behind them leave?

Thou wilt!—why need I doubt thy heart?
It e'er has been sincere to me;
Oh be it still, till life depart,
The same as mine shall be to thee.

Alike our feelings e'er have been,
Alike our thought, our wishes were,
Alike our hearts, our minds were seen;
Alike our joy, alike our care.

Unchang'd by time, still shall they prove
From every mind impression free,
Life may be quench'd, but faithful love
Shall last in sweet eternity. SAN SPIRITAIL.

Fine Arts.

MONUMENT IN HONOUR

GEORGE THE THIRD.

THE occurrence, during this week, of a grand public dinner to commemorate the commencement of a subscription for a work of art, (for such was in sooth the design till the dinner was on the table,) demands from us, as friends and annals of the Fine Arts, something both in the way of record and of observation.

Mr. Matthew Wyatt, the projector of the unfinished cenotaph to the Princess Charlotte, encouraged, no doubt, by the careless generosity with which the public had contributed to that ingenious speculation, had projected a similar one in honour of his late Majesty George the Third; nor had he any difficulty in again finding a number of highly distinguished and respectable individuals, who, pleased with the general purpose of his scheme, consented to become patrons, vice-patrons, general-committee-men, and acting-committee-men, of a subscription to be opened for carrying it into effect, but probably, (we might say certainly), without paying much attention to the particular plan of Mr. Wyatt, which seemed thus to have obtained their patronage. At the head of the list were H. R. H. the Duke of York, several other members of the royal family, and many of the most ancient nobility and commoners of the land.

Thus far, 'by St. Paul, the work goes bravely on; but it happened to occur to some kind friend of the artist, (it is an old adage,—save me from my friends and I will protect myself from my enemies,) that to give éclat to the affair, it would be a good idea to have a grand public dinner to celebrate the commencement of the subscription, not reflecting how fatal the public gaze must ever be to any thing in the shape of a job or monopoly. This, which may be considered as the under-plot of the drama, succeeded at first to admiration. The newspapers soon announced to the curious public, that a grand dinner would take place on the fourth of June, the anniversary of his Majesty's birth, at which H. R. H. the Duke of York would take the chair; and a list of persons, scarcely ever perhaps exceeded for rank and respectability on any similar occasion, would act as stewards. The expectation of the public was certes prodigiously excited; but accompanied every now and then with some rather troublesome inquiries from sensible people, as to what the great preparations were all about. At first the dinner was positively stated to be to commemorate the opening of the subscription for the nominal trophy to the honour of George the Third,—that is, to Mr. Wyatt's design of a trophy, engravings from the cartoon of which have been busily circulated, as the thing agreed, fixed, and determined on. For some reason or other, this style of announcement was dropped, and the dinner was at last only called 'A Commemorative Dinner to celebrate the Glories of the longest Reign of any British Sovereign,' (we believe we quote the jargon rightly, though only from memory.) It would seem that there were sensible people among Mr. Wyatt's crowd of patrons, as well as among the public at large, who, as the day of the festival approached, began to inquire a little more seriously than they had hitherto done, into the merits of the speculation to which they were lending their countenance. A larsum was most probably to be collected—was it certain to be rightly administered? A monument was to be raised to his late Majesty,—was the design proposed by Mr. Wyatt, such as would do honour to the spirit and taste of the age? An example of encouragement altogether unprecedented, was about to be given to an important department of art: was that department sure of doing fair play by permitting the patronage intended for it to be forestalled, and all liberal competition excluded? How these sensible inquirers answered the question to themselves, we come now to record.

The dinner took place on the day fixed, and H. R. H. the Duke of York was in the chair. After some public toasts were given, and some indifferent poetry, written in honour of the occasion by the Rev. Geo. Croly, (who can do better things,) had been recited, the Earl of Blessington rose, and, as the papers report, spoke as follows:—

He (the Earl of Blessington) came forward on the present occasion, as appearing at the head of the list of stewards, and at the head of the acting committee, who first, under the sanction of their royal chairman, brought this measure before the public. (Applause) When he looked around, and saw the illustrious persons who had that day honoured the meeting with their presence, he was sure the acting committee would stand acquitted of any charge of not having done their duty; and that it would appear manifest to every one, they made the present proceeding worthy of its object, and commemorated in a becoming manner the memory of George the Third. (Cheers.) He must, however, take leave to observe, that the first object of the meeting was, for reasons then not necessary to explain, abandoned—he meant the proposing of a subscription to carry into execution the plan of a monument to his late Majesty. What they had in view was not the offspring of a moment. For a period of twelve months the committee had laboured at this object, and acted on no other feeling than a sense of honest public regard towards the fulfilment of a public intention.—(Hear.)—The plan which they fixed upon, and which was that of Mr. Wyatt, was not chosen in preference to others, but because it was the only one of the kind offered to public notice. He (Lord Blessington) had personally undergone great labour, in the exertion of the humble talents which he possessed, to bring the matter thus forward. But he bowed to the suggestion of their illustrious chairman, who thought it proper to withdraw the intended toast of “Success to the Subscription for the Triumphant Monument to the Memory of George the Third.” (hear, hear.) lest one word should be raised in that illustrious assembly against the project offered to the public. This design was, indeed, opposed by some noblemen and others, under the impression that it would be improper to convert the funds intended for such a purpose to the benefit of one particular artist; but that, when the adequate resources were subscribed, the execution of the plan should be open to competition. There was nothing fairer than this in a general point of view, and had it been stated twelve months ago, he could have offered no objection to it; but, as the affair stood at present, one particular design had been offered, approved of, and adopted; and he, for one, could not feel himself justified in bestowing upon another person the benefit of the original idea, and depriving the real author of the copyright of his performance. (hear, hear.) under the notion that somebody coming after him could do better.

Such is the speech which the daily journals, in reporting the proceedings of the meeting, ascribe to the Earl of Blessington, and to which we have as yet seen no contradiction, either in whole or in part, from his Lordship. We have, however, great difficulty in believing that it can be either in words or in substance an accurate report of what the noble earl said on the occasion; for we cannot conceive that any British Peer (we know nothing of Lord B. personally) would willingly give currency to a very erroneous history of any transaction of importance to the public. The obvious impression which this speech must make on every one who reads it is:—1st. That a Committee of noblemen and gentlemen had spontaneously associated, and had been labouring these twelve months past to promote the erection of a monument to the memory of George the Third; and 2dly. That this Committee had fixed upon the plan of Mr. Wyatt, because it was the only one offered, meaning of course to say, or otherwise, meaning nothing at all, that other artists had had an opportunity of presenting plans, as well as Mr. Wyatt to the Committee, and were to blame for not doing so. Now, in the first place, we challenge the Earl of Blessington to shew a single act or proceeding of this said Committee of an earlier date than six months preceding the 4th of June; and in the 2nd place, we respectfully, but seriously, ask him, whether, instead of the Committee fixing upon the plan of Mr. Wyatt, it be not the fact that Mr. Wyatt fixed his plan upon the Committee, by taking the selection of that Committee upon himself; by making sure, in some degree, of personal friendship towards himself in the majority of the persons whom he chose to place upon it; and by taking care (with their concurrence we must presume) that neither the invitation nor opportunity should be given to other artists to offer a plan in competition with that of Mr. Wyatt? We need not, however, wait for his lordship's answer on these points. It is a fact too notorious in the circle of art to be denied, that of the whole affair, down to a most recent day—plan, committee, diener, and all,—Mr. Wyatt was the prime deviser and director to the exclusion of every thing like fair competition, selection, or choice,—that no other artists were ever invited to offer plans, and that no artist had an opportunity of offering a better design than that of Mr. Wyatt, except indeed Mr. Wyatt himself, to whose house all communications on the subject were ordered to be addressed.

The real state of the case being as we have now informed our readers, they need not be surprised at what follows the noble earl's speech. The illustrious chairman (seldom more illustrious than by the good sense which he has shewn on this occasion) thought proper to withdraw the intended toast of “Success to the Subscription for the Triumphant Monument to the Memory of George the Third;” that is to Mr. Wyatt's plan of such a monument—the plan supposed to be fixed on, not by the Committee—lest the harmony of the meeting should be disturbed by those noblemen who had opposed the design, under the impression, ‘that it would be improper to convert the funds intended for such a purpose to the benefit of one particular artist, but that, when the adequate resources were subscribed, the execution of the plan should be open to competition.’

We are sure that every person who knows any thing,—we will not say of the Fine Arts, but of a clear field and fair play,—must feel and acknowledge that H. R. H. the Duke of York and the noblemen to whose judgment he has shewn a deference, have deserved well of their country, for the part they have taken on this occasion. They have shown that they will not deliberately lend themselves to the abuse of public patronage for private ends, nor consent to encourage subscriptions, from a liberal people, to any design which is not proved by public competition to be, if not the best which the age can produce, at least the best which the age can procure.

The result has been, that the dinner, which was expected to seal the success of Mr. Wyatt's scheme, by a magnificent subscription towards it, has laid it for the present under the table: what it is to be the next step we know not.

It now only remains for us to advert briefly to the plea advanced by the Earl of Blessington in behalf of Mr. Wyatt's exclusive claim to the execution of the projected monument. His lordship says, that had the argument for laying the plan open to competition been stated twelve months ago, he could have offered no objection to it. Does his lordship mean to say, that there was any opportunity for bringing the argument forward twelve months ago? Was there any Committee formed and advertising for a competition of plans twelve months ago? His lordship knows there was not. What his lordship, we presume, means to say is, that nobody came forward like Mr. Wyatt, with a plan to be patronized; that Mr. Wyatt was the only speculator who was at gull-shooting with the same powder and shot, and meaning that your lordship could mean no more the simple truth. But is it any reproach, my lord, to the artists of the day—a numerous and meritorious class of men—that they have not acted as Mr. Wyatt has done?—that they have not gone a-forestalling as he has done—that they have not been baffled as he has been, and as all foretellers ought to be? Your lordship proceeded, (always supposing for the moment that the report of your lordship's speech is correct)—as the affair stood at present, one particular design had been offered, approved of, and adopted. Say rather, my lord, that a particular design had been formed by one individual, and was offered to, approved of, and adopted by a Committee nominated by that individual himself, because no other design was allowed to be brought under their notice. The affair standing thus, your lordship, it is added, was pleased for one to confess that you 'could not feel justified in bestowing upon another person the benefit of the original idea, and depriving the real author of the copyright of his performance, under the notion that somebody coming after him could do better.' What original idea? We ask; what copyright? The idea of a monument to George the Third! Indeed! Original ideas must have become cheap things, if this is to be ranked among the number. There is nothing in it, which anybody, (must we except Mr. Wyatt?) would think of claiming as an invention. Then as to the copyright of Mr. Wyatt's performance! Who is talking or even dreaming of infringing on that copyright? Be assured, my lord, the plan of your protégé is in no danger from piracy or imitation for any monument. It has a merit peculiarly its own, that nothing but itself can be its parallel, and that no artist would run the risk of being discredited in his profession by stealing from it.

We shall now bestow a few words on this much wanted plan, before we lay aside the pen. The following description of it, which we take to be official, is given in the newspapers:—

'The monument is to consist of a statue of his late Majesty, in a car drawn by four horses, accompanied by figures of Fame and Victory; the whole to be executed in bronze, and raised on a massive pedestal of granite, containing on the four sides bas-reliefs, representing his late Majesty encouraging the Fine Arts in one; in another Agriculture; in a third Religion; in a fourth Commerce. It is to be erected in a conspicuous part of the metropolis, and to be considerably larger than life.'

To make this ungrammatical jumble a little more descriptive, it is necessary to add, that in the engraving of the plan, his late Majesty is represented standing upright in the car, dressed in a morning gown, or, according to more classical pretension, after the Roman fashion, with a globe in one hand and a sceptre in the other; the figures of Fame and Victory are running along at the heels of the horses on different sides of the car; the one blowing a trumpet, and the other holding aloft a wreath of laurel. Fame and Victory each employ the remaining hands in holding the car steadily, a very unnecessary precaution, as the four horses are not yoked to the car, though in advance of it; nor even bridled, though in a reined attitude, of bounding furious velocity.

The defects of this plan must force themselves at once on the eye of taste. It is a great mass of incongruity, with not one particle of merit in it that we can discern. We marvel much who the members of the committee could be (in addition to my Lord Bessington) who could approve of such a monstrosity. First of all—of the four horses, which, to the disparagement of the good old king, are the central and most striking objects in the design.—What are they for we would ask? They are neither yoked to the car, nor bridled, and, though a complete suit of harness might be added to them, yet there is no hand to hold the reins; the hands of the King, as well as those of Victory and Fame, being, as we have shown, otherwise occupied. Now, every one who knows any thing of art, must be aware, that in any representation, where a human being is the hero, the figure of the horse is never introduced, but in perfect subordination to the man, in order the better to illustrate his power and pre-eminence. The fiery steed, under the curb of an Alexander, is characteristic, but place the conqueror at his ease in a buggy, and make the steed running off with the said buggy, and you, at once, convert the conqueror into a stupid blockhead, who is staring carelessly about him, while madness is galloping off with him to destruction. In the design before us, the absurdity is still greater. We have four mad steeds in place of one, and the king, with whom they are running off, is not seated, but standing as calmly erect, in the rapidly moving car, as if his feet were on a rock. This is not merely absurd; it is impossible. But it may, perhaps, be said, 'I can cut down the front of my car; convert it into a very pretty phaeton; make George throw away the globe and sceptre, and supply their place by reins and a good whip, and what will you say then?' It is true all this may be done, and then we shall have, as an emblematic trophy to the honour of the puissant and venerated George the Third, a representation of this monarch driving four-in-hand. A very nice expressive characteristic representation truly! But we have forgot the figures—Victory and Fame. What is to become of them? We ought, perhaps, first to ask, what brought them there? We can remember nothing like to them, by the side of four prancing steeds, unless it be the running footmen by the side of the king's carriage, when he goes in state to Parliament. If that, as we rather suspect, be the intent with which they are so placed, the idea is British at any rate; but the wings of these personages—do, pray, let these be lopped off, and then, as running footmen by the side of the phaeton and four, they may be suffered to pass. But to be serious: let it not be said, that we are shutting our eyes to the allegorical character of these figures. To look at them in that respect, is only to open our eyes on a still greater absurdity; we shall then have reality and allegory in a glorious jumble. There is nothing allegorical in the horses, nor in the car, nor in the King, who is in the car. With what consistency, therefore, can allegorical personages be brought to play a part in such an exhibition of simple reality? The fancy, besides, of Victory and Fame running by the side of the King in his chariot, has nothing in it to recommend it to adoption; it is a piece of most unimpressive and puerile common-place. From the King, the gods, the car, and the horses, let us now descend, to take a look at the emblematic figures on the four sides of the massive pedestal. We are told that the designs will be emblematic of the King's encouragement, first, to the Fine Arts, (the advantages of which must not certainly be estimated by this specimen;) second, to Religion; third, to Agriculture; and, fourth, to Commerce. 'Ought not Mr. Wyatt to have shown us sketches of these designs, before he talked of having matured a plan?' They form at least a good half of the whole plan; and, from what is to be seen above the pedestal, we suspect few persons will be inclined to trust to the artist's genius and good taste for what is to be exhibited below it. But why only the fine arts, religion, agriculture, and commerce? Is there to be nothing for his Majesty's encouragement of science, of literature, of morals, and of humanity? Such large omissions as these are conclusive and convincing proofs of the want of comprehension, judgment, and genius which distinguishes the whole design.

In making these remarks, we are not actuated by any feeling of hostility to Mr. Wyate; they are our unbiased opinions, and cannot possibly be influenced by any feeling of professional rivalry towards him or any one within the sphere of the arts. A sense of duty to the public alone has induced us to use our efforts to show, that the part which H. R. H. the Duke of York, and other noblemen, have acted on this occasion, is that of liberal yet discriminating patrons; who will not lend themselves to any plan of art that is not brought forth in the fairest manner, and which is not positively certain of being an honour to the genius of the country.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—A new serious opera, entitled Dirce, or the Fatal Urn, was produced at this theatre, on Saturday night. It is taken from Metastasio's opera of Demofonte, and is an avowed attempt to naturalize the recitative drama on the English stage; but recitative is neither adapted to the language nor the taste of this country, and the simple fact, that more than half a century has elapsed without any successful follower of Arne, in his Artaxerxes, rendered it extremely doubtful that such an attempt would be successful. The story is classic.—The wrath of Apollo has demanded of the Thracians the annual sacrifice of a virgin, and the victim is to be determined by lot. Timanthes (Braham), the supposed son of Demophoon (Horn), is secretly married to Dirce (Miss Wilson), the daughter of Cleantes. The fatal lot falls on Dirce; and Timanthes, to save her, reveals his marriage; but the Thracian law punishes with death the union of a subject with any of the royal progeny, and Dirce, from a victim, becomes a criminal. At the instigations of his younger son, Cherinthus (Madame Vestris), and of his mistress, Lemis (Miss Povey), her life is spared. Timanthes has, however, further trials for his fortitude; he discovers, that Dirce is the daughter of Demophoon, and the discovery would be fatal, did he not ascertain, at the same moment, by a fortunate coincidence, himself to be the son of Cleantes. In this event is involved the fulfilment of an oracular prediction. The wrath of Apollo ceases, and the dreadful sacrifice is abolished. There is some fine music in this piece from Mozart, Rossini, and other composers of eminence; and a few original airs have been supplied by Mr. Braham and Mr. Horn. Miss Wilson (for whose benefit the opera was first performed) executed many of the airs with great spirit; and Braham shone conspicuously in a brilliant air, 'Awake my soul to glory.' Madame Vestris sang charmingly, and Horn executed some elaborate airs with great facility. The opera was very favourably received, and, as an instance of the liberality of Mr. Elliston, we are happy to state, that he has allowed it to be performed on benefit nights.

ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.—On Thursday night, Mr. Mathews performed his Trip to Paris, with as much spirit and as much to the gratification of a crowded audience, as when it was first produced. We believe he closes his performances next week; the public, we are sure, will part with him with regret, and, with us, long for the return of the ensuing season.

SURREY THEATRE.—The performances at this house were, on Thursday night, devoted to the funds of the Masonic Charity, where, in addition to an excellent bill of fare, Brother T. Dibdin wrote a new burletta for the occasion, entitled The Secret of Masonry, which was received with great applause. We know few managers would go so far in the work of charity.

NEW THEATRE, KING STREET.—M. Alexandre having, with singular rapidity, acquired a sufficient knowledge of our language, now gives the whole of his very curious entertainment in English. This renders it still more attractive, and ensures him a continuation of the public patronage.

SADLER'S WELLS.—Several of M. Theodor's curious mechanical views and landscapes have been exhibited at this theatre during the week, and, together with a nightly change of interesting stock pieces, have kept alive the attraction of the house.—Wilkinson's benefit, on Monday, closed his engagement, and drew a crowded audience.

Bibliographical Curiosity.—There is at this time on sale, at the Museum of Mr. Ackermann, one of the most splendid specimens of bibliography which has ever perhaps been offered to the world. It consists of the History of Westminster Abbey, published by Mr. A. and this copy is characterised by the following circumstances: the letter press is on vellum, the 24 original drawings by our first artists have been introduced, the titles of the drawings and of the volumes are by the late Mr. Tomkins, and the binding unites every point of magnificence, having cost no less than 78*l.* The total cost of the three volumes in drawings, vellum, writing and binding, has been 179*l.*; but the proprietor, gratified with the honour of preparing such a book, asks no more than 150*l.* for it.

British Travellers.—Mr. Campbell, the missionary, whose former travels in South Africa are before the public, has lately returned after another journey equally interesting. He penetrated 800 miles from Cape Town, a greater distance than any other traveller whose good fortune it has been to return, and considerably beyond Latakoo. He has discovered several new and large towns. The population of some of those amount to 10,000 or 12,000 persons; the people friendly and docile, possessing much skill in the manufacture of pottery, in smelting of iron, and other useful arts; besides so intelligent as to know the value of, and wish for, the introduction of better informed artisans. They have likewise desired missionaries to be sent to them, a wish which will be doubtless complied with by the directors of that society.

An Englishman of the name of Cochrane, has reached Irkutsk on foot, on his road to America, by the north east promontory of Asia. On the 13th of September last, he had travelled 8000 versts, in 123 days, entirely on foot, and sleeps in the open air, and wears nothing but nankeen breeches.

Two adventurous English travellers in Upper Egypt and Ethiopia, Messrs. Waddington and Hanbury, may be expected to return to their native country before Christmas. These gentlemen are said to have discovered the city of ancient Meroe, spoken of by Herodotus, lib. ii., ch. 99; by Diodorus Siculus, l. 39; by Strabo, xvii.; and by Josephus, ii. 10. From the three authors last mentioned, it appears that the city of Meroe was situated in an island, formed by the Nile, the Astapus, and the Atabara (the Bahr-el-Abiad, the Abawi, and the Taccas). It was anciently called Saba, which name was changed to that of Meroe, by Cambyse, in honour of his wife or sister. The geographical situation of Meroe is thus described by Herodotus:—After quitting the island of Tacpompoo, and again reaching the bed of the Nile, 'you will travel forty days by the side of that river, the stream being rendered un navigable by rocks and sharp crags. After the land journey of forty days, you again embark, and at the end of twelve days you will arrive at a great city, the name of which is Meroe. This is said to be the capital of the nest of the Ethiopians: the only gods that are worshipped there are Jupiter and Bacchus.'

AN ATLAS OF SCOTLAND.

No. I. containing, in two Maps, the Counties of Linlithgow and Shiring; No. II. of Berwick and Peebles.

Printed for JOHN THOMSON and Co. Edinburgh; and BALDWIN, CRADOCK, and JOY, London.

* * * In composing and preparing the New County Atlas of Scotland, the publishers have adopted the following plan, which they deem best calculated to insure the greatest accuracy.—Reductions are made from surveys; or, in defect of these, drawings are made from the best materials, on a scale so large as to admit of an exact delineation of the features of the country, and the names of the names of places, of whatever importance.

The drawings are then put into the hands of hand-surveyors, or other intelligent persons, whose occupations have been favourably for acquiring a correct acquaintance with the portion of the county within which they reside. The persons who execute this important charge oblige themselves to guarantee the accuracy of the drawing, by subscribing their names in attestation of their opinion of its correctness. The map of each county will have, at least, the names of four persons of credit and respectability, to warrant it to be a faithful and correct delineation of that county. The maps will be issued out in numbers, at short intervals, each number containing two sheets, and the whole will be completed in eighteen or twenty-four months. Towards the close of the publication, will be given an account of the progressive Geography of Scotland, with some view characteristic of the features of the country, and letter-press notices descriptive of the same. There will also be a consulting Index, pointing out every place on the map, by means of letters or squares.

In the course of Publication, by the same, A CLASSICAL AND HISTORICAL ATLAS, founded on D'Anville, with a Series of additional Maps, illustrating all the remarkable Epochs in the Annals of the World. When complete, the price will be from 8l. 8s. to 10l. 10s.

Review of New Books.

Notes on the Cape of Good Hope, made during an Excursion in that Country, in the Year 1820. 8vo. pp. 207. London, 1821.

Since the British government determined to encourage, or rather to divert emigration to a new settlement at the Cape of Good Hope, the public interest has been strongly excited respecting it; and although we are pretty well acquainted with the general character of the colony, yet little satisfactory intelligence has hitherto been received as to the situation of those emigrants who accepted the offer of the British government to form a new settlement at Algora Bay. Of the importance of the Cape of Good Hope to England, in a commercial point of view, there can be but one opinion; and it is certainly desirable that we should strengthen our power there as much as possible; but there is not the slightest prospect of its ever becoming a flourishing colony. The soil is extremely barren and unproductive, and were it even otherwise, the difficulty of conveying the produce by land conveyance would so enhance the price, as to render it too dear for European markets.

The author of these Notes reached the Cape of Good Hope in January, 1820, and remained there some months; his information, therefore, has the advantage of coming before us with all its freshness, and as he appears to be not only an intelligent but also an unprejudiced observer, we consider his statements entitled to full credit, and of considerable importance. Although it is our intention to dwell more particularly on his account of the new settlement, yet we shall quote a few of his observations in the earlier part of this clever and useful little volume. The country in the immediate vicinity of Cape Town is a flat unproductive sandy waste, with the exception of the village of Wynberg, distant about six miles, and where many of the merchants have country houses. The greatest part of the grain brought to the Cape market, is grown in the Koeberg, or Corn Country, lying between thirty and forty miles to the north of Cape Town. The soil here would be productive but for the want of water; the price of farms is high: an estate with tolerably good farm-buildings, but very indifferent house, lately sold for 3000*l*. In a journey up the country, the author is led to make the following observations on travelling in this desert region. 'We're he called on to decide the Bowles' controversy, it may be seen that he would incline in favour of Campbell and Lord Byron as to art and nature:—

'The traveller in Southern Africa soon becomes sensible how much the delight of travelling depends upon adventitious circumstances, not necessarily connected with the ground he traverses; and that the contemplation of mere terrestrial nature, unstamped with any images of departed greatness, awakening no historical recollections, but harbouring in its bosom only ignorance and barbarity, becomes even an humiliating occupation. It is not the soil we tread on, but the "deeds that have been done in the clime," that speak like living voices, and awaken corresponding emotions within us—the imperishable fame of the mighty dead:—

"Quod non imber edax, non aqua impotens Possit diruere," has never flung the witchery of its enchantment over this dreary region; its inhabitants have rotted away like the "grass of the field;" or if a "village Hampden," or a "bosom pregnant with celestial fire," ever felt the glow of patriotism, or the inspiration of genius, no stone has arisen to tell the tale: the deserts are without pyramids, and the towns without a trophy. Man is here to be found but one step removed from the baboons that surround him; possessing all the barbarity, without the dignified independence of the savage. By the side of his wretched hut the Hottentot may be seen, seated in passive indolence; or, perhaps, regaling himself with the undressed entrails and blood of a sheep, while the partner of his life is picking a bone of carrion at his side. Although Rousseau laments our deviation from the path of primitive simplicity, and declares, "que l'état de réflexion est un état contre nature, et que l'homme qui médite est un animal dépravé," few would probably feel inclined to exchange their depravity for such nature and garbage, even if they could regain their tails, by the experiment which Monboddo and other philosophers think we have lost by our degenerate habits.

The Dutch farmers have no opportunity of realizing money, there being no market for produce, but at an immense distance; there is consequently no encouragement to the labours of the agriculturist; they occasionally sell horses and cattle, or send their waggon to Cape Town, laden with grain, in exchange for which they take home groceries, clothes, &c.; but this is rather a journey of idleness and amusement than of profit. The farms have nothing of neatness about them; there are no inclosures, except, perhaps, round the vineyard or garden. The farmers drink their own sour wine; burnt barley is their coffee, and they sometimes make tea of a plant which grows on the hills. These Dutch bores view with jealousy the several European adventurers who have purchased land among them, and feel still greater alarm at the extensive plan of colonization adopted by the British government. 'They look upon the landing of a threshing machine with as much amusement as the inhabitants of Troy did upon the wooden horse; and as they are strenuous opposers of these new-fangled inventions, so they are proportionably mortified at the success of foreign ingenuity.' The manners of the boers are, however, prepossessing to travellers, and as there are no inns, their hospitality becomes doubly valuable: 'Supper is their grand meal, which takes place shortly after sun-set, and consists of mutton, roast or boiled, with potatoes, all swimming in sheep-tail fat, but not disgusting or unpalatable; the bread is white, but often sour; to this is added a large tureen of rice-milk, boiled with sugar and cinnamon; a very savoury morsel.' The price of labour is high: an industrious labourer or mechanic will earn from fifteen to twenty rix-dollars per month, including his board and lodging. Of Dutch agriculture we are told, that—'It is the same now as when they first colonized the country, and if their stagnant genius was not disturbed by the example of our countrymen, I question whether it would ever receive any improvement. Nothing, in fact, can savour more of primitive barbarity. Their plough is a couple of heavy boards nailed together, and armed with a clumsy share, which it requires a dozen oxen to work. Their harrow, if they use any at all, is a few brambles. Their waggons, (which will carry about thirty Winchester bushels, or a ton weight, and are generally drawn by sixteen and sometimes twenty oxen,) are well constructed to go tilting up and down the precipitous passes of the Kloofs with safety; but they have no variety for the different roads. The small one-horse cart, so useful upon a farm and upon hard roads, is unknown. The Dutch loan farms, the most common tenure in the colony, were originally measured out and allotted in the following manner. A stake was stuck in the ground as near the centre of the future estate as could be guessed, and a man, starting from thence, walked for half an hour in a straight line, to each of the four points of the compass, giving thus the radii of a circle that comprised a space of about six thousand acres. Small rents were reserved upon the grants, that were made renewable at the option of the government; this renewal is now grown into a customary right. Many of the farms have been enfranchised, and other alterations in the original tenures have taken place, which it would be unnecessary for our present purpose to point out; but no subdivision has been thought of, so that a farm or place is usually of the dimensions alluded to, viz. about six thousand acres. There were small freehold estates, originally granted, of about two hundred acres in extent; but they are not numerous.'

The method of beating out the corn is similar to that used at Odessa, noticed in our last. Eighty horses are sometimes employed in trampling the grain from the sheaves, working by relays of forty at a time. The winnowing is performed by tossing the trampled grain in the air, with shovels, or by exposing it to the wind in a sieve.

The Dutch colonial laws are still in force at the Cape, but the English are all clamorous to have them superseded by their own. The criminal code is remarkable for its lenity; capital punishment is not inflicted without an admission of guilt; and, therefore, it is at the option of the condemned, either to linger out their days in prison, or undergo the sentence of the law. Since the arrival of the English, torture (which was used to extort a confession of guilt,) has been abolished. The law of divorce is curious. A divorce is obtained upon application, upon the simple grounds of domestic unhappiness, resulting from bad temper, or the like infirmities of disposition, and the parties are with mutual consent permitted to marry again:—

'A curious decision took place a little time ago; an English prentice boy had been flogged, according to an order, improperly and unwarrantably, (as it afterwards appeared,) given by the landrost of the district. The boy made his complaint before the court at Cape Town, and the court decreed, that the master, and the man who had flogged the boy, (in pursuance of a written order which was produced,) should be fined in equal proportions.'

Our author recommends that part of the colony, lying between Mossel Bay and George Town, as possessing the most decided advantages over every other part of the colony, as a place of settlement for an English farmer. There are few farms rented, which arises from the infant state of the colony, and the desire every man has of becoming a landholder. The author thinks 'a practical farmer, who, taking with him a good set of labourers, possesses capital enough to stock a farm, and set himself going, say 600l. or 700l. might with activity and industry, do well; but he must not look forward to large or immediate profits:—

'That a wide field is open for labour and industry is beyond a doubt; but if any man embarks for the Cape of Good Hope with the idea of realizing, by agricultural pursuits, large sums of money, or has so partaken of the prevailing delusion, as to imagine that he is to be exempt from the curse of toiling in the sweat of his brow, he will not be long in finding his mistake. Here is no manna to be gathered in indolence, and even sheep-skill fat does not overflow the land. Perhaps there is no country in the world where the mere necessities of life are more easily supplied; but to ensure a comfortable subsistence, no inconsiderable degree of exertion is requisite. A good economist of labour and of money, possessing a practical knowledge of husbandry, who can command from 1000l. to 2000l. when upon the spot, and who comes properly provided with steady men, cannot fail of succeeding; that is, he will be enabled to purchase an estate in an eligible situation in the colony, in the vicinity of one of the bays, with house and buildings; the latter very indifferent, it is true, but timber will be within his reach, and he may improve at leisure.'

'If a settler comes provided with good letters of credit, and can prevail upon two respectable inhabitants to become security for him, (for this is generally insisted on,) he will obtain six or twelve months credit in the purchase of an estate, which is generally paid for by two or more instalments, according to the agreement; a certain portion of the money being paid down. Not unfrequently, the principal is suffered to remain for years upon the security of the property and the bond of the two sureties; and there is, perhaps, no country where great purchases are so easily accomplished with little money. More than one half of the estates in the colony are thus unpaid for, especially by the Dutch proprietors; and whatever exterior indications of riches may be visible, they possess in general but the mere semblance of wealth, without the substance.

'Money is advanced by the bank at Cape Town, upon good security, at six per cent.; but there is always a long string of applicants upon the list, and it is a rule to supply them in regular succession. The sum advanced will only amount to the value of one-third of the property, if in the country, and one-half if in the town. The emigrant will thus have the greater part of his capital in hand, to lay out in stock of all kinds. Sheep and cattle are not dear; the former average three rix-dollars in the country, and four near Cape Town; the latter about thirty rix-dollars per head: a rise in these may be looked for.

'It would be desirable that he should provide himself with a good stock of implements at home; such only as are adapted to strong soils should be selected, in consequence of the drought. The broad wheels and bodies of waggons and carts, ready to be put together upon landing, would save time and labour, and probably expense. Seeds of all kinds, excepting wheat, should by no means be omitted. The greatest care should be taken in selecting good and steady men, whom he can depend upon, and these should be bound in articles to serve him for seven years. He may make his agreement with them upon as advantageous terms as possible, at home; but he will find that he cannot, according to the present price in the colony, give less than fifteen rix-dollars per month, if he wishes to preserve content among his people; it is probable the price may fall as low as twelve dollars; but it is as well to agree for as little as possible, and to convert that into an act of favour which is in fact a matter of necessity. The wages of English servants in Cape Town vary from twenty to thirty rix-dollars per month. A good house and dairy maid will be found of great use, and married people will be on every account preferable to single ones. If an opportunity offers of bringing out, at a moderate cost, house furniture of any sort, chairs, tables, beds, &c. he will find his advantage in it. Mattresses are good, and as cheap as at home; but furniture is sold at a profit of 100l. per cent., excepting occasionally at public auctions, which a man cannot always wait for, or make it convenient to attend. He will find it necessary to employ a Hottentot or two in his service; and if they are good men, he cannot hire them under fifteen rix-dollars per month; twenty dollars is not an uncommon price.'

It is the opinion of the writer, that the Cape is preferable to Mr. Bickbeck's settlement in the Illinois, which, however, is no strong testimony in its favour. Of the new settlement, formed in 1819, we are told that—

'The soil of the new settlement partakes of the general character of the Cape soil; that is, very various within very narrow limits; but, upon an average, it will bear a comparison with the best parts of the colony. It inclines generally to sandy. Care is taken that the allotments should have water upon them, or within reach; but the supply is frequently scanty; and will be generally found insufficient for the purposes of husbandry.

If we except a few houses, dignified with the name of Bathurst Town, Graham's Fort, a small garrison town, containing, perhaps, a hundred houses, is the only town in the settlement. A few houses have been built at Algoa Bay, the inhabitants of which are occupied chiefly in salting butter and drying fish, for the Cape market, for which the situation is sufficiently well adapted. This butter is sent down in considerable quantities from the district of Graff Regnet, which lies far in the interior, at the back of the new settlement, and is the great grazing country of the colony.

'It is impossible to view with indifference this attempt to colonize the quondam territory of Kaffraria. Accordingly, its progress has been anxiously watched, and opinions are much divided as to its future failure or success. The more prevalent opinion at the Cape is, that the settlement will altogether fail to the ground. Yet, perhaps, we may more safely affirm, that a few of the most determined characters will surmount the difficulties of the undertaking, and eventually succeed. But as this word success has meanings as various as are the hopes and expectations of different individuals, it may be deserving of a little farther consideration.'

The first of the transport ships arrived towards the beginning of April, 1820, with settlers on board, at Table Bay; others, to the amount of twelve or fourteen, followed, and the last anchored in Simon's Bay, about the middle of June: the first of the parties reached the new settlement in May, and the last before the end of June:—

'As fast as the people disembarked, they were encamped under the tents at Algoa Bay, until waggons could be procured, and every thing put in readiness for their march up the country, to the different places of their destination. This journey usually occupied from seven to nine days. The men walked; the women, provisions, and implements of husbandry, were carried in the waggons. These were provided at the expense of the heads of parties, and the money deducted from the deposit. The same plan was pursued with respect to the provisions, which were furnished by the government at the rate of seven-pence a-head per day. Such of them as chose to purchase tents, agricultural implements of British manufacture, provisions, and, in fact, such necessities as were thought requisite for the occasion, and which could be procured, were permitted to do so, to a certain extent, at prime cost; a government store having been opened at Algoa Bay for that purpose.

'Some of the party suffered a good deal from the heavy rains, when encamped under the tents, previous to their march up the country. Men, women, and children, were seen up to their knees in mud; and the blankets and bedding were drenched with water; but, luckily, the season was unusually dry; the rains fell late; and not much sickness prevailed. It is but justice to add, that no exertion was omitted on the part of Sir Ruffane Donkin, the acting governor, and the heads of the colonial department; the former of whom superintended in person the disembarkation at Algoa Bay, and the removal of the parties to the place of settlement.'

'The allotment of one of the principal settlers near the mouth of the Great Fish River, amounting to ten thousand acres, proportioned to the number of families he took out, contains, according to his own statement, (as related to me,) only about one thousand acres that are fit for cultivation. This is probably, (if true,) a much greater proportion of barren ground than may generally be expected; but it is sufficient to show that all has not been done which will in many instances be required, especially by those who look forward to exporting produce; and the only advantage which the settlement affords over the more eligible situations of the colony, is that of having for nothing, what elsewhere is to be purchased. The allotments are, after the expiration of ten years, to be subject to an annual quit-rent of £1. for every hundred acres, a rent that few, if any farm in the colony, (excepting in the immediate vicinity of Cape Town, or other choice spots,) would bring at this day. This will probably not be insisted upon.'

From the following statement, it would seem that the quality of the emigrants was not such as was likely to ensure success:—

'The labouring men have too generally been picked up about large towns; they have more the look of manufacturers than ploughmen; and I thought the proportion of tradesmen, or those exercising the mechanic arts, too great. Thus there were clockiers, hatters, printers, engravers, brass letter-founders, musical instrument-makers, &c.; men whose labours must be nearly useless in an infant settlement.

'The heads of the parties themselves seem to have entertained the most erroneous notions upon the subject of emigration. They apparently concluded, that it was merely shifting the scene from Middlesex to Kaffraria; and that the elements of a society, like the materials of a patent house, may be shipped from England and put together in Southern Africa. Thus, one gentleman had provided himself with types and a printing-press, with a view to setting up a weekly courrant, and another had accommodated his wife with a sedan-chair. Two teachers of the piano-forte, (and there may have been more for aught I know,) were among the number; and a poet of great respectability, with an introduction to the governor from the poet-laureate of England, was ready to invoke the muses of Kaffer-land. Though it is not meant to impute any man's poverty to him as a fault, it will be found to be as great a bar to his advancement in this as in every other undertaking in life. Indeed, a small capital in money seems an absolute requisite for such an attempt, though it has, in a great many instances, been overlooked.'

'A party of near five hundred men was located at about one hundred and eighty miles to the eastward of Saldanha Bay, with what prospect of success is not yet known.

'One or two large parties, who were settled upon some government lands by the Sonderend River, at the distance of about seventy miles to the east of Cape Town, have already abandoned the place allotted to them, having found the land unfit for cultivation.

'Some others are returned to Cape Town, having given up the undertaking; several individuals have engaged passages home; and more have applied for a passage at the government expense, which has of course been refused.

'His Majesty's ministers were particularly anxious that clergymen should accompany the expedition; conceiving, no doubt, that the encouragement of religion was the best method of insuring habits of industry and sobriety. Whether by design or accident it is difficult to say, but in addition to the regular clergymen provided, there was a most copious sprinkling of preachers, to grace the new settlement with their eloquence, and disperse the light of God. How far the efforts of these gentlemen are likely to be beneficial, may be collected from their practice on shipboard, where these religious parties, as they were termed, were embarked. There was constant discussion, with dissensions and divisions innumerable—"a little eloquentia, sapientie parum"—an incessant ranting about virtues, with no endeavour at the attainment of any. Such ignorant pretenders are not likely to diffuse the mild lessons of Christianity, or to benefit the cause of social order.

'Such, then, are the individuals from whose loins are to spring the future lords of South Africa. If their moral habits and general character would induce us to form too favourable an opinion of their future greatness, we may be less inclined to indulge in gloomy forebodings, when we consider that Rome, the mistress of the ancient world, was founded by a band of robbers; and that the mighty empire now rising in the west, was at no distant date the receptacle of crime and infamy.

Some useful hints to emigrants, some judicious reflections on emigration generally, and an official report of a survey of the rivers and the coast, by Captain Moresby, close this part of the work. To these are added, a brief notice of St. Helena, and some interesting particulars respecting Napoleon; but our limits will not allow us room for extract.

It will be seen that this work is not likely to add to the rage which predominates for emigrating to the Cape of Good Hope, although the author shows, that if judiciously undertaken, and with the necessary means, it might be attended with success. That the new settlement will not flourish, is his opinion, for had the emigrants been better suited for commencing a colony, yet it is not likely that they will be able to retain their servants and labourers after their limited service is expired, when they can be more advantageously employed elsewhere. To such as may still entertain the idea of emigration, we strongly recommend this work, as containing much valuable information, with which it would be highly desirable that they should become acquainted.

A Bibliographical, Antiquarian, and Pictorial Tour in France and Germany. By the Rev. Thomas Frognall Dibdin, F. R. S., S. A. 3 Vols. super royal 8vo, pp. 1780. London, 1821.

We do not know of any author whose works are in themselves of so opposite a character as those of Mr. Dibdin, or any which would bear cutting down or pruning with so much advantage. There is not, so far as we are acquainted with his labours, a single production from his pen that does not contain much that is valuable and interesting; but these portions are loaded with so much that is worthless, that we feel almost as much pain as pleasure in their perusal. That Mr. Dibdin is a bibliomaniac in the strictest sense of the word, he will not himself deny; but while he has contributed largely to foster a taste which is carried to an extent that makes it injurious to the real interests of literature, we must not forget to acknowledge that, as a bibliographer, he is entitled to much praise; that he has unfolded many treasures of the 'olden time,' that lay buried in obscurity; and that he has done more towards the history of early English literature than all his contemporaries. He, however, carries his passion for old books to a ridiculous excess—he feels as much pleasure in finding a unique Caxton or Wynken de Worde as a modern navigator would in discovering the north-west passage; and is quite in raptures if he can decide a disputed point as to whether the first edition of a twopenny tract was printed in quarto or octavo. But, notwithstanding this, Mr. Dibdin is entitled to the praise of having done much for English typography, not merely in his own beautiful hot-pressed tomes, but in diffusing a good taste generally; and then, as to the embellishments of his works, he certainly surpasses all others. But, here again, we cannot but censure that Vandalism, which, after printing a small number of copies, consigns the beautiful engraved wooden blocks to the flames, and breaks up the plates. Mr. Dibdin, perhaps, thinks that his works are not for the million;—their price certainly prevents it, but there are some portions of almost every thing that he has written which cannot be too extensively made known. It is scarcely necessary to refer to the previous literary labours of Mr. Dibdin:—his first work, we believe, was the 'Introduction to the Classics'; and, perhaps, few persons ever read it without enjoying their beauties with increased pleasure ever after; his 'Bibliotheca Spenceriana' is an elegant work, in which he displays considerable learning; his Bibliomania certainly added to the rage for black letter lore, but yet it contains much that is curious and interesting; while his 'Bibliographical Decameron,' for its variety and elegance in ornamental decoration, is an almost matchless work, and leaves every thing of the kind at an immeasurable distance,—the volumes now before us only excepted.

But much as Mr. Dibdin has written, he now appears before the public or at least such portion of it as get a glance at his ten guinea work, in a new character,—that of a traveller.

Although, since the establishment of peace upon the Continent, travellers and volumes of travels of almost every species have been common; yet Mr. Dibdin is the first to give us an account of the treasures of the libraries, or of the general literary character of the persons with whom they have associated. His object has been, as he states in his preface, to bear away many of the curious, splendid, and interesting specimens of art of former ages, which, till their present appearance, were, probably, scarcely known even to their possessors. By means of the beautiful embellishments selected from such volumes, and especially from those in the Royal Libraries of Paris and Vienna, he has certainly thrown a few flowers upon the otherwise unalluring path of bibliography. The volumes, in addition to numerous engravings of every description, which are of the highest order of excellence, contain several original portraits, now published for the first time, and a great many specimens of art which have been hid for centuries from general knowledge. The Antiquarian embellishments are principally architectural, and include views of some of the most interesting cathedrals, monasteries, &c. visited by the author; the picturesque embellishments also partake of the Antiquarian, and the whole does great credit to Mr. George Lewis, the artist, who accompanied Mr. Dibdin in his tour.

The work is in the epistolary form; the letters being understood to have been written abroad, and the notes added at the author's leisure. The first volume, and a portion of the second, is exclusively devoted to Normandy. The treasures of the public libraries of Paris, furnish the chief materials of the second volume, and a portion of the third also relates to France; the remainder being devoted to Germany, the account of it has been confined to narrower limits than was originally intended. Having given this general view of the work, we shall proceed to detach a few of the gems with which the pages of this splendid work are abundantly studded. In the Abbey of St. Ouen, at Rouen, there are some circular windows, which have attracted much notice from the tale attached to them, rather than from their positive beauty:—

'These windows were finished about the year 1430. One of them was executed by the master mason, the other by his apprentice; and, on being criticised by competent judges, the performance of the latter was said to eclipse that of the former. In consequence, the master became jealous and revengeful, and actually poisoned his apprentice. He was of course tried, condemned, and executed; but an existing monument to his memory attests the humanity of the monks in giving him Christian interment.'

In the square called La Place de la

Pucelle, is one of the oldest houses in Rouen; and as interesting as it is ancient:—

'It is invisible from without; but you open a wooden gate, and quickly find yourself within a small quadrangle, having three of its sides covered with basso-relievo figures, in plaster. That side which faces you is evidently older than the left; indeed, I have no hesitation in assigning it to the end of the fifteenth century. The clustered ornaments of human figures and cattle, with which the whole of the exterior is covered, reminds us precisely of those little wood-cut figures, chiefly pastoral, which we see in the borders of printed missals of the same period. The taste which prevails in them is half French and half Flemish. Not so is the character of the plaster figures which cover the left side on entering. These, my friend, are no less than the representation of the procession of Henry VIII. and Francis I. to the famous Champ de drap d'Or: of which, Montfaucon, after his fashion, has published engravings. Having carefully examined this very curious relic, of the beginning of the sixteenth century, I have no hesitation in pronouncing the copy of Montfaucon (or rather the artist employed) to be most egregiously faithless. I visited it again and again; considering it to be worth all the "huge clocks" in Rouen put together. It was, of course, too tempting a subject to be neglected by the pencil of Mr. Lewis.'

This house, so interesting to the antiquary, is now a lady's boarding-school, kept by an English woman. Mr. Dibdin being, as he acknowledges, what Tom Hearne said of Harry Dyson, of old, 'a person of a very strange, prying, and inquisitive genius, in the matter of books,' we must not be surprised to find him devoting a letter or two to the typography at Rouen and Caen, its printers, booksellers, and book-collectors. To our taste, there is more attractive metal in these volumes, and, therefore, we shall touch least on their bibliographical treasures. At Caen, Mr. D. met with a metrical cantique of the The Prodigal Son, with six wood-cuts, exhibiting the leading points of the gospel narrative. In the second of these,—

'The Prodigal is about to mount his horse and leave his father's house in the cloak and cocked hat of a French officer. The fourth of these cuts is droll enough. It is intitled "L'Enfant Prodigue est chassé par ses malices." The expulsion consists in the women driving him out of doors with besoms and hair-brooms. It is very probable, however, that all this character of absurdity attaches to some of our own representations of the same subject. If, instead of examining (as in Pope's time) "the walls of Bedlam and Song," we take a survey of the graphic broad-sides which dangle from strings upon the wall at Hyde Park Corner.'

Mr. Dibdin gives a very minute description of the Bayeux Tapestry, with several engravings of some of the principal figures. Mr. Lewis, we are told, made a fac simile of this celebrated piece, in the course of an application of six or eight hours for two successive mornings, 'stitch for stitch, colour for colour, size for size.' In the review of Mr. Turner's Tour through Normandy, we gave an account of it, and, therefore, shall pass over our author's more elaborate description. In an account of Vire, our author notices Baseline, the father of Barchanalian poetry in France, and has given a few specimens of his Vanderlives. The Abbe de la Rue had told Mr. Dibdin, that there was a statue or head of William the Conqueror, at Falaise. Mr. D., on reaching that place, inquired, and found that the head was in the possession of a Madame Rolle; he hastened there, and when he had cleaned it of the hardened white and ochre washes, with which every feature had been obliterated, he became convinced that the Abbe de la Rue was in error, and that the head was rather Saxon than Norman; he, however, offered ten louis for it, which were refused. We now accompany our author to Paris, and quote his lively description of the Boulevards Italiennes, of which the pencil of Mr. Lewis has furnished a delightful view. After describing the morning scenes of this spot, he says,—

'Afternoon approaches; then the innumerable chairs, which have been a long time unoccupied, are put into immediate requisition; then commences the "high exchange" of the loungers. One man hired two chairs, for which he pays two sous; he places his legs upon one of them, while his body, in a sea-saw, or slanting position, occupies the other. The places, where these chairs are found, are usually flanked by coffee-houses. Incessant reports, from drawing corks of beer-bottles, resound on all sides. The ordinary people are fond of this beverage; and for four or six sous, they get a bottle of pleasant refreshing small beer. The draught is usually succeeded by a doze in the open air. What is common, excites no surprise; and the stream of population rushes on without stopping one instant to notice these somniferous indulgences. Or, if they are not disposed to sleep, they sit and look about them; abstractedly gazing upon the multitude around, or at the heavens above. Pure, idle, unproductive listlessness is the necessary cause of such enjoyment.'

'Evening approaches; when the Boule-

wards put on the gayest and most fascinating livery. Then commences the bustle of the ice-mart; in other words, then commences the general demand for ices; while the rival and neighbouring Cafés of Tortoni and Riche have their porches of entrance choked by the incessant ingress and egress of customers. The full moon shines beautifully above the foliage of the trees; and an equal number of customers, occupying chairs, sit without, and call for ices to be brought to them. Meanwhile, between these loungers and the entrances to the cafés, move on, closely wedged, and yet scarcely in motion, the mass of human beings who come only to exercise their eyes, by turning them to the right or to the left; while, on the outside, upon the chaussee, are drawn up the carriages of visitors (chiefly English ladies) who prefer taking their ice within their closed morocco quarters. The varieties of ice are endless; but that of the Pavilée is justly a general favourite; not but that you may have coffee, chocolate, pinch, peach, almond, and, in short, every species of gratification of this kind, while the glasses are filled to a great height, in a pyramidal shape, and some of them with layers of strawberry, gooseberry, and other coloured ices, like pieces from a harlequin's jacket—are seen moving to and fro, to be silently and certainly devoured by those who bespeak them. Add to this, every one has his tumbler and small water-bottle by the side of him; in the centre of the bottle is a large piece of ice, and with a tumbler of water poured therefrom, the visitor usually concludes his repast.

'It is getting towards midnight; but the bustle and activity of the Boulevards have not yet much abated. Groups of musicians, ballad singers, tumblers, actors, conjurers, slight of hand professors, and raree-showmen, have each their distinct audiences. You advance; a little girl, with a raised turban (as usual, tastefully put on), seems to have no mercy, either upon her own voice, or upon the hy-dugurdly, on which she plays; her father shews his skill upon a violin, and the mother is equally active with the organ; after a "flourish," not of "trumpets," but of these instruments, the tumblers commence their operations. But a great crowd is collected to the right. What may this mean? All are silent; a ring is made, of which the boundaries are marked by small lighted candles stuck in pieces of clay. Within this circle stands a man, apparently strangled; both arms are extended, and his eyes are stretched to their utmost limits. You look more closely—and the hilt of a dagger is seen in his mouth, of which the blade is introduced into his stomach! He is almost breathless, and ready to faint—but he approaches, with the crown of a hat in his hand, into which he expects you to drop a sou. Having made his collection, he draws forth the dagger from its carnal sheath, and making a bow, seems to anticipate the plaudits which invariably follow. Or he changes his plan of operations on the following evening. Instead of the dagger put down his throat, he introduces a piece of wire up one nostril, to descend by the other—and thus self-tortured, demands the remuneration and the applause of his audience. In short, from one end of the boulevards to the other, nearly two English miles, there is naught but animation, good humour, and it is right to add, good order;—while having strolled as far as the Boulevards de Bondy, and watched the moon-beams sparkling in the waters, which play there within the beautiful fountain so called.—I retrace my steps, and seek the quiet quarters in which this epistle is penned.

On the literary treasures in Paris, Mr. Dibdin dwells long and writes very ably; he appears to have, with unceasing industry, ransacked every shelf of every book-case in the royal library, to discover what was rare, valuable, and curious. In his researches he was much assisted by the kindness and urbanity of the librarian, Von Praet, who has held the situation nearly forty years, and of whom he gives a well-drawn character:—

‘To the left of the third room,’ says our author, ‘you observe a well-dressed gentleman, (of somewhat shorter stature than the author of this description,) busied behind a table, taking down and putting up volumes; inscribing names and numbers and titles, in a large folio volume; giving orders on all sides; and putting several pairs of legs in motion in consequence of those orders; while his own, perhaps, are the least paraged of any. This gentleman is no less a personage than the celebrated Monsieur Von Praet, one of the chief librarians in the department of the printed books. His aspect is mild and pleasant, while his smart attire frequently forms a striking contrast to habiliments and personal appearances of a very different and less conciliating description by which he is surrounded. M. Von Praet must be now approaching his sixtieth year: but his age sits bravely upon him, for his step is rapid and firm, and his physiognomical expression indicative of a much less protracted period of existence. He is a Dutchman by birth; and even in shewing his first Eustatius, or first Pliny, each upon vellum, you may observe the natural enthusiasm of a Frenchman, tempered by the graver motions of a Hollander. But, on the other hand, use, or the frequent habit of displaying these treasures, undoubtedly pall and makes the exhibitor less vehement in his commendations.’

The Royal Library is precious beyond conception in medals and in antiquities of a variety of character; the specimens of Greek art, in coins and other small productions, are very fine. In prints, the library is equally rich.

We must, however, pass over these, as well as the account of the printed books, and the sketches of some of the principal literary men to whom Mr. D. was introduced. Among the illuminated manuscripts, the ‘Hours of Anne of Brittany’ is the most curious, and is deemed the most precious; and Mr. D. describes it with great minuteness. In an account of the library of St. Genevieve, we have an interesting anecdote of the celebrated biographer Mercier:—

‘In 1792, a decree passed the convention for issuing a ‘commission for the examination of monuments.’ Mercier was appointed one of the thirty-three members of which the commission was composed, and the famous Barrière was also of the number. Barrière, fertile in projects, however visionary and destructive, proposed to Mercier, as a bright thought, ‘to make a short extract from every book in the national library; to have these extracts superbly bound by Didot; and to burn all the books from which they were taken.’ It never occurred to this revolutionizing idiot, that there might be a thousand copies of the same work, and that some hundreds of these copies might be out of the National Library. Of course Mercier laughed at the project, and made the projector ashamed of it. Robespierre, rather fend than man, now ruled the destinies of France. On the 7th of July, 1794, Mercier happened to be passing along the streets, where he saw sixty-seven human beings about to undergo the butchery of the guillotine. Every avenue was crowded by spectators, who were hurrying towards the horrid spectacle. Mercier was carried along by the torrent; but having just strength enough to raise his head, he looked up, and he beheld his old and intimate friend, the Ex-Abbé Roger, in the number of devoted victims! That sight cost him his life. A sudden horror, followed by alternate shiverings and flushings of head, immediately seized him, and a cold perspiration hung upon his brow. He was carried into the house of a stranger; his utterance became feeble and indistinct, and it seemed as if the hand of death were already upon him.’

Mercier never recovered, but lingering five years, and then died. We need not say that Mr. Dibdin visited all the public libraries, which are six in number, and are said to contain 1,125,437 volumes. An account of booksellers, bookbinders, and men of letters, including Gail, Millin, and Langles, follows the description of the public libraries. While at Paris, Mr. Dibdin gave a festival in honour of the Roxburgh Club, and nearly innoculated some of the French literati with the mania. The private collections in Paris were next visited by Mr. D. particularly those collections of Denon, M. Quatin Crauford, and the Marquis de Sommariva, Willemin’s Monuments François Inédits, &c. Mr. D. closes his account of Paris with some observations on the Fine Arts, and an estimate of the national character:—

‘Every body here,’ says he, ‘is busy and active, yet very few have any thing to do in the way of what an Englishman would call business. The thoughtful brow, the abstracted look, the hurried step, which you see along Chapside and Cornhill, are here of comparatively rare appearance; yet every body is “sur le paré.” Every body seems to live out of doors. How the menage goes on—and how domestic education is regulated—strikes the inexperienced eye of an Englishman as a thing quite inconceivable. The temperature of Paris is no doubt very fine, although it has been of late unprecedently hot; and a French workman or labourer enjoys, out of doors, from morning till night, those meals which with us are usually partaken within. The public places of entertainment are pretty sure to receive a prodigious portion of the population of Paris every evening. A mechanic or artisan will devote two-thirds of his daily gains to the participation of this pleasure. His dinner will consist of the most meagre fare, at the lowest possible price, provided in the evening he can hear. Talma declaim, or Madame Albert varble; or see Pol leap or Bigotoni entrance a wondering audience by the grace of her movements and the pathos of her dumb shew in Nina.’

Accompanying our author to Strasbourg, we have an account of the rise and progress of Protestantism in that place. The forerunner of Luther, in Mr. Dibdin’s opinion, was John Geyler, a man of singular intrepidity of head and heart:—

‘He was a very extraordinary genius, unquestionably; and the works which he has bequeathed to posterity evince the variety of his attainments. His memory is yet held in reverence by his countrymen, although it may be doubted whether any one library contains a complete collection of his works. Geyler preached boldly in the cathedral, against the lax manners and doubtful morality of the clergy. He exhorted the magistrates to do their duty, and predicted that there must be an alteration of religious worship, ere the general morals of the community could be amended. They preserve a stone chair or pulpit, of very curious workmanship, but which had nearly been destroyed during the revolution, in which Geyler used to deliver his lectures. He died in 1510; and, within a dozen years after his death, the doctrines of Luther were sedulously inculcated. The ground had been well prepared for such seed.’

The pulpit here alluded to, is a which ranked her among the heroes of the age. Being wounded at the siege of Orleans, she exclaimed, for the purpose of encouraging her army, 'it is glory, not blood, that flows from this wound.' When the English were obliged to raise the siege of Orleans with precipitation, she said to Dunois, who would have pursued them, 'the object is gained—no useless carnage.' The glory of Joan of Arc was that of France: it is the more to be regretted, that her misfortunes and the cruelty which presided at her death, should stain these brilliant recollections, and produce a mingled feeling of profound horror and national gratitude, which will never cease to accompany her memory.

France, elevated by numerous victories, had resumed her courage, and reconquered her name; seconded by the valour of the king's servants, Joan had witnessed the accomplishment of part of her predictions. Weary of glory, she would have retired after the coronation of Charles VII., at Rheims: 'my mission,' said she, 'is fulfilled; would to God I could quit the field, and return to tend the flocks, and serve my parents with my brothers and sisters!' Being detained by the solicitations of the king, she continued to lead the troops to victory; but fortune grew tired of favouring her, and, on the 19th of May, 1430, she was taken at the gates of Compeigne, in a sally, which she herself had conducted.

The Duke of Bedford, who was Regent of England during the minority of his nephew, Henry VI., and conducted, in person, the war in France, fearing lest Charles should ransom the prisoner, availed himself of the right given to him by the customs of that age, to purchase her of John de Luxembourg, who was obliged to resign her to him, on being paid the sum often thousand livres. There was, therefore, no other alternative than to ransom her, or carry her off by main force; but, to avoid the reproach of refusing to exchange her, the duke, by the advice of the Bishop of Beauvais, caused her to be declared a heretic and a sorceress by the Parliament of Paris. From that moment the Maid of Orleans was treated as a criminal, and not as a prisoner. The clergy, that power, which, in all ages, has exalted itself above the authority of kings, could alone decide her fate. Hurried from prison to prison, Joan was confined at Rouen, in a tower, which is still standing, and to which this horrible catastrophe has given the name of Tour de la Pucelle.

Joan of Arc, though a prisoner, excited such terror, that the enemies of Charles VII., did not think themselves sure of victory so long as her name could serve for a rallying point. Her destruction was resolved upon; she was cruelly treated, and immersed in a dungeon, where she was farther confined by two iron chains; she was exposed defenceless to the insults of her guards, who were chosen from among the lowest class of the soldiery, called houspiliers; she was surrounded by all the snares that fanaticism, and the desire of finding some pretext for putting her to death could suggest. Long did this noble female, by her heroic fortitude, frustrate the designs of her enemies, and uphold the glory which she had acquired in the field; but she was at last charged with fictitious crimes, and a Frenchman, Pierre Cauchon, Bishop of Beauvais, betraying his country and violating humanity, took upon himself to send her to execution.

The examination which she underwent, served but to render the nobleness of her character still more conspicuous. 'I never killed any person,' said she to her judges, or more properly speaking, her executioners. 'I always abhorred the shedding of human blood: I carried my standard at the head of the troops; the soldiers fought, and God gave the victory.' Cauchon, with a view to avoid the censure of having singly decided the fate of his victim, associated with himself a member of the Inquisition. A canon, named Loyseleur, was both judge and accuser; for he had the baseness to reveal the confessions, with which, on the faith of an oath, Joan of Arc had intrusted him. Lastly, this unfortunate creature was surprised into the signing of a recantation of assertions to which she was an utter stranger. From this period, Joan of Arc resumed her female apparel; but it was soon taken from her in the night, and the dress of a man substituted in its stead. When forced to rise, she was enraged at being compelled to put it on; and on this paltry incident, thus purposely contrived, she was accused of violating her oath, and relapsing into heresy. Sentence of death was pronounced upon her; the Inquisition placed on her head the fatal mitre; a scaffold was erected in the old market, now the Place aux Veaux, and on the 30th of May, 1430, the Maid of Orleans, preceded by her executioners, and surrounded by eight hundred armed men, was led to execution, accompanied by the public pity. The moderation of her complaints, her tears, her youth, the recollections of glory and virtue which she called forth, and, lastly, the sight of the pile destined to consume her, extorted demonstrations of the strongest sympathy from all the spectators.

In 1449, Charles VII. having become master of Normandy, lost no time in exerting the power which enabled him to restore the name of the illustrious female in all its purity. A great council was assembled; the witnesses of her sentence and death having been summoned and heard, the process was unanimously declared void in form and unjust in principle; and the memory of Joan of Arc, re-established by her contemporaries, was held forth to the grateful admiration of posterity. A spirit of piety caused a cross to be erected on the spot where she was executed, but it was soon replaced by a fountain, surmounted by a statue of Joan of Arc. The elegant style of this monument, and the lightness of the arabesques, bespoke the period of the revival of the arts in France. In 1775, it fell to ruin, but, instead of being repaired, a pedestal, destitute of elegance, was erected on the same spot, and now supports the statue of the heroine.

AMERICAN EXPEDITION TO THE INTERIOR OF THE GLOBE.

ABOUT three years ago, the American papers contained a singular proposal from a Captain Symmes, who was stated to be a respectable man, a man of intelligence and of sane mind. This gentleman declared that the 'earth was hollow, and habitable within, containing a number of solid concentric spheres, one within the other, and that it is open at the poles, twelve or sixteen degrees.' He pledged his life in support of the truth of his theory, and offered to explore the hollow, only asking 'one hundred brave companions, well equipped, to start from Siberia in the fall season, with rein-deer and sledges, on the ice of the frozen sea; but although he engaged, that on reaching one degree northward of latitude 82°, they would find 'warm and rich land, stocked with, thrifty vegetables and animals, if not men,' yet we do not hear that he has got any one to join him in the enterprise, although he has often appealed to the world to support him. His last call appears in one of the American papers just received, and is as follows:—

[CIRCULAR.]

Newport, Kentucky, April 17th, 1821.

TO THE MARITIME AND OTHER CIVILIZED POWERS OF THE WORLD.

HAVING, three years since, published a circular, in which I declared the earth to be hollow, and habitable within, &c. &c., and in which I offered my services to the world at large, for exploring; and having applied to several influential members of the government of the United States, to the Russian minister, (when at Cincinnati,) and to each of our resident ministers abroad, for their interest and countenance in my behalf, without yet hearing of any prospect of being called upon to fulfil my proposal, I am induced again to repeat my offer; and it is my desire that every nation or government will consider this address, when printed in the National Intelligencer of Washington, in the same light as a direct and personal application from me.

To that government which may first accept my services in a way suitable to the occasion, I shall hold myself pledged to wholly devote (for the particular honour and benefit of such nation,) my corporeal and mental powers—and even my life, if necessary, to the utmost practicable examination of the new world I have announced.

Let any one who may deny the Theory to be well founded, answer all, or at least some, of the many arguments offered in support of it, before they undertake to pronounce its baseness. And if the author and his advocates are to be charged with defending an absurd position, let them be questioned in a court of argument, and judged by the world after a hearing pro and con.

It is held by the author, that the theory is a pious one; that there is nothing ignominious in it; that it is simple, and so well supported by principle and by facts, that its supporters have nothing to fear from any sort of test that can be applied to it.

The author is charged with over-doing the matter, by being too enthusiastic; and is told, that it would be better policy not to take such high ground at first, but dispense with concentric spheres for the present, and maintain only one sphere, &c. The reply is, that he does reserve some of his conclusions to be ripened by further reflection; others, however, though too new to be readily admitted by the world, are necessary to exemplify, with due consistency, the first principles of the theory; such, for example, is that of concentric spheres.

Most of the particulars already published in relation to that principle of philosophy which I have discovered and declared to exist, are to be found over my name on the files of the National Intelligencer.

JOHN CLEVES SYMMES,

JOHN C. SYMMES

Addresses himself to any who may deny that his theory of the earth is well founded, and asks them to shew the advocates of the theory wherein it is erroneous; and to offer any other theory, either old or new, which will better agree with the facts, phenomena, and occurrences, which have been cited in support of it. For example, how the principle explained in his Memoir, No. II. founded on the known or acknowledged laws of gravity, may be refuted? Why Saturn is seen surrounded by a concentric circle or ring, which, if not solid, must at least be liquid? Why the migrating quadrupeds and water-fowl about Hudson's Bay, go northwardly in autumn, and return from

* The former states, that the grand Athapascow River is two miles broad, with loamy banks one hundred feet above the ordinary surface of the water; the depth of the river not ascertained. And the latter describes the river he descended as being three hundred feet deep, and a very rapid and long river, with several large rivers coming into it. West, where Hearne went, must have been in a direction tending toward the concave equator, and at right angles with the oblique meridians marked on the wooden hemisphere shown in the lecture room. Both those travellers describe very large trees, and mention the country as being amply inhabited by men and quadrupeds.

the same course in the spring? Why certain rivers, found by Hearne and Mackenzie, (who were doubtless beyond the verge without being sensible of it,) were so remarkably broad and deep as they are described to be? Why none of the Indians Hearne saw, had ever heard of any sea to the westward? Why those Indians represent the country farther to the west or south-west, as so warm as never to have any frost or snow? Why the Esquimaux Indians at Copper-mine River, have goods such as the Danes of Greenland sell, and none such as the British sell at Hudson's Bay? Why Me-lo-no-be, the Indian chief who was Hearne's guide from Hudson's Bay, pointed out Copper-mine River as lying north and running an easterly course, whilst Hearne makes it lie north-west and run north? Why the variations described by Captain Parry, as lately published, corroborates the meridians long since marked out on the before-mentioned wooden hemisphere?

Now is the time for America to shew her enterprise. The difficulty of getting as far north as Baffin, Ross, or Parry went, is as nothing: from thence, an armed force of one or two hundred men, could travel with hand-sledges on the snow and ice, as Hearne did, and, as they return from the woodland and country in the spring, haul, as he did, light bark canoes to cross the rivers and lakes, which open at that season before the snow disappears.

As certainly as this new theory is true, and Hearne an honest journalist, so certainly could the party soon reach that country of abundant game which Hearne describes: in travelling through which, he did not complain of cold, although he travelled all winter, and had many Indian women in company.

There appears to be this advantage in making the trip in winter, (in case the ships cannot pass the ice northward in September,) that the waters are then all bridged with ice, although the cold is not excessive; this is, most probably, owing to the centrifugal action produced in the concave, by the rotation of the earth operating so as to increase or aid the gravity acting on the molecules of water; hence, they may be formed and preserved in a fixed state, under a less degree of cold than is requisite for a like fixation here; the elastic molecules of quicksilver must be reduced by the same law; therefore, the cold there can, at present, only be tested by feeling, and not by the thermometer.

† It is thought that Captain Parry should have sailed southwardly from the extremity of the verge, towards the concave equator, down Prince Regent, or some other southerly inlet, where it is probable he would have found a passage through the ice, especially if he waited sufficiently late in August or September; and on not succeeding in getting through, he might have proceeded on the ice during the winter, as Hearne did; for Parry, as well as Davis, Baffin, and Ross, were doubtless beyond the verge of the verge after they passed that line where the needle varied ninety degrees.

meter; hence it is accountable why Parry's crew hunted in winter, when the average of the thermometer was below zero, and why at that season they were only driven under deck when the winds blew hard; and why Hearne could sleep without fire, by only digging a hole in the snow, down to the moss, and lying with his sledge set up edgewise to windward.

The same law should, continually, or generally, reduce the elastic molecules of the atmosphere there, and hence set free heat therefrom; and thus, by the reduction, produce a flow of air from without toward the interior, which would be an apparently northerly wind, every where beyond the brow of the verge.

Doubtless, the south polar opening would afford, at its lowest part, opposite New Holland, a more certain passage by water than can be expected in the north. Indeed, it would be well to equip two expeditions—one for the north, and the other for the south. And we should lose no time, lest the maritime nations of Europe out-do us in the enterprise.

EPITAPH

For a Perfect Liar of the Name of TELL.
He lies all the day like a knave;
He lies all the night-bours away;
And when he is dead, he will lie in the grave,
And TELL lies till the judgment-day.

EPIGRAM

Written after hearing the Charity Children sing the old 100th Psalm, at the Anniversary, June 7, 1821.
"WHAT thought you of the singing at St. Paul's?"
Cried Miss to Man, as by her side she sat:
"Why, if I must speak plainly; Madam bawls—"
"Twas, like our table-beer, by far too flat!"

STANZAS.

Oh, gone for ever are the beams
That on life's morning shone so bright:
Remember'd but as faint, faint dreams;
Seen like dim stars in life's dark night!
Clouds, clouds are intervening fast;
Deep, deep I sink in sadness;
And memory soon will look her last
At aught that tokens gladness!
Oh! once the world for me was made—
For so my young heart told me;
But I was by myself betrayed,
For sorrows now infold me.
All that I dearly prized are fled,
Fled to the silent tomb;
The choicest flowers of life are dead,
Mould'ring in church-yard gloom!
My boyhood's friend,—my boyhood's love—
To brighter worlds have flown,
And I am left at last to prove Man's misery, alone!

SONNET.

Occasioned by seeing Miss Dance as Juliana, in the Housewren, particularly in the dance scene, where she gained considerable applause.
Nor with more grace the beauteous sisters three!

Who sought the lovely prize Againt won,
When round the golden circlet of the sun
Their polish'd limbs, light waver'd gracefully!
Nor spightlier mov'd the nymph Euphrosyne,
When o'er the springing flow'rs, with fairy tread,
She tripp'd, scarce shaking off the trembling
dew-drops's head

That kiss'd her sicklen feet—more soft than thee!
Whose motion, airy, gay, harmoniously,
Combin'd by nature to delight and prove
That mortal forms have angel's symmetry,
Can tune the chords and melt the soul to lore!

All these, and more are, Juliana, thine,
Tune make a constellation here divine!

A QUAKERESS YEARNING AFTER THE VAIN WORLD.

THIS meeting is a doleful place,
Fairwell!

Where one may sit with antique face,
And scarcely dare, though crisp and trim,
Convey one glance from hood to him:
Spirits—farewell!

O could I dress my bonnet gay,
Fairwell!

And let my hair in jewels play,—
Adorn my cap with lace and flower,
And wear a founce and Babel tower;
Uprights—farewell!

O if I might to opera hie,
Fairwell!

Be favour'd with the royal eye;
Yea, a la mode—with ostrich plumes,
Be constant at the drawing-rooms;
Tobacco—farewell!

Then to the friends at Whitehall,
Fairwell!

His lordship's or the captain's bide;
The pink at ball,—the ton at play;
From Gracians Street for e'er and aye, Fairwell! Fairwell!

THE PARKS.

AN EPISTLE TO —

O! bless us—here's Wilford's epistle at last;
I wonder, now, what he's been doing so long?
Perhaps this contains some account of the past,
Of his little amours, in the shape of a song—
I fancy I hear you exclaim, as you break
The seal that hides all that I scribble to you;
But I have excuses, and many, to make—
And the whole of them weighty and feasible too.

But now I must touch, as I promis'd you once,
On the parks, and draw pictures of many a dance—

Who there, in the dust that the vehicles make,
Might be taken for nobles, by those who mistake!

Who having deserted the shop boards they sat
on

From Monday 'till Saturday—terrible bore!
Or of counter-worn tired—with a 'golden ball' hat, &c.

* Againt, Thadde, and Euphrosyne. they were represented in the attitude of persons dancing; when Horace says, (lib. 1. od. 4.)
Altoque tamquam quæsitæ pede.

I mean one whose brim, as I told you before,

Falls over his ears:—and a coat mighty fine—
And all else too, of course—like themselves—quite divine!

They strut to and fro, in a dandified way—
With nought in their pockets, and nothing to say,

Not deigning to turn to the left or the right—
Of the ground which they tread, they have never a sight,

For so primely put on are the kerchiefs they wear,

So stiffen'd with starch, and so folded they are—
That the head seems as if 'twere immovably
fix'd,

Not a joint the proud chin and the shoulder betwixt!

And some of these knights of the counter and shears,

In whom Lady Fashion so charming appears—Well booted and spur'd—take a steed for the day,—

To drive, like their betters, dull sorrow away—
And straight to the Park like true heroes, they must,

To ride round the ring in the midst of the dust,
Just to shew themselves off—what it is to be higher

Than some 'paltry fellows'—their shopmates
I mean—

In the world—and the like—what there is to be seen—

That the horses earn well what is paid for their hire!

And ladies, too, here, who have sighed all the week

For the first dawn of Sunday upon them to break,

Come clad in green silks—like the rest of the gay—

That scuffle like leaves on a boisterous day—
With founces that nearly extend to the waist—
Which, tight as a drum, is delightfully braced—
That to breathe were a pain—but that's nothing you know—

Since fashion decrees—why it still must be so!

And really I think, by and by there will be Set rules for reposing, when weary are we!

To proceed with my subject, the ring you must know

Is a long dusty road, where the fash'ables go to see and be seen,—and at out the day,
As if they were waiting the close of a play:

No matter to them, whether shining or raining,
'Tis Fashion decrees it, and there's no complaining.

Each promenade now is a beautiful place,
And adorn'd too with many a beautiful face,

Whose smiles are as lovely as morning appears,

When night has been weeping, and earth is all tears!

But where so much folly on all sides is seen,
As here in the group, is parading the green.

Perfection itself is a sensible fair,
If sense can be found in one visitant there!

My stars! what a number of gentleman spurr'd!
What a clanking of heels is on either side heard!

And all I declare, from a party of such As would fear the most tractable courser to touch!

Thus much have I said of the parks, and when I
Againt seize my pen, in description to vie

With my brothers in rhyming—the play house shall be

Tut theme I will touch on,—till then, think of me!

WILFORD.

Fine Arts.

ROYAL ACADEMY.

No. 161. 'Pemburst Place, Kent,'
the seat of Sir John Sidney, Bart.; Miss Jackman. This is a very charming picture: and, independent of its merits as a work of art, it will create an increased interest when it is known, that the chevalier sans peur et sans reproche,
Sir Philip Sidney, who was a compound of all that was high spirited and romantic, of all that was gallant and brave,—that this darling son of chivalry was born in the house which is here so faithfully represented.

No. 164. 'The drunken Smith,'
W. Kidd. This is a very correct picture of a very common scene in low life; the effect of the liquor on the be-sootter toper, is seen in his countenance, and the complaint that Garrick once made of a French actor, that his legs were sober, while he personated a drunkard, will not apply to the smith, who is drunk all over.

No. 171. 'Portrait of Sir Humphrey Davy, Bart. President of the Royal Society,' Sir Thomas Lawrence, P. R. A. is an admirable likeness of this truly great man. The two Presidents ought to be mutually obliged to each other; Sir Thomas, that the President of the Royal Society presents so fine a person, of which to perpetuate a likeness; and Sir Humphrey that the P. R. A. has exercised his almost matchless pencil with such happy effect. Sir Humphrey is, we believe, the first instance of a gentleman being elevated to the chair of the Royal Society, solely for his talents, at so early an age as forty;—his discoveries, however, seem rather the result of centuries than of years.

No. 193. 'Portrait of the late Benjamin West, P. R. A.' Sir T. Lawrence.
There is not a portrait in the whole exhibition which pleases me so much as this, which represents the venerable President in his study, and in his usual painting gown, and is a faithful resemblance. If we mistake not, this picture is painted for the United States, and although it is the portrait of one of their own sons, who reached the summit of his art in this country;
it will also shew that we possess a native who is worthy of being his successor. It is a masterly performance, chaste and simple, but producing all the effect possible by its modesty: the colouring is rich without gaudiness—the drapery natural, without the slightest appearance of art, and there is a tranquil majesty about the whole picture worthy of the greatest portrait painters of any age or country.

No 194. 'Dover from the sea;' a equally day, wind against the tide: A. W. Colcott, R. A. is a very well executed sea-piece, both as to composition and colouring.

No. 217. 'The marriage of Richard of Shrewsbury, brother of Edward V. to the Lady Anne Mowbray, only daughter and heir of the Duke of Norfolk,' J. Northcote, R.A. Whatever the policy of former times might have dictated, the unnatural union of two children in marriage, at an age when whipping a top or playing with a doll would be most congenial to them, is now no longer practised either from mercenary or political motives. The venerable Northcote has, in this picture, given a vigorous display of his talents; the little chubby faced bride, who is a sweet infant, is an original composition, and the constrained gravity of the infant bridegroom is well expressed.

No. 261. 'Cleopatra's arrival in Cilicia;' W. Etty. Whether it is that the languid and luxurious beauty of Cleopatra is too much for human eye to dwell upon, or that the merits of this picture escape casual observation, we know not, but we see the visitors to the exhibition, turn from it with a slight glance, and it would seem almost involuntarily. The artist has really embodied the descriptions of Plutarch and of Shakespeare—the magnificent galley—the stern covered with gold—the sails of purple 'and so perfumed the winds were love-sick with them,' the oars of silver, keeping time to the music of flutes and pipes and harps;—the quern, in the character of Venus, reclining under a canopy embroidered with gold,—the boys like Cupids fanning her,—the maids like the Nereids and Graces assisting in the steering of the vessel;—all these are represented so far as the pencil can represent so luxurious a scene. The languishing beauty of Venus, and the exquisite loveliness of her attendant maids, and lovely Cupids are most delightfully portrayed; and the artist has only to proceed in the noble career he has chosen to reach the summit of his art.

No. 273. 'Scene in the musical entertainment of Lock and Key, with portraits of Mrs. Orger, Miss Cubitt, Mr. Munden, and Mr. Knight;' G. Clint. This is an admirable picture, whether considered as to the composition or the fidelity of the portraits; the broad humour of Munden, the naiveté of Knight, the arch leer of Mrs. Orger, and the modesty of Miss Cubitt, are all well expressed; the back ground of the picture is appropriate, and the colouring harmonious.

No. 282. 'An Author reading his Play, in the Green Room, to the Performers of Drury Lane Theatre,' Mr. W. Sharp; has some good portraits, but there does not appear to us sufficient character in the expression of the author; indeed, there is a tameness about this picture, which is not sufficiently redeemed either by the composition or tone of colouring, both of which, however, are entitled to praise.

No. 293. 'The Discovery of the Regalia of Scotland, with the Portraits of the Commissioners, &c.;' A. Geddes. The Scottish interest must certainly have been very strong, when the Committee of the Royal Academy consented to let this acre of spoiled canvas usurp the largest space and one of the best situations in the whole exhibition. The subject may, perhaps, be deemed of interest to some persons, but the picture itself is not calculated to please any one. The portraits may be likenesses for any thing we know, but as most of the individuals are not known beyond the precincts of 'auld reekie,' this picture, if exhibited any where, (an honour of which we think it unworthy) should have been confined to Edinburgh. We cannot sufficiently reprehend the conduct of the managers in admitting this picture, which has not one single claim to a place among works of art.

We had intended, in our present number, to have turned to the Model Academy, which contains some very excellent productions from our first sculptors, but we find we must defer it to our next.

MR. WARD'S PICTURE OF THE TRIUMPH OF WATERLOO.

THE very existence of this picture furnishes a proud instance of the patronage of British art, and a strong proof that it is not unworthy of it. The British Institution, which, since its establishment, has rendered such eminent services to the fine arts, in 1816, advertised and circulated letters, inviting the painters of the united kingdom, to send to the gallery a finished sketch of the battle of Waterloo. Mr. Ward, whose talents as an artist are well known, sent a sketch, in which the subject is treated allegorically. This met with the approbation of the directors, who commissioned Mr. Ward to paint a picture from it, at the liberal price of two thousand guineas, designing to present it to the Royal Hospital, at Chelsea, as a national commemoration of the moral and political effects of this great victory.

Although we are decided enemies to the mixture of allegory and reality, and even to all allegory, where the allusion is too remote to be easily understood, yet we cannot deny, that this is a noble picture, and, in order that our readers may comprehend it as the author designed it should be understood, we quote a portion of his own description:—

'The Genius of Wellington, upon the car of War, directed by Britannia, who bears in her hand the trident, which, with the tri-coloured cross, upon her shield, (supporting the hero,) is emblematic of that Power which superintends the whole. On her head is a richly embossed helmet, composed of gold, silver, and steel, intended to convey an idea of the three ages; and for her crest the Dove of Peace, sustaining the fiery rays of Genius.'

'The hero is commanding away the demons,—Anarchy, Rebellion, and Discord, with the Horrors of War; as variegated serpents, and harpies. Bellona is endeavouring to take the reins of the horses of war; and is urging them on with her many-thong scourge, while they are tightly restrained by Humanity or Love to Mankind, seated upon the head of Britannia's Lion. Between these two contending principles, Hatred to Mankind the origin, and Love to Mankind the conclusion of the War, the horses are regulated by the cardinal virtues, Prudence, Fortitude, Temperance, and Justice. The horses are of the Hanoverian breed, in allusion to the house of Hanover. Usurpation, with the crown removed from its head, and marked with blood, is sinking under the feet of the horses. Opposition and Tumult are expiring under the wheels of the car; on the side of which are the rose, thistle, and shamrock,—England, Scotland, and Ireland, which have formed the splendid carriage composed of pearl and gold, and decorated with gems, and upon its end is the palm-tree, emblem of Victory, and to which are endeavouring to fasten themselves, the passions,—Anger, Cruelty, and Revenge; but they are overturned, and sinking under the foot of Charity, whose other foot is on the emblems of Slavery. She is raising her children into the bosom of Religion.'

'In the back-ground, are Blucher and Platoff, expressive of the allies, in union with Wellington, bearing the colours of the different nations engaged in this important struggle.'

'Before the horses, and descending from the clouds, is the Hydra-headed monster, as the seven evils, in contradistinction to the seven virtues, which, with Religion, are the companions and sustetants of Britannia. This creature alludes to those direful principles which have disturbed the civilized world, and followed by serpentine monsters, as its companions or satellites, streaming from darkness, flames, and blood, are sinking into the pit of confusion and remorse. Immediately under this whirling overgrown reptile, is Rapine, with its many teeth, and Fear, a terrified Harpy, flying to Despair, who is leading them into the abyss, to which they are all hurrying.

We are far from thinking with Mr. Ward, that this picture is 'capable of furthering the morals and establishing the happiness of man,' nor do we see what the battle of Waterloo had to do with advancing 'the spirit of truth' or 'stemming the torrent of infidelity,' of which Mr. Ward speaks. For our own parts, we would have had politics and religion entirely left out of the question, and feel very confident, that as a battle piece, it would not only have been more appropriate for Chelsea Hospital, but much more easily understood, and more likely to perpetuate the event it is intended to record.

But, after all, this picture is the production of no ordinary genius, the very conception bespeaks a superior mind, the composition is one of great skill, and the execution does the artist great credit; the portraits are good, the emblematical figures are striking, and the whole is powerfully impressive.

The Drama.

The benefits of this season have generally been well attended at both houses; and this we rejoice the more at, as the performers have, almost without a single exception, avoided rendering themselves ridiculous by attempting characters for which they were totally unsuited; for, although it may afford some sport, and attract a few gallery customers, to see Mr. Young play Macbeth, or Liston play Ophelia, yet who is there that has the slightest pretensions to dramatic taste, would not much rather see them adhering to that walk in which they so eminently excel. Among the principal novelties at the benefits, may be mentioned Mr. Macready's personification of Hamlet, which was one of the finest and most successful performances we ever witnessed. It was a truly original and masterly representation of the character of the noble Dane, and one that we long to see repeated, when we shall notice it at greater length than our present limits will permit.

DRURY LANE.—On Saturday night, being Whitsun-eve, an oratorio was given at this theatre, being the last under the direction of Sir George Smart; and, as if to make us feel his loss the more strongly, he rendered his last effort doubly attractive. It comprised such an array of vocal and instrumental talent, as we scarcely ever saw combined, and the entertainment was consequently rich, varied, and animating. It was a cento of the most popular compositions that had been performed at the Lent Oratorios, and included the Coronation Anthem, the famous quartette from the grand Requiem, Luther's Hymn, and several favourite airs, which never weary in the repetition. Mrs. Salmon gave 'Sweet Bird' in her best manner; and in a duet with Miss Stephens, she was particularly successful. These two unrivalled voices blended in perfect harmony, and the duet was encored. Ambrogetti, in the duet with Mrs. Salmon, taken from 'Il Funatico,' raised continual shouts of laughter. Braham was in fine tune, and, as usual, was much applauded. Mesdames Camporese and Vestris also sung delightfully. The instrumental part was not less powerfully sustained; the violin of Kresewetter, the violoncello of Lindley, the French horn of Puzzi, the fine flute of Nicholson, and Bocha with his thirteen harps, played by his thirteen pupils, gave a powerful assistance on the occasion. The house, we are happy to say, was well filled:

LUCRETIVS.

Walking on Water.—Mr. Kent, from Glasgow, exhibited, on Friday, his machine for walking upon water, in one of the new wet docks at Leith. The novelty of the circumstance drew together a considerable crowd to witness the uncommon scene. The apparatus consisted of a triangle of about ten feet, formed of iron, to each angle of which was affixed a case of block tin, filled with air, and completely watertight. These little boats or cases seemed to be about two feet and a half long, by about one foot and a half broad, and served to buoy up the machine and its super-incumbent weight. These cases, we understand, are filled with little hollow balls, attached by a chain, and capable of floating the machine, should any accident happen to the outer case. From the centre of the little boats, rose other rods, bent upwards, so as to meet in the middle at a convenient height, and forming at this junction a small seat or saddle, like that of the common velocipede. Like that machine, likewise, it has a cushion for the breast, and ropes or reins to guide the case at the apex of the triangle; and, upon the whole, the motion is produced in nearly the same manner. When in the seat, Mr. Kent's feet descended to within a few inches of the water; and to his shoes were buckled the paddles, made of block-tin likewise, and having a joint yielding in one direction, so as not to give a counter-motion to the machine when moving the leg forward for a new stroke. His heels rested in stirrups attached to the saddle, and the motion was performed by the alternate action of the feet. Mr. Kent started about half-past two o'clock, and after various evolutions, crossing and re-crossing the dock several times, and firing a fowling-piece, which, with a fishing-rod, were buckled to the rod in front of the saddle, he proved, to the satisfaction of the numerous spectators, the complete safety of his machine, and the practicability of using it even for a considerable distance.—Edinb. Courant.

Federal Wealth.—Hugh, Lord Despensers, called Earl of Gloucester, (who was executed,) was possessed, at his death, of no less than 59 lordships in different counties, 28,000 sheep, 1000 oxen and steers, 1200 kine, with their calves, 40 mares, with their colts of two years, 160 drawing-horses, 2000 hogs, 3000 bullocks, 40 tons of wine, 600 baccons, 80 carcasses of Martinmas beef, 600 muttons; in his larder, 10 tons of cyder; armour, plate, jewels, and ready money, better than 10,000*l.*; 26 sacks of wine, and a library of books.

Wine.—Jemshead, who is celebrated as the founder of Persepolis, was the first who discovered wine. He was immoderately fond of grapes, and desired to preserve some; which were placed in a large vessel, and lodged in a vault for future use. When the vessel was opened, the grapes had fermented; and their juice in this state was so acid, that the King believed it must be poisonous. He had some vessels filled with it, and poison written upon each; they were placed in his room. It happened that one of his favourite ladies was affected with nervous head aches; the pain distracted her so much, that she desired death. Observing a vessel with poison written on it, she took it and swallowed its contents. The wine, for such it had become, overpowered the lady, who fell down into a sound sleep, awoke much refreshed and delighted with the remedy,—she repeated the dose often, so the monarch's poison was all drank. He soon discovered this, and forced the lady to confess what she had done. A quantity of wine was made; and Jem-sheed and all his court drank of the new beverage; which, from the circumstance that led to its discovery, is to this day known in Persia by the name of Zcher-e-Kooshon—the delightful poison.

In a French paper of the 1st June, 1821, a Scotch dog is advertised to be sold; the owner demands 1500 francs for him, which he will consent to take in works of science of an equal value.

The Lancastrian system makes a rapid progress in France; in the department of the Moselle there are of an age to go to school 27,507 boys and 24,513 girls; of these 23,916 boys and 21,040 girls attend the schools.

Saving banks are becoming general in France; at Rouen, in six months, the receipts amount to 100,000 francs, (4000l.); and at Paris in eight months, above 16,000l. The effect on the morals of the lower classes is already felt.

A FAITHFUL and POPULAR ACCOUNT of the PROCESSIONS and CEREMONIES observed in the CORONATION of the KINGS and QUEENS of ENGLAND, exemplified in that of their late most sacred majesties, King George the Third and Queen Charlotte; with all the other interesting proceedings connected with that magnificent festival; embellished with elegant Copper-plate Engravings of the Procession at large, comprising nearly 200 figures; the Champion's Challenge; a very curious and highly illustrative plan of a part of Westminster; the Regalia of England, &c. &c. &c.

Edited by RICHARD THOMSON.

The work is beautifully printed, particularly the Forms of Procession; and it is published at a price which speaks much in praise of the liberality of the bookseller. On the whole, we feel no hesitation in declaring our conviction that the hope of the author will be realized; that this work will be thought worthy of preservation for future reference, not only as a work of curiosity, but also as air-maps assistant to the ceremony of a modern Coronation. Literary Chronicle, April 15, 1820.

riched with small figures of the latter end of the 15th century; its sculptured ornaments are varied and elaborate. At Stuttgart, our author visited Dannecker, the sculptor, whom he calls the Chastrey of Suabia. Of the productions of this artist he speaks with raptures. He was admitted to the study of the sculptor, where, says he—

‘It was my good fortune to witness one original of transcendent merit. I mean the Colossal head of Schiller; who was the intimate friend and a townsman (Stuttgart) of this able sculptor. I never stood before so expressive a modern countenance. The forehead is high and wide, and the projections over the eyebrows are boldly but finely and gradually marked. The eye is rather full, but retired. The cheeks are considerably shrunk. The mouth is full of expression, and the chin somewhat elongated. The hair flows behind in a broad mass, and ends in a wavy curl upon the shoulders; not very unlike the professional wigs of the French barristers, which I had seen at Paris. Upon the whole, I prefer this latter, for breadth and harmony, to the formal conceit of the wig à la Grecque. “It was so,” said Dannecker, “that Schiller wore his hair; and it was precisely with this physiognomical expression that he came out to me, dressed en roqueleur from his inner apartment, when I saw him for the last time. I thought to myself on so seeing him,” added the sculptor, “that it is thus that I will chisel your bust in marble.” Dannecker then requested me to draw my hand gently over the forehead, and to observe by what careful and almost imperceptible gradations, this boldness of front had been accomplished. I listened to every word that he said about the extraordinary character then, as it were, before me, with an earnestness and pleasure which I can hardly describe; and walked round and round the bust with a gratification approaching to ecstasy. They may say what they please at Rome, or at London, but a finer specimen of art, in its very highest department, and of its particular kind, the chisel of no living sculptor hath achieved. As a bust it is perfect. It is the man; with all his mind in his countenance; without the introduction of any sickly airs and graces, which are frequently the result of a predetermination to treat it as Phidias or Praxiteles would have treated it.’

From Stuttgart, Mr. Dibdin visited Ulm, Augsburg, and Munich, where he made several bibliographical gleanings; but we cannot pursue the subject farther, and shall, therefore, only quote two anecdotes; the first, of Bonaparte, is related on the authority of Moreau:—

‘It was during the crisis of some great battle in Austria, when the fate of the day was very doubtful, that Bonaparte ordered Lasnes to make a decisive movement with his cavalry. Lasnes seemed to hesitate—

Bonaparte reiterated the order, and Lasnes appeared to hesitate again—as if doubting the propriety of the movement. Bonaparte eyed him with a look of ineffable contempt; and added, almost fixing his teeth together, in a hissing but biting tone of sarcasm,—“Est ce que je t’ai fait trop riche ?” Lasnes dashed his spurs into the sides of his charger, and prepared to put the command of his master into execution.’

The next anecdote, with which we shall conclude, relates to Bonaparte’s successful opponent, the Duke of Wellington, and was related to Mr. Dibdin when on his route from Ratisbon to Nuremberg. He says,—

‘We reached Neumarkt about night-fall and got into very excellent quarters. The rooms of the inn which we occupied had been filled by the Duke of Wellington and Lord Castlereagh on their journey to Congress in the winter of 1814. The master of the inn related to us a singular anecdote respecting the duke. On hearing of his arrival, the inhabitants of the place flocked round the inn, and, the next morning, the duke found the tops of his boots half cut away, from the desire which the people expressed of having some memorial of the “Great Captain of the Age”; so I heard him called every where in Austria and Bavaria by men of every rank and degree in society, and by professional men as frequently as by others. I recollect when at Landsturt, standing in the gall of the hotel, and conversing with two door-looking Bavarian officers, who had spent half their lives in the service, one of them declaring that ‘he should like to have been opposed to Wellington; to have died in such opposition, if he could not have vanquished him.’ I asked him why? “Because,” said he “there is glory in such a contest, for he is doubtless the first captain of the age.”

Mr. Dibdin afterwards visited Vienna, and turned the Imperial Library, and every public and private collection, almost top-sy-turvy, in order to discover their rarest contents; this part of the work is almost exclusively bibliographical: we could extract curious particulars from it, but we must now take our leave. It appears to us, that this work possesses all the merits and all the faults of the author’s former productions; there is much that is interesting, but more that is trifling; sometimes ingenious trifling, we admit, but it is unworthy of such a work; his affectation, in introducing scraps of French and bits of black letter, is, to say the least of it, very silly; and his continued eulogies on the talents of Mr. Lewis, though well merited, savour strongly of puffing. We cannot, however, avoid awarding the highest praise to this artist, whose pencil has been abundantly exercised in all the varieties of portrait, landscape, architecture, &c., with the happiest success. The embellishments are certainly of the highest order, and the work does much credit to the graphic and typographic taste of the age.

My Note-Book; or, Sketches from the Gallery of St. Stephens. A Satirical Poem. By Wilfred Woodfall, Esq. 12mo. pp. 97. London, 1821.

It is now 5 o’clock p. m. on Thursday, a time when our critical labours are usually concluded, but so smart a little satire has been put into our hands that we will not suffer a moment’s delay before we introduce it to our readers. Wilfred Woodfall, Esq. is a worthy successor to the ingenious authors of the Bath Guide, and the Rejected Addresses, and he has a more legitimate subject for his poetical cat-o’-nine-tails than either of his predecessors. His little poem has nothing of party in it: he has been contented ‘to shoot folly as it flies,’ whether he found it on the treasury, opposition, or cross-benches, and, therefore, we find faithful portraits of members of all descriptions from the Marquess of Londonderry to Mr. Richard Martin, including Messrs. Croker, Peter Moore, Bragge, Bathurst, Bennet, Wynne, Hobhouse, Wood, Douglas, Brougham, Lord Lowther, Sir Joseph Yorke, &c. The scene may be said to be one night’s debate, in which the characters appear naturally and without constraint. It is commenced by Peter Moore, who whines to Sheridan’s memory, and abuses ministers for sending a commission to inquire into the conduct of the Queen; Martin calls him to order without cause. At length, Mr. Bragge, with ‘paunch obese and gills of livid hue,’ rises to answer the member for Coventry; and those who have heard the right honorable member, will think the following no bad imitation of his style:—

“If principles ‘gainst principles be set,
Then let those principles be fairly met:
I mean sound principles,—the House will see
That principles, in which we all agree,
Are not like principles that raise a doubt:
Now, sir, a man may often turn about,
And take up principles oppos’d to those;
But, what’s the consequence? no mortal knows.
This, sir, I think, does certainly embrace
The great and leading features of the case.
The honourable member has no right
A premature discussion to invite Upon a Bill drawn up with so much care,
And now in progress, as we know, elsewhere:
I deprecate the course he has pursued,
As calculated only to delude.

Why, sir, we know that inferences just
Are drawn from premises when well dissuad'd;
Some measures may be censur'd in detail,
But the great principle will never fail.
When, from the proposition, comes that sense Which proves the necessary consequence. (A laugh.)

My noble friend and I have ever tried,
Upon this principle, our plans to guide;
But, I lament, sir, that in times like these,
Do what they will, no ministers can please."

After some interruptions and explanations from Peter, Mr. Bennet rises,—
"He, who, living, for each creature lives,
Who both his ears with prompt delusion gives
To every sharper, swindler, knave, or thief,
If he, who asks them, will but ask relief."

He rises to present a petition, to complain of the conduct of some magistrate; and the silly, trifling, and affected sensibility of this gentleman, is very well hit off in the following story which he relates:—

"A little boy, who drove a little ass,
A month ago, thro' Fulham chanc'd to pass;
Two pendant baskets which the donkey bore,
Contain'd its master's last remaining store
Of baking apples, which, in tedious rout,
The little vagrant daily hawk'd about.

Not far from Fulham had he bent his way,
When his poor ass, with fear, began to Bray;
And well it might,—for soon a fellow grapples
The harmless lad, and tumbles out his apples.
But, why this outrage?—Sir, I know not why,—
Except that in each basket chanc'd to lie
A quarter loaf, which some vile baker swore
Had left his basket half an hour before,
Alleging, as a proof of what he said,
That he could well identify the bread;

And that the boy upon his dog had gain'd
While he was by a customer detain'd.
Was ever tale more clearly void of truth?—
Yet, neither could the innocence nor youth
Of this poor lad secure him from a goal;
He had no friends, so could procure no bail.

The magistrate, a scandal to the land,
Refus'd to listen,—would not understand
The artless story which the prisoner told,—
How he bought bread, his apples when he sold.

To Newgate, sir, at once he had him sent,
And, still on cruel violence intent,
He thus address'd him, with unfeeling heart:—
"You graceless thief, your back is sure to smart;

The cut shall teach you people's goods to pass,
And steal no leaves when next you drive your ass."

These were the words, the barbarous words, he spoke;

But words cannot describe the piteous look
Which the dumb brute, with terror and dismay,
Cast on the boy, as he was borne away.

Now, sir, I ask, is not this flagrant case,
To British justice, a most foul disgrace?
Can we,—can we,—say, sir, can we sit
Within these walls, and such disgrace permit?

The noble lord may bear it as he will;
But, as for me, my duty I'll fulfil,
And "drag the struggling monster into day,"
Who dur'd to act — (Hear, hear, from C—st—ugh.)

Yes, this I'll do,—I tell the noble lord,
Unless the boy is to his ass restor'd.

Castlereagh next—
"stands forth,

By native care to give his nonsense worth."

How well this observation applies to him, let the following, which is a fair specimen in verse of one of his speeches in prose, testify:—

"The House, I think, will find
That matters may with questions be combin'd;
Which have no common texture in their loom,
If party will be warp'd to give them room;
Th' invectives we have heard from t'other side
Come floating on the perforating tide
Of declamation, and the slimy beach
Is wash'd with all the noxious weeds of speech
At this conjuncture, when the vital spring
Of moral action takes a lawless swing;

Of moral action takes a lawless swing;
When the pure stream of justice finds its links
By faction question'd in its public chinks;
When men of probity are sure to fall
Within the reach of that outrageous gale,
Which blights the virtues and corrupts the heart;

When none are spar'd who act an honest part;
When black sedition runs its odious race
To subjugate the intellectual pace,
Which leads to social order by a course,
Distinct from mobs and democratic force,
And turns the scale of equi-potent pow'r
Obedient to the working of the hour,—

That working which the Constitution feels,
As each new impulse operates on wheels
That never cease their circumambient rounds, Yet never go beyond their proper bounds. (A laugh.)

At such a time I see, with great regret,
That in this House some gentlemen are met,
Who draw upon their figurative stores
To outdistance the clamorous out of doors,
And speak in terms which no man can endure
Of individuals scrupulously pure.

Really, sir, it is too much to brook
That such a worthy man as Mister C—
Should have his name dragg'd forth to public scorn;

No better man, I'm sure, was ever born.
The breath of calumny could never reach
The spotless character of Sir John L—ch,— A man whose mind no pow'r on earth could sway,

If standing prostrate justice marr'd the way;
A man, who in his public conduct shews
The private qualities by which he rose. (A laugh.)

A man, of all, who knows not to collapse
With circumstances into open gaps;
Nor seeks, by retrogressive movements, to advance,

The retrogression may sometimes enhance
The value of that honourable prize
Which fair ambition holds before its eyes."

"Smell-Journal W—ne" next speaks, and is followed by—
"John Cam, the glory and the rising hope
Of fam'd Sir Francis,"

Whose small talk and fondness for Latin quotations is well ridiculed.
Speaking of Latin quotations, brings us to the worthy member for Galway, who, in the course of a very luminous speech, introduces the following "episode:—

"I have a garden, sir, at Conamara,
Where Mick Mullowny one day drew the harrow."

"Now Mick," says I, "take care of the young trees!"

"Don't fear," says he, "tis I that sav'd the bees,"

And sent them swarming back into the hive;
They came out dead, but now they're all alive."

(A loud laugh.)
I walk'd away, but, when I came to look
At all the pains the lazy rascal took,
I soon exclaim'd—"You prince of stupid brutes!"

Upon my soul you're torn up all the roots!"
The fellow stood, and, gaping like a fool,
Listen'd a while most insensibly cool,—
"Then, sir," says he, "don't say a word about 'em;

The trees, I know, will grow as well without 'em."
(Laughter.)

Need I observe how well this case applies
To every wicked radical, who tries
To pluck those roots from which the church and King,

And all the lords, and all the judges spring?
None will assert, that, if the roots were gone,
The trunks would thrive as hitherto they've done.

Sir, as for freedom, we have quite enough!—
The Mayor of Galway gave a smart rebuff
To one Jim Shaughnessy, the other day,
Who wish'd to dictate rather than obey;
And ask'd the worthy magistrate to call
A public meeting, with intent to brawl
Against the constitution of the land.

"Tim," says the mayor, "I'll answer your demand,

By letting Galway see your naked back,
If one word more of politics you elick;
You are, I find, a most ishman pig;
You don't regard the venerable wig.

Upon the parson, or the parish priest,
You've turn'd philosopher, you dirty beast."
(Much laughter.)

Here is a mayor on whom we can depend,—
I always was and still will be his friend;
His uncle's grandson, Mr. Daly knows,
To me some lasting obligations owes.

I made him bailiff of my own estate;—
(Hem! question! question!)

D—ck—"Wait a little, wait!—
But one word more, sir, and I shall sit down.
(Hear, hear, cries N—n—hear, cries D—s—B—n.)

Hence compar'd his nation to a ship,
I sometimes into that fine author dip;
And now I say—"O navis mea fluctans,"

"I rise to order," cries Sir W—m C—ts:—
No member ought to quote broad Irish here."
(A laugh.)

"Irish!" says D—ck:—"Irish it may appear
To those who sit in judgment at Guildhall,
To every alderman both great and small;
But, in this house, it will be understood."

As Latin, metaphorically good" (A laugh.)
Sir W—m explains:—
"Yes, I perceive I made a slight mistake;—
D—ck—"I once mistook a gander for a drake."

The city worthy, Alderman Wood, though lashed in rhyme, is praised in prose, in a note, for his activity as chief magistrate of the city, and for his humanity in rescuing the three condemned Irishmen from the gallows.

The minute detail of this worthy burgess is well described, but we have only room for the exordium of his speech.

"Now sapient W—m, that alderman so great,
Who, in the pomp and pageantry of state,
For two whole years a city monarch sate,
Dispensing justice from his coachy throne,

Who, in the pomp and pageantry of state,
For two whole years a city monarch sate,
Dispensing justice from his coachy throne,

Who, in the pomp and pageantry of state,
For two whole years a city monarch sate,
Dispensing justice from his coachy throne,

Who, in the pomp and pageantry of state,
For two whole years a city monarch sate,
Dispensing justice from his coachy throne,

Who, in the pomp and pageantry of state,
For two whole years a city monarch sate,
Dispensing justice from his coachy throne,

Who, in the pomp and pageantry of state,
For two whole years a city monarch sate,
Dispensing justice from his coachy throne,

And sending harlots, with their flashmen, hopping,
Beyond the bounds of Temple Bar and Wapping;
—W—, whom the halls of Brandenburg confess
The boldest scourge of ladies in distress;
Whom Count Vassali hails with heartfelt glee,
And Countess Oldi calls her cher ami, Because their pensions, as they think, were sav'd

By his emprise, so nobly he behav'd;
Now does he in his wretched style essay
A congruous, clear, consecutive display.
"I hope and trust the house will not expect
That I should now her Majesty protect,
By telling of the various facts I know;
And I ashore the house they'll give a blow,—
A blow, that, falling like a clap of thunder,
Will strike nation and the house with wonder.
I was at breakfast, in my morning gown,
My eldest daughter, then, was out of town;
My youngest boy was sitting by my side;
My eldest son had just gone out to ride:
My cook and butler had that day got marry'd,
And three months after, the poor bride miscarry'd." (A laugh.)
I'm thus minute, to show that I can tell
The very day I heard from Sergeant Pell
A fine quotation—"I forget the book,
From which these words the learned sergeant took:

"But he who fishes from me my good name,"
Let all the Queen's traducers, to their shame,
Observe the words, and learn at last to stop;—
Now off to France I soon resolv'd to pop.
I certainly no longer could remain,
From circumstances which I can't explain;
I take no credit in the thing,—not I;
My services I never could deny
To any lady; and for Caroline,
Our gracious Queen! my life I would resign."

The barbarous pronunciation of the modern Whittington does not, of course, escape Mr. Woodfall. We must pass over Mr. Brougham, though the satirist has been quite at home with him, to notice

That plodding pioneer,

Hume, who, in despite of himself and the horse, renders good service to the country, by his unconquerable pertinacy and zeal. Among articles that require retrenchment, the member for Aberdeen complains of the dress of the yeomen of the guard, and the expense of the men who have 30l. per annum, in the island of Ceylon, for guarding elephants' teeth. He has, however, a more serious charge to make against Ministers—that of neglecting his countrymen in the affair of the COAL METERS.

"The house, I hope, will give me leave to add
A word, or two upon a case so bad
That language of the strongest kind must fail
Its gross injustice fairly to detail.
It shows how far a system can proceed
By which alone the droves of office feed—
A system, that, regardless of their worth,
Neglects those hardy yeomen from the north,
My countrymen, who fought before they fed,
While gay Cockneys go'd and went to bed:

(A laugh.)

No Abercrombies, Doughlasses, or Grubams,
Are station'd as coal-meters on the Thames.

On these, a bold and independent race,
The partial minister confers no place.
Too proud to sue, they never haunt the spot
Where the rewards of bows and scrapes are got.
But is it, sir, because a Scotchman's feet
Dare'n't chance to lead him into Downing Street,
Or near the Treasury, that he must forgo
The claims of justice? Sir, I answer, no!
As clever men as ever cross'd the Tweed
Are disregarded for a puny breed
Of stupid cockneys, insolent and vain,
Who all the places on the Thames obtain:
On every wharf where colliers land their coal,
The cockney rules with absolute control.
In short, because he has a lucky lot
He's sure to get whatever can be got.

* * * * * Vote. * * * * * Bought.

Sir, this corrupt monopoly is vile,
And I'll give notice in a little while
Of some decisive motion that shall make
The city jobbers and their masters quake."

(Cheers and laughter.)

Here we terminate, and we could not do it at a more appropriate expression, for if the perusal of this very smart little work does not produce 'cheers and laughter,' we shall henceforth have no faith in our judgment, and no very enviable opinion of the reader's understanding.

*A Dialogue in the Shades; between William Caxton a Bibliomaniac, and William Wyken, Clerk. Rare Doings at Roxburgh Hall, a Ballad.
The Diary of Roger Payne. 8vo.
London, 1821.*

Our readers will this week have 'the bane and antidote set before them.'
We have already devoted some space to the last production of the first of bibliomaniacs, and we now turn to a very smart jeu d'esprit on bibliomanical follies, which it happily ridicules, while it censures with due severity
those pretended patrons of literature, whose only object is—

— "to look

On tatter'd scraps of ancient book;
A catchword seize as quick as Barto,
And tell a folio from a quarto;
Uniques with piercing eye to ken,
Prize one of two leaves more than ten;
Old Homer, Pliny, Plato, Caesar,
Discard for Tom, the courtly sneezer;
"Joe Spynner's" gestic" and "Withers' cruma" Prefer to Plutarch's axioms."

The 'Rare Doings at Roxburgh-
Hall' is an imitation of the well-known ballad of Chevy Chase, in honour of the sale, of the Valdrafer Decanetion, which, after a spirited contest, was purchased at the Duke of Roxburgh's sale at the immense sum of 2360l. by the Marquess of Blandford, now the Duke of Marlborough. 'Bibliomania has somewhat declined since then, as, when his Grace, after having the toy in his possession half a dozen years, sent it again to the hammer, it only fetched 875 guineas.

The diary of Roger Payne is in prose; this honest tradesman was a bookbinder, who lived close to the Mew's Gate, and he has had all the immortality that bibliomania can confer on him for his skill in his art or profession. Whatever talent, however, he possessed in this line, he must not be thought to have been infected with the mania of his employers, as will be seen from one or two extracts from his diary:—

Saturday.—Took Sir John Trusthold's six folio volumes of Turnpike Tickets to his house in C— square, No. 1. to 3690 from 1737 to 1771: bound in the best Levant morocco, nicely inlaid, with a ruled border round each—squared true with the compasses—the dirty ones required several washings to take out the dirt and grease—made them quite clean;
sewed with the best silk; no false bands—made them open well—took a great deal of time finishing.—Sir John's arms on the sides being obliged to be worked off plain first, and afterwards the gold laid on, and worked off again—carefully and honestly done.

Wednesday.—Sir John gave me seventeen volumes of small outlandish books, Elsevirs he called them, for binding in plain morocco, single lines—ordered to be well beat to stretch them out, and with stilted boards to make them look tall.
Sir John told me to be sure to put plenty of alum in my paste, and bind the worms, to prevent them from breeding."

Roger next visits Mr. Gorge-Book, a great collector of 'old songs, strange stories, and doleful ditties,' whom, after wading through long alleys and rows of quires and bound, he at last finds blocked up in a corner:—

"He had just finished collating a little book called the "Mousings of Tibby the Black Cat;" which he told me he had bought at the last Chumcheat sale for twenty six pounds and fifteen shillings;
and that it was a unuch." It so happened, as I told him, that I had the week before bound a very fine copy of the same unuch for Miss Felissa C.—who has a very large collection in the Pussu line: this lady was a very good customer of mine, and I took great pains to make her unuch as beautiful as possible, by picking the best leaves out of three copi: this I reckoned one of my best performances; and, as it gave great satisfaction to Miss Felissa, thought I could not better recommend myself to Mr. Gorge-Book, than by telling him how tastily it was bound—when I talked of the three copies, I observed him to make a wry face, but could not guess why: after a little shaking of the under lip, all was smooth again. Being always very careful not to offend, I concluded he was not displeased with my behaviour, but that something unpleasant at that moment came across him. Desired his Cat-Book to be bound exactly in the same way, that is in gray tortoise shell, with a great variety of cat-eye tooling on the back and sides, and the inside lined with water-labby—promised me "Witt's Bridal" and nineteen more unuchs, as he called them, when I had finished the Cat.

Thursday.—Carried home the Cat-Book.—Mr. Gorge-Book called me a noddy, for mislettering Musings.—I defended myself by telling him, Mr. S. said that musings was wrong, and that it ought to be as I lettered it: Miss Felissa's copy was done the same way.

Those who are at all acquainted with the characters and proceedings of the bibliomanics will see some very fair hits at them generally, and will not even fail to identify some gentlemen who are more immediately alluded to.

Woman in India. A Poem. With Notes. By John Lawson, Missionary at Calcutta. Part I. Female Influence. Foolscap 8vo. pp. 36. London, 1821.

WHILE our local, lake, and metropolitan poets are endeavouring to gratify us by 'penning sonnets to their mistresses' eyebrows,' or by giving us fictitious narrations of elfin queens, Mr. Lawson, in a truly devotional and missionary spirit, tunes the strings of his harp in behalf of 'Woman in India.' For this attempt, we give him our warmest thanks, and we hope to be able to shew our readers that he is well deserving of them. We think, however, had the poem been written in rhyme instead of blank verse, its author would have enjoyed a larger share of popularity with the ladies of Britain, to whom it is dedicated, and is designed to attract their attention towards a most interesting but degraded portion of their own sex. We admit that woman's love ought to be as 'strong as death and secret as the grave,' but we cannot reflect without the softest emotions of pity, on the sight of a beautiful creature voluntarily sacrificing her life through a mistaken notion of dutiful attachment. In this country, when one parent is separating from the other in the omnipotence of death, the sweetest consolation of the dying is, that its survivor will prove a guardian to the surviving offspring,—a 'father to the fatherless,'—a friend that loveth at all times, and that sticketh closer than a brother.

The passage we shall select as a specimen of the poem, must come home to every bosom where nature and affection reign. It is on the death of a child:—

* O she is gone!

The cherub basted to its native home.
All-waiting death hath triumphed o'er my child,—

Sweet wither'd lily! thou wast riven and flung Across my shaking knees, a lovely wreck
Of innocence and beauty. Long I saw,
Long, long, the fearful presage hung about
Her beauteous features, darkening round her eyes;

But they would smile with gladdening love
Upon me.

To me thou wast a plaything beyond price,—
Health in thy countenance, and sprightliness
In all thy motions, made thee like a being
Of fancy sporting in a pleasant dream.

O 'twas too like a dream! Thy yellowish locks
Of shining hair, parted with infant grace
Upon thy snowy forehead, and thy smiles,
Pleading expressively when thou would'st play
With my fair sea-shells, tinged with blushing stains,

Like thy own ruby lips, and thy clear voice,
So musical and merry, with thy arms
All plump and white, entwined around my neck,

Glow on my anguish'd mind, while I remember Thy labouring breath when dying; and thy pale

Shivering and sickly hands, which could no longer Grasp the cold cup of water; and that look,

That plaintive look, which spoke a thousand words

Of calm unutterable fondness. Mute
Became thy little tongue for ever quenched;
In settled dimness, were thy sorrowful eyes.
Upward me not! speak not of the great soul,
Nor shame these burning tears. May not stern

One moment weep? I could not then control
The tumult of my heart, when death had done
Such deadly work.

Were it not for our limited space, we could enlarge this quotation by passages still more calm and melancholy; but we must pass them over for our readers' closets and retired boudoirs. The blemishes, not only of 'Woman in India,' but of Mr. Lawson's production, are but few. Without advancing sectarian principles, sweet tones of purity and benevolence pervade the whole poem; many of its descriptions are natural and pathetic; it discovers much good taste, laudable energy, and original thought, which rarely fail of being highly appreciated by cultivated minds, and of proving instructive to all classes of readers. That the author's design may be completed, and oriental civilization advanced to the perpetual abolition of those unhallowed and unnatural rites, which at present stain so extensive a portion of the world, must be the sincere wish of every benevolent mind.

JOAN OF ARC.*

It was during the last domination of the English, that Joan of Arc, called the Maid of Orleans, was executed at Rouen. This atrocious procedure, which must be attributed partly to the policy of the foreign power which then held Normandy, partly to the superstitious bigotry and narrow spirit of the times, and partly, perhaps, to revenge, is connected not only with the history of Rouen, where it took place, but also with that of the age.

In 1429, France was plunged into an abyss of calamities and humiliations; Charles VII. retained possession of no more than part of the banks of the Loire; a series of defeats had realized the title of King of the City of Bourges, which the gallantry of his enemies had bestowed on him. Enfeebled by his misfortunes, against which his natural indolence prevented him from struggling with sufficient fortitude, forsaken by the chief supporters of his throne, betrayed by his own mother, this prince, round whom yet rallied a group of faithful soldiers, had retired into Touraine.

The appearance of Joan of Arc at this juncture, her solemn assurances of the reconquest of France, the enthusiasm which animated her, and which she soon communicated to others, must undoubtedly be attributed to the policy of some of the ministers or persons in power, who, reckoning upon the credulity of an ignorant people, employed this young female as a useful instrument. Her mind, imbued with the superstitious notions which then prevailed, and especially at Domremy, her birth-place, led her easily into a belief of pretended revelations. The natural exaltation which characterized her was thereby heightened. There is every reason to believe, that Joan was thoroughly convinced, that her mission was truly divine. Joan, therefore, thinking herself inspired, all France was interested in thinking her so too; and this enterprise, which would have been ridiculous had it failed, was rendered heroic by its success. The French must have given credit the more easily to this miracle, as it seemed to be announced by ancient prophecies, for which superstition had gained implicit belief.

Joan of Arc, in the battles which she fought, brought victory back to the French banners; and infused such valour into the army, that, in the course of a single year, Charles VII. delivered and retook part of the most important cities of his kingdom, caused himself to be crowned at Rheims, and inflicted the severest blows on the power which had driven him from his very throne.

During this brilliant campaign, the Maid of Orleans displayed a courage,

Review of New Books.

Travels of Cosmo the Third, Grand Duke of Tuscany, through England, during the Reign of King Charles the Second (1669.) Translated from the Italian Manuscript in the Laurentian Library at Florence. To which is prefixed a Memoir of his Life: Illustrated with a Portrait of his Highness, and Thirty-nine Views. 4to. pp. 506. London, 1821.

Cosmo the Third, whose travels in England are now for the first time presented to the public, was the son of Ferdinand II. Grand Duke of Tuscany, and was born in the year 1642. His education was entrusted to his mother, who, separated from her husband and surrounded by priests, permitted his youthful mind to contract a disgust for the pursuits of elegant literature, and to consider the attainment of true philosophy as inconsistent with his religion; thus, at a period when the intellect is most easily encouraged to engage in the pursuits of useful knowledge, the mind of Cosmo was devoted to solitude, or exercised only on the barren themes of scholastic divinity. His mind, thus early alienated from all occupations of genius, inimical to poetry and music, and averse to the natural vivacity and gaiety of youth, found no pleasure but in the conversation of priests and the ceremonies of the Catholic religion; and his father, too late discovering that error which entrusted his education to the maternal care of the grand duchess, sought to rectify its defects by an appropriate marriage. Many princesses were offered to his choice, and, amongst other, one of the exiled family of the Sturges; but the fear of giving offence to Cromwell, induced Ferdinand to reject this proposal. One of the daughters of Gaston, Duke of Orleans, appeared the most eligible alliance, and Margaret Louisa, the eldest, a princess of rare beauty and extraordinary vivacity, whose hopes had been directed to the French throne, was compelled by the authority of Louis XIV. to accept the Tuscan alliance.

After leaving in his hands a protest against it, she externally consented with a good grace, and her espousals were solemnized by proxy, at the Louvre, on the 18th of April, 1661.

Scarcely had the princess arrived in Tuscany, when she openly expressed an unconquerable dislike to the country, a contempt for the people, and an abhorrence of every Italian custom. The character of Cosmo, who was proud and cold, was little calculated to sooth the disappointed feelings of his bride. Domestic feuds, which could not be concealed within the palace, soon followed this unhappy union. The princess, whose conduct had been highly censurable, was for some time exiled from the court, and confined to the Villa of Poggio a Cajano. She had not been long in this solitude, when, impatient of confinement, she suddenly returned to Florence, and throwing herself into the arms of her husband, she besought with tears and entreaties a remission of her offences and oblivion of her conduct. A reconciliation took place, but very soon after she was detected in forming an intrigue with a Frenchman of the lowest rank, a perquisite it is supposed, with whom she had projected an elopement. This discovery produced the necessity of the strictest guard being placed upon her conduct, and this restraint still more increased her desire of flight; so that, when in Pisa, it was discovered that she had formed a plan of escape by associating with a company of gypsies. So disgraceful an attempt could scarcely have been credited, had she not been overheard, from a window of the palace, carrying on her treaty with these new allies. We will not trace this princess through the succeeding years of her disgraceful life, which terminated in 1721. She had been long separated from Cosmo, and had resided in France; for some time she was at a convent at Montmartre, the discipline of which she grossly violated, but she still had the protection of the French court, which shielded her from the revenge of her husband, whose monkish solitude had ripened into the most absolute tyranny.

It was to escape the scenes of domestic discord, that Cosmo relinquished the happy clime and polished society of Florence; and in the month of Sept. 1668, he set sail from Leghorn, and landed at Barcelona, and passing from thence to Madrid, in the usual incognito of princes, he traversed the whole western part of Spain, and proceeded into Portugal. From Lisbon he went to Corunna, where he embarked for England, and afterwards visited Holland and Paris. A most elaborate account was kept of all that occurred in these travels, accompanied by designs made upon the spot, wherever the royal stranger rested, was received, or detained. These travels form two immense folio volumes in manuscript, which are preserved in the Laurentian Library at Florence. That part of these travels which relates to our own country has excited considerable interest among the numerous English travellers who have visited Florence.

In this history of his travels, Cosmo must be considered as the traveller only. Under his direction, the narrative, or rather journal, was written by the celebrated Count Lorenzo Magalotti, one of the most learned and eminent characters of the court of Ferdinand II. The friendship and correspondence which this elegant scholar enjoyed with Lord Somers, and Sir Isaac Newton (by whom he was denominated the 'magazine of good taste'), elevates the character of the narrative, and adds considerably to its interest.

The period in which these travels were undertaken, was not, perhaps, the most favourable to our national character. A licentious court, which will never fail to have an extensive influence on the manners of a people, had just succeeded the whining hypocrisy of Cromwell's puritanical government, and the recent restoration of the exiled family, had carried the public from republicanism to a blind and infatuated attachment to royalty. The travels of Cosmo will, however, be read with great interest, as they afford a transient view of the state of society at that time, not only in the metropolis, but throughout the kingdom. The drawings made of the different towns and houses are highly interesting, and when contrasted with the present state of many of these places, show an advancement which could scarcely have been expected, even in the course of a century and a half.

This work is said to be a faithful translation from the original Italian, by a distinguished pen. It is a plain and unartificial narrative, recording events as they occurred during the progress of the prince, and describing places as they really appeared. As illustrative of England at an interesting period, the work is curious and valuable, and we regret that it has been published in a form so expensive, as to prevent its being read so universally as might have been wished.

The journal is interspersed with characteristic sketches of the inhabitants, the court, and nobility; an account of the various sects at that time known in England, the laws and constitution of the country, &c.

Cosmo embarked at Corunna, on board the English ship Portland, on the 19th of March, 1669. The captain, mistaking the British Channel for that of St. George, landed the prince in Ireland instead of England; and the first description in the journal is that of Kinsale, of which we have a view. Of this part of Ireland, we are told, that—

“The greater part of the inhabitants are English, who were restored by the royal clemency to the possessions of which they had been deprived by the preceding kings, and particularly by Cromwell; and came to inhabit this island, and having established several colonies, gave their minds to commerce. The Catholics of Kinsale, who are also scattered over the surrounding territory, are estimated at about two hundred; many of them live miserably in the country, in mud cabins, badly thatched with straw, sleeping on the ground on short mats, and subsisting chiefly on fish and cockles, which are much smaller than the oyster, and are found in these seas, adhering to the rocks; they have seldom an opportunity of eating bread. Since the insurrection of this kingdom, they have been considered almost as the people of a conquered country, and are treated as slaves, being obliged to cultivate the ground, and to account to the owner even for their scanty profits. They pay to Southwell, the proprietor of this desert, a guinea and a half a year for the rent of a cabin and a few square yards of land; and for the farms which they rent, they give three-fourths of the produce, reserving to themselves only one-fourth. A Catholic priest attends them, who is subordinate to the apostolical internuncio of Flanders, and who lives there clandestinely, celebrating mass in a house where they assemble secretly, to avoid those molestations to which they would unquestionably be subject, if they were discovered; and each person contributes six shillings towards his maintenance.”

Lord John Roberts was, at that time, Viceroy of Ireland, and the profits which he received from the government, are stated, perhaps, not very correctly, at 40,000*l.* per annum. Having inspected some cabins belonging to the peasants, the prince found they had no place to rest upon but the bare earth; and, having caused them to be reconnoitred for curiosity, he discovered that within they lived like wild beasts.

After remaining in Ireland four or five days, the prince re-embarked, and, touching at the Scilly Islands, landed at Plymouth, where he was received with the accustomed salutes from the castle, fortress, &c. Among the persons who paid their respects to the prince was Sir Jonathan Spark, who, we are told, possessed an estate of a thousand pounds a-year; consequently, he is considered the principal person of the place. Ten times this sum would not now entitle a man to be so considered at Plymouth. The manufacture of white lace was then so common, that, our traveller says, there was not a cottage in the whole counties of Devon and Somerset, where it was not made in great quantities. When at Dorchester, the prince visited the celebrated Roman amphitheatre, which is thus described:—

“When the magistrates were gone, his highness mounted his horse with his attendants, and with a retinue composed of many of the inhabitants of the town, and was conducted by the mayor to see a celebrated antiquity, two miles distant, called the Roman Camp, and, by the English, Fossway, it being an ancient tradition, that the Roman armies, who subdued this country, were there reduced to straits on a certain occasion. A little more than two musket shots from the place, is seen an elevated mound of earth, more than twice the height of a man, of an oval form, which served for a theatre, as the inhabitants have a notion, judging not only from the shade as before-mentioned, but from its having an inclination or declivity similar to that of theatres. It appears rather that this might be an advanced post, it being betwixt the camp and the town, and having, as they say, a subterraneous passage, by which it communicates with it; moreover, another similar enclosure, of a circular form, situated in another direction with respect to the larger fortification, appears to favour this supposition. At last you reach the camp, which, instead of being composed of earth conveyed thither, appears very clearly to have been an isolated mountain, and cut all round into three tiers of very high entrenchments, distinct from each other, with wide ditches between. The shape cannot be exactly ascertained, appearing for the most part circular; but in some places the angles may be clearly perceived, yet without one's being able accurately to distinguish the plan. There are in all two entrances; before each of which the three tiers of entrenchments multiplied into numerous other fortifications, which served perhaps better to secure the ingress, as it is at present the custom to conceal the gates of fortresses behind a double half moon. Hills of earth, which are reported to have been monuments of Roman soldiers and captains, are scattered all over the surrounding country, and extend to the distance of thirty miles in every direction.”

On his way to town, Cosmo stopped at Wilton, ‘the country house’ of the Earl of Pembroke, which was then, as now, celebrated for its rich furniture and splendid productions of the fine arts:—

“Here his highness returned the visit of a young unmarried daughter of the earl (another being married to the Baron Paulet) and died. There was prepared for his highness, at the head of the table, an arm-chair, which he insisted upon the young lady's taking; upon which the earl instantly drew forward another similar one, in which the serene prince sat, in the highest place; all the rest sitting upon stools. His highness obliged the earl to take the place nearest to him, though in his own house; and there were at table, besides all his highness's gentlemen, the sheriff and several other gentlemen, in all sixteen. The dinner was superb, and served in a noble style; they remained at table about two hours. In the course of the afternoon, his highness went down to the garden, and entertained himself a long time in conversation with the earl alone; and as it was nearly sun-set, he walked about the garden, through the centre of which flows a river called the Nadder, which passes under a bridge on a level with the ground, and produces trout in abundance. His highness went to see the grotto, rough-cast with pumice stone and cockle shells; several fountains that play in different ways; some rooms newly built, as well for pleasure as for the convenience of a foundry; and the maze park, and whatever else of the pleasurable and agreeable the nature and character of the country affords. He then went to view the rest of the palace, which is richly ornamented with many pictures of Vandike; and as evening now drew near, went back to Salisbury, accompanied by the same persons who had attended him in the morning. His highness there understood that a great number of ladies of the province were assembled at the house of a lady, a widow of the family of Platt, who said that they intended to come and see his highness sup; he, therefore, caused it to be signalled to them, that, without taking that trouble, he would visit them at the place where they were. This he did, and passed half an hour in their company, standing; during which time, two of them sang an English air very indifferently—the fault either of the music or of the singers. Having taken leave of them, he returned home, retiring at his usual hour."

When the prince reached Brentford, he was met by a gentleman of the King's bed chamber, with two of his majesty's carriages and five of the royal servants, to congratulate him on his arrival, and to offer him the royal palace of Somerset House for his residence; but this he declined in order to preserve his incognito, and went to the house of the Earl of St. Albans, which had been prepared for him. Here he remained three days before he could go out, 'so little punctual or anxious was the person who had the care of providing his highness's dresses.' Our modern tailors would scarcely have detained him three hours without equipping him completely. The prince having got dressed in the English fashion, visited Westminster Abbey, the ruins of St. Paul's, and the Royal Academy, from the account of which we make an extract:—

'It has for its coat of arms, a field of silver, denoting a blank tablet, enlivened with the motto "Nihilius in verba," to shew that they do not suffer themselves to be induced by passion and prejudice, to follow any particular opinions. The cabinet, which is under the care of Doctor Robert Hook, a man of genius, and of much esteem in experimental matters, was founded by Daniel Colwal, now treasurer of the academy, and is full of the greatest rarities, brought from the most distant parts; such as quadrupeds, birds, fishes, serpents, insects, shells, feathers, seeds, minerals, and many petrifications, mummies, and gums; and every day, in order to enrich it still more, the academicians contribute every thing of value which comes in their hands, so that in time it will be the most beautiful, the largest, and the most curious, in respect to natural productions, that is any where to be found. Amongst these curiosities, the most remarkable are an ostrich, whose young were always born alive; an herb, which grew in the stomach of a thrush; and the skin of a Moor, tanned, with the beard and hair white; but more worthy of observation than all the rest, is a clock, whose movements are derived from the vicinity of a loadstone, and it is so adjusted as to discover the distance of countries, at sea, by the longitude. Towards this, the planets or satellites of Jupiter, are of great service, by the observation of whose eclipses (these succeeding one another almost every day) they are studying to find out a method of forming astronomical tables, in order to discover the true meridians of the earth; for the different meridians will be shewn by the different hours at which they will happen, when observed at different places, beginning from the east, and proceeding westward. The academy has a library (given also by my Lord Henry Howard, and continually increasing in the number of its books) for the convenience of the academicians, and particularly of the two professors, who are to live in the said college (as soon as the fund from which their stipend is to be paid, can be arranged,) in the apartments preparing for that purpose, distinct from the halls and chambers appropriated to the meeting and to the council; and it is to be their duty to refer to the society, all subjects on which their opinion shall be required, and to collect the philosophical and mechanical experiments from the authors who shall be discussed, in order to facilitate the discovery of truth.'

Italy. By Lady Morgan. 2 vols. 4to. pp. 840. London, 1821.

It has been the good fortune of Lady Morgan, (and to one who possesses so much vanity as her ladyship, it must be peculiarly agreeable,) that she has a bookseller who keeps her name continually before the public. Her last production, 'France,' had scarcely run the gauntlet of the reviews, in some of which it was, perhaps, treated with too much severity, when it was announced, that her ladyship was residing in Italy, and would soon furnish a volume on the subject. From that moment up to the present hour, Lady Morgan and Italy have figured in newspaper paragraphs in all the varieties of puff prelude, puff oblique, and puff direct; and the birth of an heir to the House of Bourbon did not appear of half so much importance to the family, as this last offspring of her ladyship's fertile pen did to the public library bookseller of Conduit Street. Whenever we see these pompous announcements and attempts to forestall the public opinion, we become somewhat suspicious, and the old proverb of 'great cry and little wool' involuntarily forces itself upon us.

That Lady Morgan is an agreeable writer, and possesses considerable talents, those who have read her novels will readily admit; but it is in fiction and romance alone that she shines, and when she ventured to quit it,—in her work on France (we are wrong, she did not quit it),—she evidently committed a great error. To that work, it is now scarcely necessary to revert. Every one acquainted with France, and particularly those acquainted with Lady M. during her residence there, knows that it is a tissue of mis-statements, gross perversions, and unwarrantable assumptions; it was, however, in spite of the silly affectation of the author, a pleasing work, and was read with interest.

The present volumes are ushered to the world without preface or dedication; an advertisement, briefly stating that it has been composed from a journal kept during a residence in Italy, in the years 1819-20, and that the notes on law, statistics, and on literary disputes, together with the appendix on the state of medicine, have, at the author's request, been contributed by Sir C. Morgan. This is really very kind of her ladyship, to divide her literary honours with her husband, and thus afford him the only chance, we suspect, he could ever have of being in the least degree known in the republic of letters.

The work was not published until Thursday, which is much too late in the week to allow us to estimate its literary merit; we may, however, observe that, primâ facie, we like it better than her 'France,' although it shares largely in the faults of that much talked-of production. The work commences with an historic sketch of Italy; this is followed by an account of the passage of the Alps, and descriptions of Piedmont, Lombardy, Genoa, Parma, Bologna, Tuscany, Rome, Naples, and Venice; such is the order of her ladyship's lucubrations on Italy. The first volume, to which we shall at present confine ourselves, terminates with Bologna, or rather with Sir Charles Morgan's Medical Appendix. 'Give physic to the dogs,' we say, for our attentions shall be devoted to the lady exclusively. In contrasting the facility with which the Alps are now passed, with the dangers that formerly accompanied the attempt, her ladyship displays her political partialities. She says,—

'All that had been danger, difficulty, and suffering, but twenty years back, was now safe, facile, and enjoyable; secure beyond the reach of accident, sublime beyond the reach of thought. Legitimate princes! divine righted sovereigns! houses of France, Austria, and Savoy! "which of you have done this?" There is not one among you, descendants of a Clovis, a Barbarossa, or an Amadeus, but may, in safe conscience, shake his innocent head, and answer, "Thou canst not say 'twas I did it!'"—Neither does the world excuse you.

Her ladyship is right; it was Napoleon and not the descendants of Clovis or Barbarossa, who made the road over the Alps; and this fact, so very new, we recommend to Mathews, as an addition to his song on truisms. In the route to Turin, the fruitfulness of nature in vines, groves of mulberries, and fields of ripening corn, was contrasted with moral suffering and human infirmity:—

It is in these laughing vales that beggary assumes its most disgusting form, and that want and penury are not the least evils the wretched have to contend with. As often as we stopped to change horses, groups of miserable beings crawled round, and raised the deafening cry of "Carità, Elemosina," in the name of those negligent saints who had abandoned them to every species of physical evil. All the maladies incidental to the Alpine region seemed here accumulated. Some were blind, others devoured with scrophula, and few had their entire complement of limbs and senses. But by far the most shocking objects were the *Cretini, here strikingly numerous; and their idiot chatter and wild laugh were more fearful than even maimed limbs and distorted forms. Opposed to these groups usually stood the mistress of the pot-house, with a head piled with tawny lace and ribbons, in all the opulence and pride of the Piedmontese toilet, the spruce gens d'armes, with whom she coquetted, the whiskered corporal of the village detachment quaffing his boccale at the door, and the sleek, sly, well-fed friar again permitted to present his scrip and his benedicite at every gate.

The bippant manner in which Lady Morgan speaks of religion and religious ceremonies, however extravagant they may be, is, to say the least of it, in bad taste, and ill accords with the liberality she professes. Speaking of Turin, she says:—

But all the churches in Turin yield in consequence and celebrity to the Superga, which crowns the steepest and least accessible mountain in the vicinage of the capital. This splendid church rose to fulfil a vow of Victor Amadeus, who promised, that if his patron saint should rescue him from the clutches of the French, who were then (.700) advancing to the very gates of Turin, under the Duc de Vendôme, he would build him such a church as should surpass after less expence de l'edifice, le bras de every saint in the calendar. The engagement was provisional: no cure no pay. But the battle was won, the French were beaten, and the saint called for his church. Victor, however, begged a long day, and ten years elapsed before the work of gratitude began. Being a prince as renowned for his wisdom as his piety, he endeavoured to make the best of a bad bargain; and, instead of a spick and span new church, he obliged his architect, Philip Juvara, to use a quantity of old columns, which had long lain on his hands. The saint was done by the knowing one, [how elegant!] and the cupola of the Superga, disfigured by torses and ill-matched pillars, remains a monument of the difficulty of getting kings to remain true to their treaties, even when heaven itself is a party in the agreement.

In the illegitimate abuse which this gentle lady heaps on all legitimates, the King of Sardinia comes in for his share. His restoration in 1815 is thus described. "His majesty of Jerusalem and Cyprus, after a retreat of fifteen years in his island of Sardinia, returned from his government of the Anchovies, accompanied by an odd fish (his grand vicer Count Cerutti) his priest, his madonna, his court, and a little army of tin soldiers, which he had daily exercised in the queen's drawing room." The account of the King's remodelling his government for sixpence is amusing—if true. When he saw the alterations that had been made during his absence—

He invoked every saint in the calendar to witness his astonishment and indignation; and called upon his "bosom's counsellor, his better self." Cerutti, to know what was to be done, how the fragments of the ancient structure were to be collected, how put together, and by whom. Cerutti laughed at the royal consternation; and told the King, that for about six-pence of Piedmontese money, he would build up the ancient government dél del nuovo. The sixpence advanced, the old minister hobbled off, and in less than an hour returned with a court calendar, or red book for the year 1790. "There Sire," said he, "is your government ready made. Replace all the persons you find here, who are still living, and fill up the vacancies; and then, for the price of this book, found on a stall near your majesty's palace, you have your government re-established without trouble." The King was enchanted; the active ministry of the previous regime were immediately bani-hed; and in a few days little remained of the former system, but the abuses which it suited the new order of things to retain.

Lady Morgan denies the charge made against the French soldiery of firing at, and otherwise mutilating Leonardo da Vinci's fresco of the Last Supper in the convent of the Dominicans. She says the story is entirely false, although we have the authority of Eustace and other travellers to the contrary. We quote her ladyship's account:—

When the French army arrived at Milan, some cavalry were quartered in the convent, which had previously been devoted to military services, and the horses were stabled in the refectory, by order of the subaltern Milanese authorities, who had the direction of this measure of police. A young French officer, who had heard something of the picture, was the first to discover the risk to which it was exposed, and hastened to inform the commander-in-chief of the circumstance, who arrived in time to save this precious monument, which might have fallen a sacrifice to the brutality, not of the French, but of the persons who superintended their quarters. The circumstance of the pistol shots is universally denied. We took some pains to discover any trace of such violence; but if even a single shot had been fired by some wanton individual, it is now impossible to verify the fact.

When the French arrived in Milan, no part of the picture remained uninjured, but the sky (which, being painted in ultramarine, a colour not easily decomposed by moisture, had resisted the injuries of time), the three figures of the apostles to the left, which had been restored by Ballotti, and the profanations of Mazza. The barbarians, therefore, who have destroyed it, are the salt-petre which exudes from the wall, the smoke of the lamps, the poor cheer of the monks, and—Signore Mazza.

It is generally known that, in order to open a communication from the kitchen of the convent to the refectory, a door was made through this picture; it is through the legs of the principal figure, and that the figure of our Saviour; "thus," says Lady M. "the last supper was destroyed, that the Abbot's dinner might be served hot." Among the establishments at Milan, there is one of singular interest: an Egyptian school formed for the subjects of the Pacha. This school has already sent back some clever draughtsmen, chemists, and mathematicians. Besides the living languages, and natural sciences, the boys are taught to work in making machinery of the finer kinds, in order to introduce at home the European arts, which are yet unpractised there. In the Casa Trivulzio, there are a few good pictures, and the library is singularly rich in MSS, and in rare and precious editions, of the fifteenth century. Among the greatest rarities may be noticed a MS. Dante, and a sort of Album of Leonardo da Vinci, where a page of geometry is followed by a page of cancer.

* Cretinism is a manifest degradation of the organisation, accompanied by imperfect osseousness, as in rickets.

tures, taken perhaps from Borghetta, where he used to seek them on market days; and a vocabulary is succeeded by a sketch that portrayed all the divinity of his own genius. 'Another still more curious object, is a primer, or school book, written and beautifully illuminated by Leonardo for the use of the young Maximilian, son of Sforza del Moro, the usurping Duke of Milan.'

Our fair author gives a melancholy picture of the state to which the Milanese are reduced under Austrian domination. The viceroy has no power, or rather does not presume to exercise it, even in the merest trifle, without consulting the court at Vienna:—

'On one occasion, he wrote for leave to permit the Milanese to mask in the carnival, and the answer arrived from the Aulic Council—the first week in Lent!! Another time, he wrote for leave to fill the Arena with water, in order, during a course of severe weather, to form a sheet of ice, and enable the young Milanese to skate. There being nothing suspected of being suspicious in this proposal, it was cheerfully granted, and a brevet expedited in all possible haste, which arrived in Milan—early in the month of July!!! All papers relative to administrative affairs, however trivial, are sent to Vienna, and, sooner or later, are returned to Italy. The porters in the public offices are very poor, and paper is dear at Vienna. They take all the half sheets which remain blank, and thus the other halves, being loose, are readily lost. Sometimes they even take pieces written on one side. When this was made the subject of reiterated complaints, the viceroy at last was stimulated to promise that he would write to Vienna.

We shall now, for the present, content ourselves with separating a few of the most piquant anecdotes, or passages, that remain in the first volume, reserving the whole of the second for next week:—

The Duc de Richelieu.—During our delightful residence on the Lake of Como, we frequently used to walk to a frontier village of Italian Switzerland, called Chiasco. Although the barrier, with its placard of 'Swiss Territory,'—Territorio Svizzera—is scarcely two miles from the town of Como, the difference between the character and manners and physiognomy of the people, is most striking. One evening, we observed a large, but faded tree, planted in the main street; on enquiring, we found it had been placed there to celebrate the birth-day of William Tell. A few days before, the Duc de Richelieu, the present minister of France, then visiting the beauties of Como, drove with the Austrian commandant to Chiasco; he was struck by the appearance of this tree, and asked what it meant. Some of the people replied, "It is the tree of liberty." The duke took off his hat, made it a bow, and said jocosely,—" Bon jour, mon ami, haurcment tu ne fleuris plus!"

'Holy Advertisement, at Como, in 1810—The artificial fireworks, which the public (the municipality,) of Como had prepared, to evince its joy on the occasion of the desired arrival of their royal and imperial majesties, in this royal city, offer, this year, the means of celebrating in a singular manner, the festival of Saint Abbondio, patron of the city and diocese of Como. To this effect will contribute the afore-mentioned fire-works, ceded by the municipal congregation to the pious, who propose, in concert with the authorities, to set fire (incendiate) to the grandiosa macchina, which represents a temple, on the evening of the thirty-first of August, the festival of our holy protector; and thus, in an extraordinary manner, aid to the usual pomp of the cathedral, where, with due veneration, the service will be solemnized by our lord the bishop. Under these fortunate circumstances, all the faithful may partake of the treasures of the Papal Benediction, of a plenary indulgence, and, at the same time, profit by the spectacle of the artificial fire-works.—Como, 14th of August, 1810. Printed by Carlantonio Ostinelli, Episcopal Printer.'

'Palace of Oliver Cromwell at Genna.—We were, one evening, visiting the elegant villa, and enjoying the view from the singular gardens of Signore Carlo di Negro, when a gentleman pointed out to us a yellow palace, built, he said, by Oliver Cromwell, of England! A fact so startling, so contrary to all historical probability, is thus cleared up and established. Sir Horajon Pallavicini was collector of the Pope's taxes in England, in the reign of Queen Mary. On the death of that bigot princess, and on the changes in the religion of the country, Pallavicini forgot to go back to Rome; remained in England; married a noble lady, and built a superb Italian palace on English ground, with the money intended to raise palaces for Papal nephews in Rome. In 1601, the lady Anne Pallavicini, his widow, married a Mr. Oliver Cromwell, who accompanied her to Genoa, to arrange the affairs of her late husband. There they continued to reside, and he is supposed to have built that yellow palace, which is still called the 'Palace of Oliver Cromwell.'

The church of St. Lorenzo, at Genoa, is celebrated for a most sacred relic, the 'Sagro Cutino,' a dish of one entire and perfect emerald, said to be that on which our Saviour ate his last supper. This dish had been carried away by the royal crusaders, when they took Cesarea in Palestine, in the twelfth century. It was once pledged for nine thousand five hundred livres, and when redeemed and replaced, was put under a particular guard, and only exposed once a year. Millions knelt before it; and the penalty on the bold but zealous hand that touched it with a diamond, was a thousand gold ducats. The French, on entering Italy, seized this relic, and, submitting it to the Institute of Paris, this emerald dish was discovered to be a piece of green glass!

While at Bologna, Lady Morgan was taken to hear a celebrated preacher, the Canonico , and his sermon, both for its manner and matter, was extremely curious:—

'Like all the Italian preachers, he had a conventional style and jesticulation; he commenced each phrase with a sort of whipping cant,—then suddenly dropping his declamatory tone, he adopted a familiar gossiping manner, the most humorous and effective that can be imagined, alternately twirling his cap, taking it off, or putting it on; or appealing to the crucifix, (which is always affixed to the sides of the pulpit in Italy.) His subject was charity. "Charity," he said, "is the love of your neighbour; I say," he continued, emphasizing the word, "in the homely expression and homely sense of the scriptures, meaning, literally, your neighbour, whom you should love through Christ, (the church,) and not in the vague sense of modern philosophy, which talks of humanity and philanthropy, and such jargon, (quasto d'ergeno, Christiani mei!) but this sort of charity, my dear Christians, means murder and spoliation, which is the true object of philosophy. Charity, my dear Christians, is a mantle made net only to cover your own sins, but the sins of your neighbour." Here he paused and shook a little tin-box, on which a friar went about collecting, and the preacher proceeded. "Charity is silent on a neighbour's frailties. It does not, like philosophy, attack vices to a class; for the charity of modern philosophy is to exclaim against holy mother church. With these philosophers, (i monachi sono furfanti, i preti barbari.) monks are rogues, and priests robbers." Here he fixed his eye on some young men, and at his familiar question of 'Cher pensati Christiani mei?' (What think ye, my Christians?) there was a general titter! Then putting on his cap, after a long pause, he opened another exordium, in the usual nasal whine, which he concluded by saying, "Charity, my Christians, bids you open your mant's wide, so—and close it upon the sinner, so"—here most gracefully he imitated the act with his own robe; "for the sum of charity is to give and to forgive." Here he again rattled his box, and his coadjutor again resumed his office, and again collected from the congregation. He preached as they all do in Italy—extempore; and, after a short pause, resumed his sermon, apparently at the entrance of fresh auditor—who seemed to change every twenty minutes, and to come in and go out as a thing of course.'

Here we leave her ladyship for the present, and we congratulate her admirers, either on her imperfect knowledge of Italian or her moderation in using it; for although she brings her French phrases pretty freely into action, yet she is tolerably sparing of Italian ones. Her ladyship still remembers the severe criticism of the Quarterly Review, and loses no opportunity of showing her resentment, though we confess, in every effort that we have yet seen, her attacks are very impotent.

(To be concluded in our next.)

Takings; or, the Life of a Collegian.
A Poem. Illustrated by Twenty-six Engravings, from Designs by R. Dagley, Author of 'Select Gems from the Antique,' &c. &c. Royal 8vo. pp. 184. London, 1821.

THE first title of this work, 'Takings,' appeared to us so unpromising, that had we not seen the name of Mr. Dagley, whose eminence as an artist, gives great value to every thing with which he is connected, we should scarcely have ventured on taking up the work, lest, among all other takings, we should have been taken in. A slight glance at a few of the etchings, and the perusal of half a dozen pages, soon convinced us how groundless had been our fears, and that the work is really one of great merit. It is a proof of the versatility of Mr. Dagley's talents, that he shines almost equally in the serious and the ludicrous in art, and there can scarcely be a stronger contrast than his drawings from the antique gems, and his caricatures in 'flim flams,' which, though his first effort in that line, was so completely successful, that a literary friend suggested the word 'Takings,' as furnishing a good subject for his comic pencil. The hint was taken, and the result appears in the present volume.

The poem was written to illustrate or introduce the pictures, and not to be illustrated by them, as stated in the title; and, therefore, considerable allowance might be made for a poet adapting his muse to the feelings of another, but, in the present case, no indulgence of that sort is necessary, the poem itself being a very clever production.

The poem is in six cantos, and is the history of Tom Takeall, a gay thoughtless Oxonian, tracing his progress in life, in taking leaps, advice, measures, notice, bets, amusements, courage, lessons, a-miss, aim, nothing, something, stitches, hints, time, pledges, little, likenesses, home, comfort, physic, flight, thought, pleasure, all, caudle. To follow the author through all these takings, each of which is the subject of an excellent description, would be an undertaking, on which we dare not venture; we shall, therefore, imitate our hero in one thing, that of 'taking leaps,' which we must do from one of the sketches to another. Tom, after taking leaps in hunting, is found, though very reluctantly, taking advice from his father: he, however, does not follow the advice, but—

'In pleasure's chase
Consumes his days, and each succeeding night;
And fix'd a fashionable name to get,
Gets fashionably very deep in debt.'

Tom avails himself largely of 'the dashing tailor's never-failing aid,' and when he presents his account, quiets him by another order, until at last he was—

'Content to give his bills;
This met the tailor's.—Each bill had a brother;
One good turn always must deserve another.'

This brings us to taking measures:
'In ancient times, law gave for eye an eye,
And tooth for tooth. This rule, from law-courts driven,
To Fashion's haunts has been compell'd to fly,
Where bill for bill is uniformly given.
The dealer's bill is given for double pay,
The purchaser gives him to run away.'

Snip took his measures—Snip his bill had got,
I mean Tom's bill, (twas over due some moons),
And now appear'd to measure for a coat
And inexpressibles—or pantaloons.

'I have you now,' said he,—'I've made a hit,
I know you're partial to a close good fit.'
So he departed, and another came,
'His man,' thought Tom. He was beyond dispute.

'Your name is Takeall, I presume.' 'The same.'

'I come to you about a little suit.'
Some parchment slips he shew'd, which made Tom stare,
For these seem'd broader than the others were.

With indignation he began to foam,
'I hate,' he cried, 'this round-about delay;
Your master measured; bring the things soon home,
I cannot tarry trifling here all day.'

'No, sir, you can't, sir,—that is very true.
Bring the things home! I come to bring home you.'

This was a bailiff, who arrests Tom; but, in going towards the prison, Tom leads him into a man trap, when, giving him 'leg bail,' he escapes. Tom becomes a gambler, figures at Newmarket, in taking bets, and at the Moulsey Hurst, taking amusement. We afterwards find him taking a-miss, that is, eloping with a young lady from a boarding school, whose brother challenges Tom, and they take aim at each other, but both, fortunately, miss; a second shot was demanded, when Tom was wounded, but recovers. He now runs a career of great misery, and goaded by want, contemplates turning highwayman, but is fortunately diverted from the terrible project by taking hints;—

'By conscience driven to rob, Tom hired a horse, Pass'd to the road, and now about to mount,
Tried to suppress misgivings and remorse,
When two bleac'd felons, sent to their account,
High on a gibbet rivetted attention!—
Made him take fearful hints from their suspension.'

Tom sets off to Margate, and commences portrait-painter and author. He sends a play to Drury Lane Theatre, and hastens to know whether or not it had been accepted:—

'And there he found it waiting, cut and dry.
As capricious scribblers grumble at delay,
The kind lessee, intent to gratify,
Printed the answer while Tom wrote the play.'

A good expedient this, because one call might easily be made to serve for all.

The insult which the great lessee offers to those who submit dramatic productions to him, by returning a printed answer, is happily burlesqued in the 'Drury Letter of Rejection,' as follows:—

'I am instructed to return you, sir,
The manuscript——' (a blank Tom stared to see,

Left by the printer for the manager),
'By you submitted to great Mr. E.
The reasons he your play thinks unworthy
You'll spare me the necessity of writing.'

'But they are founded, it should be expressed,
On strict impartiality, (which force Must give them), and attention too—the best.'

(The best in quality was meant, of course;
The manager could not intend to say,
He much in quantity had thrown away.)

'And Mr. E.—don't let it make you blush,
Is flatter'd by the preference you, who sent
A tragedy not worth a single rush,

Have thus evinced for his establishment.
Its interests still he hopes will be your care,
And further has the honour to declare,

'That all his doors, 'tis his determination,
Shall open wide to each aspiring bard—
To talents of all kinds in every station,

That Mr. E. can sanction or reward;
So do not for a moment be deluded,
To think that merit is with you excluded.'

Tom becomes embarrassed, and is arrested and thrown into the Fleet, where, in 'a wretched third-floor room immersed,' he 'abandoned hope and yielded to despair.' Sickness is added to his other miseries, and he is on the verge of a death by starvation, when his father visits him. Tom expresses his contrition, is released, and gets married,—his moral character, of course, re-established. Independent of the main story, which is written in a chaste and happy vein of satire, there are some charming episodes, both of a comic and serious character, one or two of which we shall quote. Among the designs which we have noticed, (and they are all worthy of a distinct notice, if our limits permitted it) there is one intitled Taking Pleasure. A cockney, with his wife on one arm, is dragging behind him a small shay, in which two children are seated; while a little boy, and a dog who carries his master's cane in his mouth, completes this family picture. Tom is on a visit to Mr. Wiggins, when he learns the 'day's disaster' of the pleasure taking couple:—

"Just then the knocker sounded an approach,
Some one appeared impatient to get shelter,
And while they heard retire a hackney-coach,
Entered a comely couple, better-seller.
"Here! here has been a pretty job of jobs!"
Cried Mrs. first, and after Mr. Hobbs.

"What! what's the matter?" every body cried,
The lady answered, "You must know, to-day

We thought of taking pleasure—so we hied
To Higbygate, with our pretty children's shay,
Which Mr. Hobbs bought Kinty for a fairing,
To give the little dears a little airing.

"And there we drewed 'em in such pleasant places,
They seemed at least a hundred miles from town—

When suddenly, full bang in all our faces,
Torrents of rain in deluged came down.
So Mr. Hobbs's coat and hat got soiled,
And my new saracen gown completely spoilt'd.

"My parasol, used for an umbrella,
Saved me but little 'ere beneath a tree;
And while we stood up, every saucy fellow
Seem'd quite delighted our distress to see.
So we was forc'd to leave behind our shay,
And in the Higbygate stage to come away."

"Yes," said the husband, "and poor Pompey's gone;

You know how well he carried.—I to jail
Could need the rogue, who, when the storm came on,

Tied a tin kettle to his faithful tail;
He dropped, and I have lost through this vile trick
My bamboo cane, my Sunday walking-stick.

"Twill warn me how I pleasure take again;
Spotted hat and coat, and half-destroyed my wig."

"But," cried the wife, "we nearly had this pain
Had saved, if you, like others, kept your gig.
Before we go about another day,
I vow as how I'll have a vone-home shay."

We will conclude our extracts with a song, which will show that the author's poetical talents are not confined to the satirical or the ludicrous:—

How thrills the youth with wild delight,
When Celia, in the silent grove,
Permits him, throur'd by the night,
To breathe his ardent vows of love:—

Where prudence, forced to stand aloof,
Strives feebly nature's throb to quell,
And the soft-whispered fond reproof
Invites the kiss it would repel.

Oh! that precarious joy is dear,
Whose throb each passing moment breaks,
And blissful those alarms—that fear,
Which every rustling leaf awakes;

There the swain's bosom, passion-fired—
The hopes that swell the fair one's zone—
Make, from the haunts of men retired,
A world of rapture all their own.

Give me, give me such scenes to prove;
Give me a maid whose generous breast,
And "increase-breathing" lip of love,
May full each anxious care to rest!
Thus blest through life, my glistening eye
Shall speak my bosom's grateful glow,
'Till death transports above the sky,
The Hour of my heaven below."

Mr. Dagley, after a brief and well-written advertisement, has given some very judicious observations on the ludicrous in art. This work, whether considered as to the excellence of the designs or the merits of the poem, deserves a large share of the public patronage, and we venture to say that it will obtain it.

Travels in Georgia, Persia, Armenia, Ancient Babylon, &c. &c. By Sir Robert Ker Porter.

AT ERIVAN, Sir Robert Porter waited on the Persian sardar or governor, who received him courteously, and furnished him with a mehemandar, or provider, to accompany him to Tabreez. The women in this part of the country have not the smallest degree of prettiness; those who had passed the immediate blush of youth, were become mere hags; this premature destruction of youth in the higher ranks, is attributed to the excessive use of the bath, and habitual want of exercise; and in the lower classes, to a similar misuse of hot water and vapour, with the addition of noisome clothing and close unwholesome lodgings. Tabreez, the principal residence of the heir apparent of the Prussian crown, Abbas Mirza, has been recently fortified, and surrounded with a thick wall, protected by towers and bastions, with the addition of a very deep dry ditch:—

Out of two hundred and fifty mosques mentioned by Chardin, the ruins of only three are visible. The most considerable is that of Ali Shah, erected nearly six hundred years ago, by Ali Koja; and which still presents lofty arches, and the mouldering vaulted work of splendid domes. The whole of the building, within and without, has been cased with lackered tiles of porcelain, adjusted into intricate and elaborate figures, with an ingenuity and taste that would honour the most accomplished artists of any age. The colours of these decorations are green, dark and light blue, interspersed with Arabic sentences in letters of gold; and a broad band of such legends, formed in white, upon this beautifully varied ground, and interwoven with flowers in green and gold, winds round the entire extent of the building. This fine ruin is within the new fortifications of the city, as are also the remains of the arch or citadel. In former times, it is said to have contained the royal palace, with its attendant mosque. Very legible traces of these different structures are yet to be found within its lofty though riven walls. The height of those walls may be about eighty feet, commanding an extensive view on every side, over the lately erected works, and making a conspicuous object to a great distance from the town. The materials of the whole structure are of brick, and put together with the nicest care. Indeed, that so much of it exists, after the general overthrow by two earthquakes, proves the excellence of its workmanship. Part of it is now used as an arsenal; and also to a very dismal purpose. A few years ago, a woman was precipitated from the top of the highest point of its wall, into the ditch beneath, as a punishment for the murder of her husband; a crime till then almost unheard of in the annals of Persian domestic life.

Abbas Mirza is doing all in his power to restore Tabreez to its former military importance; a palace building for his own residence, but he does not aim so much at adorning the city as at strengthening it. While at Tabreez, Sir Robert had an opportunity of observing the manners of a great state dinner, to which he was invited by Mirza Bezork, the Kyme Makaum, or prime minister of the prince. Our traveller and his countrymen assembled at the house of the 'Kyme Makaum, a little before sun-set, and took their stations on the nummuds appointed for their accommodation, in the true eastern style of sitting on the heels or cross-legged, which ever way their plastic limbs could easiest conform to the attitudes of the more plastic Asiatics:—

"A few minutes elapsed," says Sir Robert, "before our host made his appearance. On his entrance we all rose; and, on being re-seated, he bowed to each person according to his rank, uttering at the same time a compliment befitting the esteemed importance of the guest. The routine of the entertainment was then as follows:—"kalions were presented; then coffee, served in very small cups, and without cream or sugar. Kalions succeeded; then tea, in large cups; and this, over conversation, filled an interval of ten minutes, when the minister gave a signal for dinner to be brought. Several vants immediately entered, bearing a long narrow roll of flowered cotton in their arms, which they laid down and spread before the whole company, who now occupied both sides of the room. This drapery was placed close to our knees. The next service was to set a piece of the thin sort of bread or cake before each guest, to be used as a plate and napkin.

Then came a tray between every two persons, containing the following articles of food: two bowls of sherbet, each provided with a wooden spoon of delicate and elegant workmanship; a couple of dishes of pillaw, composed of rice soaked in oil or butter, boiled fowls, raisins, and a little saffron. Two plates, with melons sliced; two others, containing a dozen kabbobs, or morsels of dry boiled meat; and a dish presenting a fowl roasted to a cinder. The whole party along the extended web being in like manner supplied, the host gave the sign for falling to; a command that seemed to be understood literally, for every back, became bent, every face was brought close to the point of attack, and every jaw, in an instant, was in motion. This is done by a marvellous dexterity in gathering up the rice, or victuals of any kind, with the right hand, and almost at the same moment thrusting it into the mouth. The left hand is never used by the Persians but in the humblest offices; however, during meals at least, the honoured member certainly does the business of two, for no cessation could be observed in the active passage of meat, melon, sherbet, &c. from the board to the mouths of the grave and distinguished assembly. I must say, I never saw a more silent repast in my whole life, nor one where the sounds of inattention were so audible. In some countries it may be "merry in the hall, when heads wag all;" but here I could only think of a similar range of respectable quadrupeds, with their heads not farther from their troughs than ours were from the trays. For my part, whenever I wished to avail myself of the heaps of good provender on mine, [the tray] at every attempt to throw a little rice into my mouth, it disappeared up my sleeve; so that after several unsuccessful essays, I gave up the enjoyment of this most savory dish of the feast, and contented myself with a dry kabbob or two.

When the servants cleared away, it was in the order that the things had been put down. A silver-plated jug, with a long spout, accompanied by a basin of the same metal, was carried round to every guest, by an attendant, who poured water from the jug on our right hands, which we held in succession over the basin, while each individual cleansed his beard or mustachios from the remnants of dinner. We had no towel to dry one or the other, save our own pocket-handkerchiefs; the bread-napkin or plate, having no capability but to be eaten off, and to wipe the ends of the fingers between every new plunge into the opposite dish. A kalfoun, with tea, followed; and continued, with a few interruptions, during the conversation which had broken the dead silence on the departure of the rolled-up web and its appendages. A fresh kalfoun finished the entertainment, and we then rose to take our leave.

The education of Persian princes, which was formerly left to women and eunuchs, has been entirely changed, and they have now every requisite instructors. Notwithstanding the severity of the weather at Tebrez, few of the Persians of either sex put on additional clothing, and many of them, young and old, go with the breast entirely bare. This strange neglect of the common means of protection, accounts, in some measure, for the frequent recurrence of the most melancholy catastrophes; and scarcely a day passes without one or two persons being found frozen to death, in the neighbourhood of the town. Our author relates one very painful calamity of this kind:—

'The gates of all towns and cities in Persia, are shut a little after sun-set, and re-opened at sun-rise. Strict adherence to this injunction, and carelessness or unavoidable delays on the part of travellers, often subject them to the inconvenience of reaching the gates when they are closed. Hence they must stay without till morning. And, during the inclement season, at opening the gates, very often a terrible scene of death unfolds itself, close to the threshold; old and young, animals and children, lying one lifeless heap. But the particular instance I would now recount, relates to a solitary traveller, who had performed a long journey on his own horse; a member of their families, to which these people are eminently attached. When he arrived at Tebrez, the ingress was already barred. The night was one of the severest which had been known; and the poor man, to save himself from the fatal effects he too surely anticipated, pierced his faithful horse with his dagger, and ripping up its body, thrust himself into it; in the vain hope of the warmth which might remain, preserving his own vital heat until the morning. But, in the morning, when the gates were opened, he was found frozen to death in this horrible shroud.'

During the stay of our traveller at Tebrez, Abbas Mirza arrived, and, after receiving him 'as an old friend,' he took him in his own suite to Tebran, where he was repairing to assist at the celebration of the feast of the Now-roose. The cavalcade consisted of nearly a thousand persons, and among the honours paid to the prince, was one of very singular ceremony:—

'A concourse of people appeared, coming towards us, and leading forward a cow, which they brought near to the prince, and instantly immolated at the feet of his horse. A signal from Abbas Mirza, to prevent so disagreeable a compliment, was not observed in the hurry of the scene; and the poor animal's blood flowed all over the path we must pass. Besides this, another act of respect is performed, by breaking a vessel containing sugar or honey, in the way of the prince; after that, the cavalcade moves on.

The town of Mianna, and its immediately adjacent villages, are infested with a plague they have found it impossible to eradicate, in the form of a small but poisonous bug:—

'It breeds in myriads in all the old houses, and may be seen creeping over every part of their walls, of the size and shape of the bugs in Europe, only a little flatter, and in colour of a bright red. Its bite is mortal, producing death at the expiration of eight or nine months. Strangers of every sort, not merely foreigners, but persons not usually inhabiting the town or its vicinity, are liable to be thus poisoned; while the people themselves or the adjacent peasantry are either never bitten, or if so, the consequences are not more baneful than the sting of the least noxious insect.

The neighbourhood of Irak Ajem, was the scene of the dreadful and mysterious murder committed on Mr. Browne in 1813. This enterprising traveller, who had perfected himself in the Turkish language, assumed the Turkish dress, and, thus equipped, set forward with an intent to penetrate through Khorasan. During the early part of his Persian journey, he had a conference with Sir Gore Ouseley, and was admitted to an audience of the Persian King:—

'So little was danger from attacks of any kind apprehended, by the persons best acquainted with the state of the country; that no difficulties whatever were suggested as likely to meet him, and accordingly he proceeded in full confidence. Having reached this pass of Irak, he stopped at the Caravansary to take a little refreshment. That over, he remounted his horse; and, leaving his servant to pack up the articles he had been using, and then follow him, he rode gently forward along the mountains. Mr. Browne had scarcely proceeded half a mile, when suddenly two men on foot came up behind him; one of whom, with a blow from a club, before he was aware, struck him senseless from his horse. Several other villains, at the same instant, sprang from hollows in the hills, and bound him hand and foot. At this moment they offered him no further personal violence; but as soon as he had recovered from the stupor, occasioned by the first mode of attack, he looked round and saw the robbers plundering both his baggage and his servant, the man having come forward on the mad in obedience to the commands of his master. When the depredators found their victim restored to observation, they told him, it was their intention to put an end to his life, but that was not the place where the final stroke should be made. Mr. Browne, incapable of resistance, calmly listened to his own sentence, but intreated them to spare his poor servant, and allow him to depart with his papers, which could be of no use to them. All this they granted; and what may appear still more extraordinary, these ferocious brigands, to whom the acquisition of arms must be as the staff of life, made the man a present of his master's pistols and double-barrelled gun; but they were English, and the marks might have betrayed the new possessors. These singular robbers then permitted Mr. Browne to see his servant safe out of sight, before they laid further hands on himself; after which they carried him, and the property they had reserved for themselves, into a valley on the opposite side of the Kizilouzan, and, without delay, terminated his existence. It is supposed, by strangulation. They stripped his corpse of every part of his raiment, and then left it on the open ground, a prey to wolves and other wild animals. The servant, meanwhile, made the best of his way towards Tabreez, where he related the tale I have just told.

This barbarous murder is supposed by Sir Robert Ker Porter, to have been committed by some roving and desperate band of Kurds; but, notwithstanding every exertion was made by Abbas Mirza to discover the perpetrators of this nefarious deed, the individuals still remain unknown.

An Autumn near the Rhine: or, Sketches of Courts, Society, and Scenery in Germany. With a Tour in the Taurus Mountains, in 1820. Second Edition. To which are now added, Translations from Schiller, Goethe, and other German Poets. 8vo. pp. 602. London, 1821.

ALTHOUGH the continual and abundant supply of new works, renders it unnecessary for us to resort to second editions for subjects for review, yet we think the circumstances under which the volume before us has appeared, would justify us in noticing it, were it not one of the most pleasing volumes of the class to which it belongs. Since the first edition of this work was published, the author says in his Preface, 'a second visit to some of the scenes described—a considerable intercourse with individuals intimately conversant with Germany,—its society,—its language,—and its manners, and the lapse of above two years, at a period of life when most men live, to unlearn some errors, have given him the opportunity of considerably altering and of making some material additions to his work.' The alterations introduced, are, in general, either corrected inaccuracies, or substituted matter, which appeared to the author of greater interest than that which before occupied its place.

It can scarcely be necessary to say much on the merits of a work which English critics have most universally praised, which has been translated both in Germany and in France, and which was thought of sufficient consequence to obtain the especial abuse of the pensioned correspondent of the Emperor of Russia, Kotzebue, who, in his Literary Journal, published at Weimar, severely attacked the author. The work is in the form of letters, and while it has all the ease and familiarity of epistolary correspondence, never relaxing into idle details or commonplace remarks, it forms a clear and succinct narrative of the author's route, with animated descriptions of the scenes which he witnessed; these descriptions are interspersed with acute reflections, and numerous interesting anecdotes of distinguished persons, forming, altogether, an admirable picture of the state of society in Germany, its local scenery, and the peculiar manners and customs of the people. The affectation of commencing each letter with some quotation, is a very useless imitation of modern novel writers, which we should have wished our author to have avoided; it is even worse at the commencement of a letter than at the beginning of a chapter, and should his work reach a third edition, we would suggest this as one of its curtailments.

The author commences with an account of Mayence, which has suffered severely since the commencement of the French revolution. Dr. Moore, when he visited this city thirty years ago, remarked the elegant abbés with their handsome equipages, and the well-behaved troops, who appeared to be kept under by the ecclesiastics; but things are now altered: 'you see the men in the garb of the plundered stalls skulking to mass in threadbare soutanes, their looks proclaiming them no longer the monopolizers of the old hock of the neighbourhood; while the Austrian and Prussian soldiers, to the amount of fourteen thousand, are parading about in the insolence of military superiority.' The inhabitants are quite disheartened: the French, they say, knew how to spend their money, but the Austrians are brutes, who buy nothing but beer and tobacco, and the Prussians so proud, that there is no speaking to them without the chance of being knocked down. The Austrians and Prussians detest each other, and are continually disturbing the city with their broils:—

'Prussian conceit and vivacity sometimes treat the heavy gormandizing Austrian rather unceremoniously. A Prussian officer, drinking with some Austrians, joined in toasting military exploits with some cordiality, when an Austrian, by way of compliment, proposed to drink to the battle of Waterloo, a favourite theme of Prussian pride—calling to the waiter to bring a bottle of Champagne and six glasses. The Prussian taking fire at the paltry honour intended for his achievements, bawled out with an expression of contempt, "bring me six bottles of Champagne and one glass."

Mayence abounds in historical associations, but it has few vestiges of antiquity.—It was the birth-place of the art of printing; the site of Gutenberg's house is now occupied by the Casino and the Cabinet de Lecture, and his printing-office is possessed by a learned professor; but the house of Faust is degraded into a low inn. We now accompany our author to Darmstadt, of the court of which he gives a very lively account:—

'The metropolis of a minor sovereign of Germany, presents a curious union of splendour and insignificance, a sort of miniature elegance and microscopic grandeur, which is perfectly novel to a foreigner. There is nothing in England that resembles it. Our cities are more antique, interesting, and gloomy—our little towns more mean and plebeian—a neat watering-place, with its regular white buildings, its absence of the bustle of trade, and its air of quiet gentility, will, perhaps, best bear a comparison. The resemblance may be pushed to the inhabitants, in one single particular—a sort of strained elegance and economical refinement in the manner of life, which bespeaks persons of better family than fortune.'

'Hospitality is a praise eminently due to a German court; and this is no contemptible one, considering that it is costly, and that their revenues are by no means enormous. The court entertainments at Darmstadt are principally dinners, to which invitations are issued with obliging liberality to the nobility and such strangers as have the honour of presentation. The fourrier of the court visits you in the morning with the hospitable invitation of the prince, which, of course, it is not seemly to decline. Sunday is a grand day, when the table is more than ordinarily crowded and splendid. The guests assemble in full dress at the old fashioned hour of two o'clock, in the large and handsome saloons of the palace. The grand duchess enters with her ladies of honour and chamberlains, and, after half an hour occupied by her progress round the circle, gracefully addressing appropriate conversation to each individual, the exchange of affectionate kisses of greeting between the members of the reigning family, and of civil speeches between the company, the party proceed, arm in arm, with ceremonious regularity to the spacious dinner saloon. Here they take their seats in the order of the procession, the grand duchess and court occupying the centre of the table. The table is splendidly covered with gold and silver plate, ypetras, plateaux and flowers. The system of a German dinner, which is national, because the same at the table of a prince and at the table d'hôte of an inn—bating the additional plate and delicacies of the former—would have precisely hit the taste of a Justice Greedy, as being admirably contrived for the undisturbed dispatch of the business of a meal. On sitting down, you find the board amply covered with dishes—there, merely to afford the eye a preliminary feast. In an instant the servants transport them to the side-board, from whence they are offered, one after another, in prescribed routine, ready carved to the company. In this way the knife and fork are kept in constant occupation, without the awkward interruptions of attention to others, by a succession of from fifteen to five-and-twenty dishes; beginning with invariable soup and bouilli, continued by ragouts, made dishes, and extremis of various kinds, of course including sausages and spiced kout, summed up with substantial roast meat. Every lady and gentleman have their decanter of light Rhenish or Burgundy before them, which they drink without ceremony; and the more precious wines are handed round in the course of dinner. An attractive neighbour is thus the only possible diversion from the business in hand, which can happen at a German table. The Germans, in fact, dine as might be expected of people who do not breakfast—a meal much out of use with them, and rarely extending beyond a light milk roll and a cup of coffee.

I confess I approve the ease and sociability of this system. Conversation flows on without interruption, and the guests enjoy all the indolent luxury of a banquet. The desert forms the conclusion of the dinner—and is not, as with us, a systematic recommencement. It is soon dispatched, and the whole company rise—for the gentlemen have neither radicals nor parliamentary debates to discuss; and they prefer coffee, liqueurs, and the society of their ladies, to toasting them in bumpers in their absence. The Germans, though not invariably sober, and though often fond of society, do not appear fully to understand those social pleasures of the table, which, when enjoyed in moderation, must be admitted to be no contemptible attraction of English society. I believe the true relish for these “noties conque Deum” is peculiar to ourselves.

Our author speaks in high terms, and we believe very justly, of the Grand Duke and Duchess of Hesse, and relates an interesting anecdote of the sister of the Grand Duke, Louisa, Grand Duchess of Saxe-Weimar, the friend and patron of Schiller, Wieland, Goëthe, and Herder. It was owing to her undaunted persuasions, that her husband was prevented from allying himself with Bonaparte. After the battle of Jena, which decided the fate of the north of Germany, when the grand duke was still absent from the army, the duchess remained in Weimar:—

‘On the approach of the French, headed by Napoleon, the poor deserted women, children, and inhabitants of the town all flocked to the castle for safety. The gates were opened to them, and the grand duchess sheltered and protected them with the kindness of a mother. On Napoleon’s entry, he summoned her royal highness to abandon the castle and attend him. She refused; and an order for the pillage of the palace and town was instantly issued. The duchess remained firm; determined, if possible, to avert this fate from her little capital. Her efforts were crowned with success, and her dignified firmness even at last induced the Emperor to wait on her in person. The interview between Napoleon and the grand duchess might have afforded a subject not unworthy of the historical painter. Her noble deportment and energetic reasonings, wrought upon the conqueror, and induced him to withdraw his cruel order:—

“Oppressors big with pride, when she appear’d, Blush’d, and believed their greatness counterfeit.”

The grand duchess underwent the severest hardships for the accomplishment of her admirable purpose; remaining shut up in the castle with her helpless subjects for several days, almost without the bare necessities of life. A triumph like this, of the energy of female character, over animosity, pride, and military violence, is one of those rare examples which occasionally occur to tinge history with a tone of romance.

Goëthe, idolized as he is in Germany as a poet, is by no means personally the object of the universal love inspired by Schiller, who is spoken of with a fondness and respect as much called forth by his character as his genius. Our author has here introduced a translation, which he has made of one of Schiller’s most pathetic and beautiful poems, Cassandra, which has been cited by Madame de Staël with great admiration. The spirit of the original is so happily conveyed into the translation, that we shall make no apology to our readers for quoting it:—

‘CASSANDRA.

Ilion’s sons with joy are bounding,
Hymn’s hall with festing rings;
Throns of jubilee are sounding
From the lyre’s entrancing strings.
Stopp’d the war-ensanguin’d tide is,
Peace her gleams induce sheals;
For the godlike brave, Peleides,
Priam’s beauteous daughter weh.

And with laurel garlands gleaming,
Proudly throng the festive train,
Tow’rds the hallow’d temples streaming,
Tow’rds the sacred Thymbrion fane—
Lo! through the city seeling,
Bacchanian pleasure pour;
While apart her wees concealing,
One forsaken breast deplores.

Joyless ’midst the glow of gladness,
Uncompanion’d and dismay’d,
Walks Cassandra forth in sadness,
To Apollo’s laurel’d shade;
There the priestess, melancholy,
Seeks the deepest darkling wood,
Flinging all her chaplets holy
On the earth in anguish’d mood.

“Life with bliss is overflowing,
Every other heart is blest,
Parents’ souls with hope glowing,
Brighten my sister’s bridal vest—
I alone must lone some anguish,
Me the dear illusion flies,
O’er these walls, I see with anguish,
Hovering destruction rise.

“In my sight a torch is gleaming,—
Not, alas! in Hymen’s hand,—
To the delectable lustre streaming,
Not like holy altar band;
Feast and pomp I see preparing,
But with and foreboding eye,—
Soon he comes, the god unsparing
Comes to rend them ruthlessly.

And they chide my wild upbraiding,
And they mock my bitter smart,—
Where the wilderness is shading,
Must I drag my lab’ring heart;
By each happy soul forsaken,
And a sport for all the gay—
Cruel vengeance hast thou taken,
Unrelenting God of day!

“Pythian! why with dire unkindness,
Bid me here thy fates unveil,
’Midst these walls of mortal blindness,
With a heaven-illum’d soul?
Ah! why grant the gift of seeing Woes I still in vain defy?
From the destin’d there’s no fleeing—
Still the dreaded doom draws nigh.

“Boots it from impending terror,
Rash the flatter’ing veil to raise;
Life is our’s alone in error—
Death the price that knowledge pays;
Take, oh take the tort’ring visions!
Blood-stained future form we see!
Horrid lot of thy decisions,
Pow’rless instrument to be!
“Give my blindness back—the treasure
Of my happy darkling slate;
Never knew I joyous measure,
Since I sang the notes of fate;
Future thou hast all unshrouded,
But thou blight’st the present day.”

'All life's joyous hours are clouded—
Take the treach'rous gift away.

'Ne'er with bridle chaplets braiding,
Deck'd I giv my fragrant hair,
Since before thy altar hailing,

'Tis sad rites have been my care:
Youth has still in weeping wasted,
Grief her chain has on me laid,
Every woe my race that blasted,
On my heart hath truly pre'd.

'See my youth's companions smiling,—
All around me lives and loves,—
Youthful joy each breast beguiling;
Mine alone in sorrow moves!
Spring for me in vain disposes
O'er the glittering earth her store;
Where's the joy that life discloses,
When on fate's abyss we pore?

'Love's divine illusion blestes
Polyxena's blooming charms—
Soon with bridal joy she presses
Græcia's Hero in her arms;
Proud with joy her bosom's glowing,
Soon her heart's delight to prove;
Not for bliss of Heaven's bestowing
Would she yield her dream of love.

'I too on the heart's desired
Oh with sweet delight could gaze;
I have seen his looks inspired,
Plead with passion's lambent rays.
Happy with love the dæmon tried
Had I dwelt a blissful bride—
But a Stygian specter loathed
Nightly tore him from my side.

'Proserpine has fast possess'd me,
With her lurid spectre crew;
Where I wander, where I rest me,
There the lurking fiend pursue:
Midst gay youth's inspiring dances,
Throng the shuddering monster train;
In each eye the fury glances—
Peace I ne'er shall know again.

'Lo! the murderous steel is gleaming!
Glares the bloodshot midn'rous eye—
Right and left around me teeming,
Threat'ning forms of horror fly—
Pow'less still the gulf to cover,
Knowing, seeing, bound I stand,
Doom'd, when Fate's dispute is over,
Sad to fall in foreign land."

'Still resound her plains immortal—
Hark! distempered miztrun run
Rushing from the Temple's portal
Dead lies Thetis valiant son!
Eris all her snakes is shaking!
Fly th' immortal one by one—
Aloft the thunder-clouds are breaking Loth o'er fated Iliou.

The English language is more cultivated and admired in Germany than any where else on the Continent. The German is the only language in Europe that can boast a complete translation of Shakespeare, which has been tolerably executed, by Voss and his sons. English literature is, indeed, as much in request as the productions of English manufacture; and 'it is as common to find ladies studying the works of Pope, Gray, Byron, or Scott, as it is to hear them inquiring in the shops for English needles or English pelisses.' They have a great dislike of French poetry, which is even less read in Germany than in England. In an account of Homburg, which is happily called 'a less than duodecimo territory,' after noticing the marriage of the Landgrave with our Princess Elizabeth, we have a curious anecdote of its having once been a fief of England:—

'As far back as the year 1294, Homburg became, by a singular bargain, a fief of our Edward I. The Emperor Adolphus (of Nassau) was involved in a dispute with Philip of France, with whom our Edward being also disposed to quarrel, entered into a close alliance with the Emperor, and engaged him to declare war against Philip. The chief agent between the two sovereigns, and the great promoter of the alliance, was Adolphus's favourite, Eberhard Count of Katzenellenbogen (anglic'd Cat's Elbow) and Lord of Homburg. The King of England, in his anxiety to secure this ambassador to his interest, persuaded him to become his vassal, seconding his proposal by 500l. of good English gold, which it appears possessed not less attraction to little princes in those days than in these. The count could not resist the offer, and actually took the oath of allegiance, before an English ambassador, to the English King, for the castle and town of Homburg.'

The fair, at Frankfort, furnishes an interesting extract:—

'The Michaelmas fair, during which I was in Frankfort, commences early in September; and its bustle and vivacity last throughout the month. The most considerable wholesale dealings are, however, transacted within the first week, when numbers of the merchants flock to the fair at Leipsic. The Exchange, a small neat quadrangle, surrounded by a range of warehouses and shops, called the Braunfels, is thronged during the fair with a respectable cluster of merchants of all nations; perhaps a twentieth part of the number who assemble daily on our exchange. High change is about twelve o'clock, from which the merchants return home to dinner; they generally commence business at six or seven in the morning, and toil till ten or eleven at night; not having, as yet, attained to that methodical colerity, which, in London, dispatches a hundred times the amount of affairs between the commodious hours of nine and six. The large rooms in the Braunfels are fitted up as show-rooms and shops, in humble imitation of the Palais Royal, and loaded with merchandizes, showy and useful, from all quarters of Germany, Switzerland, Hungary, Poland, and Bohemia. "Thomson's fine cotton goods from Manchester"—"Picard, Marchand de Modes de Paris"—"Zwinger, Uhrmacher aus der Schweiz;" and other such announcements of the trades and domiciles of the traders, attract notice in glittering capitals. The fairs, which had naturally declined during the obstructions of war, are gradually resuming their former alacrity. Frankfort has, during the fair, the animated aspect of a bustling trading city. The inns, the theatre, the casino, are thronged and lively; the drives round the suburbs crowded with gay equipages; the tables d' hôte with a motley assemblage of persons of all ranks and nations—the flowing costume of the Turk, and the venerable bearded Jew, often meet the eye.

'During the fair, in company with the Countess —, a Polish lady, we agreed by way of amusement to dine at the table d' hôte of the hotel. A large party was assembled, in which French, Dutch, Poles, Germans, Russians, and English might be reckoned. The long table was covered with a handsome repast—a band of wandering French musicians in green jackets and scarlet gowns, presently entered and struck up an old French minstrel air, which one of the females accompanied with an animating treble voice. They were presently succeeded by a German band, who played some fine inspiring waltzes. The whole scene was lively and exhilarating.'

Frankfort will soon be distinguished for the fine arts; a rich banker, M. Stüdel, has lately bequeathed a sum of above 100,000l. sterling, for the foundation of an academy, together with a respectable collection, containing some morsels of the Flemish school, of considerable merit. In our review of Mr. Dibdin's last work, we noticed that gentleman's praise of Danekker, the sculptor; the author of the present volume speaks in equally strong terms of his talents, and particularly of a marble statue of his:—

'It is an Ariadne seated on a tiger—in an attitude of great difficulty of execution, but easy and graceful in the highest degree. She is reclining on one side—her right elbow supported on the animal's shoulder, her head turned with a pensive grace—one drooping hand holds a slight drapery, while the other lightly supports her right foot. The attitude is so involved, that nothing but the most consummate art could have reconciled it with nature. It is one of the happiest conceptions of grace, which a favoured moment of inspiration ever suggested to the imagination of an artist. The figure is the perfection of soft feminine beauty—with none of the unreal pomp of a goddess—reclining in the voluptuous graces, and the flowing loveliness of a simple but noble form. The marble seems, from the exquisite truth of execution, to be imbued with the warmth of life, and the contour of the figure have all the melting roundness and softness which charm us in the females of Titian. The tiger is a majestic animal, not unworthy of the lovely burthen he bears. The statue stands on a pedestal turning on a pivot, for the convenience of viewing it in various lights.

A rose-coloured window is also contrived, the light through which, when raised, is intended to shed on the marble the warm hue of flesh; but the effect is rather that of salmon-colour, and the natural light is far preferable. Danekker had this admirable work fifteen years in hand. He composed it for M. Bethmann, and received one thousand guineas for his inimitable labours. M. B. has, I understand, since been offered for it nearly three times the sum. The artist is now employed for him on another work as a pendant to it.

In a subsequent part of the volume, our author gives the following interesting account of this distinguished artist. He says,—

'I regretted that circumstances deprived me of the pleasure of seeing Danekker, the distinguished artist whose works I have before mentioned. He is a native of Stutgard, born of humble parents, and owed the means of cultivating his genius to the patronage of the Duke Charles, predecessor of the late King. The early bent of his mind, which first led him to a fondness for drawing, and made him once spoil some smooth hewn stones by scratching flowers and figures on them with a nail, afterwards appears to have become too powerful to be checked by the opposition of his parents. When the duke offered to admit one of their children into the public seminary at Stutgard, his parents refused, from a false idea that the students were only designed to recruit the ranks of the army. The boy intreated in vain permission to accept the offer; and his importunities were at last only to be silenced by a confinement in his chamber. This gave him leisure to brood over his favourite objects, and to devise a scheme for accomplishing them. He contrived to communicate from his window with eight or nine of his comrades, whom he persuaded to stand by his cause, and to accompany him boldly to the duke himself, at Ludwigsburg, to entreat an admission into the academy. The boys announced themselves, were admitted, and kindly received by the duke, who was delighted with the resolution and boldness of the young would-be academicians of thirteen. He was immediately placed in the seminary, where he found the means of a liberal education, which afforded him a fund of acquisitions useful in his profession. He studied here nine years, then made pedestrian tours to Paris and to Rome, profiting, almost disabled, by the opportunities they afforded him. In Italy he received kindnesses from Canova and Trippi; and was recalled by his prince in 1790, to his great grief, from the bright skies and noble relics of Rome, to the foggy atmosphere and cramped occupations of Stutgard. By the way of recompense, he was made court sculptor and professor at the academy, with a salary of eight hundred florins, now considerably increased, for which he is under conditions to execute all the orders of the court. Danekker's history adds one to the many instances of that early development and decisive bent towards one particular career, which have so often distinguished genius of the first order.'

Vicissitude: a Poem in Four Books. Nottingham Park, and other Pieces. By Robert Millhouse, Corporal of the Staff of the Royal Sherwood Foresters. 12mo. pp. 109. London, 1821.

THERE is something so very praiseworthy and commendable in a private soldier seeking to beguile the fatigues and hardships of a military life, by 'gentle poetry,' that we are sorry we cannot give the offering of such an attempt our unqualified approbation. We feel still more reluctant to speak slightly of the production, when we are told that the author has 'no other chance of bettering his condition than by a publication.' The poems, however, when resting on their own merits, have a slight claim to praise; but, when the circumstances under which they have been written are considered, they must be judged of with indulgence, especially as they appear the genuine flowings of a most amiable disposition. From the principal poem, on 'Vicissitude,' we quote one passage, which is a fair specimen of the author's talents at versification:—

'Detested War! thy desolating strife
Sprinkles with blood the gloomy walks of life;
'Tis thy delight to hear the orphan cry,
And to behold the widow's weeping sigh;
To see the father and the husband bleed,
And lose with pleasure on each murder's deed;

Famine and Sickness are to thee allied,
And Guilt and Outrage riot at thy side;
Grim Devastation moves at thy command,
And turns a paradise to heaps of sand!

Ye sons of Adam! when shall Reason's ray
Prompt you to drive the demon War away,
And cultivate the sacred arts of Peace,
That smile to see the human race increase?
O say, does mother earth, (too scant of room)
Compel to chase our neighbours to the tomb?
Millions of acres yet unused I remain,
In forest-wilds, on common, heath, and plain;
Where undisturb'd the timid wild fowl lies,
And the sweet flow'ret flourishes and dies;
Or is it that the high-born sons of pride
Hate to behold an equal by their side?

Vicissitude can bring their greatness down,
Ari mould to dust the sceptre and the crown,
O'er humble life a royal robe can fling,
And lead the shepherd to become a king.'

We are happy to see that the author has a respectable list of subscribers to his little work,—a tribute, we doubt not, well merited by his private worth and unassuming manners.

ANCIENT & MODERN WRITERS.

As digested by W. B. L.
(FOR THE LITERARY CHRONICLE.)

IN contrasting the present with the past age, the most uncultivated eye must be struck with the mighty alterations which a few rapid years have effected; and whether it direct its search to the common doings of men, or upon the more subtle ramifications of the human intellect, it will readily discover the wide dissimilitude which exists in the comparative estimation. If it were our purpose to enter into dusty discussions, we could, we are persuaded, raise such clouds of impenetrable argument, as effectually to suffocate all scepticism; but having this morning, (unwittingly,) encountered our woman domestic, whilst in the actual discharge of her professional duties, and our memory being somewhat retentive as to the chokative effects of her nebulous vocation, we in tender consideration forbear. We were, however, entrapped into the above grave proposition by a hasty contemplation of the change which has been wrought by no great interval of years on the manners and the taste of the literary world.

In the 'elder time,' writing was a matter of much moment. An author was a being whose peculiar attributes were but indistinctly conjectured. His ways were not of this world,—there was a certain elementary ambiguity about him, that defied the analysis of vulgar faculties; he was an immeasurable remove from his fellow mortals, and yet not absolutely seraphic. His essentials were incomprehensible, and every thing incomprehensible commands our veneration,—he was of a race to whose influence the world bowed submissively; there was a splendour and a glory round about him, which rebuked all scrutiny and men, as from the sun, received the emanating light without questioning its source. To arrive at this so exalted a distinction, was not the work of days nor months; it was the labour of a life. It was not the mere opening of a paragraph,—the squaring of a sentence,—nor the polishing a period, that enabled a man to take his seat among the gods; such a thing was, contrary to the 'standing orders,' and altogether unsufferable, however less tenacious the House of Commons might be on such a point. Isolated verbiage was never dreamt of. A man must have written, and what was of a nearly paramount importance, he must have written about something. In those days, Fame was wont to be a staid and proper personage, and none dared to woo her favours and her voice but the grey, the musty, and the garrulous; nor to come into the presence without especial letters of introduction from Starvation, Death, and Co.

But, thank the gods, those days are gone. Neither lives nor years are now needed to acquire her trumpet; nor is it necessary that one should sigh his soul and years away upon moth-eaten tomes, cheating his fellow-insect of its lawful right; nor write what nobody for their very soul can comprehend, the writer not even excepted. The times are changed; such ages are extinct, and philosophers are universally esteemed but fools; for they have been weighed in the balance, and found wanting. We would not wish to speak irreverently of antique worthies,—far be it from us; for, as our very excellent friend, Quinfilian, hath it, ‘Modeste tamen et circumspicito iudicio de tantis viris prouocandum est, ne, quod plerisque accidit, damnetur qua non intelligant.’ But mankind will be no longer clapped: its eyes have been opened, and, that with the assistance of microscopes, horoscope, and certain other scopes, its vision has been most miraculously extended. It is true that wisdom was their eternal theme, but good people have discovered that there is so much thing as wisdom is in the earth.—it is all a fodge; and ‘Mihi beati martini;’ that is, all my eye and Betty Martin. For, after all that has been thought, said, and written, wherein—as a city friend, who does nothing out of the way of average and computation, very shrewdly observed to us the other day—‘wherein is the world wiser or better than it was?’ Behold the countless millions that have inhabited the globe—allow to each individual a life, of, say thirty years, and to have said as much in each week as might fill a post ledger, (he never dreamt of an octavo;) now then, said he, ‘30 by 52—1560,—just so; and 1560 by the countless millions before mentioned. Debit the world with the total, and carry ‘wisdom’ to the credit side of the account current—and strike the balance!’

The thing was unanswerable.

* Our readers are no doubt aware, that in these days it is deemed perfectly consistent to concur in the detraction of our correspondent in one page, and to assert our high admiration of an anonymous party in another. The practice is spontaneous, and we adopt it as a matter of course.—Ed.

Genius was like good metal in the ore, excellent sort of stuff within, but most incorrigibly ungracious in its external costume. In the ‘days of other years,’ authors arose from their native clay with a snail-paced velocity, and came—

‘Like angels’ visits, few and far between.’

But now, (O joy!) legions of delicious writers start up, like the days of spring,—young, fresh, and lovely. An author of the present age excites but two passions in the hearts of men, and those are love and envy. There is not a bliss that the earth or the heavens can afford but is his. He is a perfect glutton, and revels and riots in the fulness and the fatness of the land. His labour is his love,—the world his workshop,—and infinity his material. He is as wild, as fickle, and as varied, as the very air he breathes; and quite as pure. His genius is as rarified as the highest atmosphere, and as deep as the ocean. It discovers beauty in a rotten apple; fragrance in assafoetida,— ‘Sermons in stones, books in the running brooks,

And good in every thing.’

There is not a cloud that passes through the heavens,—

‘Nor tree nor bush,

Nor meadow-flower nor summer-scented gale,’

but is made subservient to his high purposes. He draws most important conclusions from the whelp of a young puppy, and discusses a mutton-chop or a metaphysical inquiry, with an equal facility. He will deduce most sapient inferences from a par-boiled turnip, and preach on the stings of conscience from the contemplation of a hedge-hog. He will indite a dissertation on the Justinian code, or a lascivious sonnet on a dirty ditch; and luxuriate in them both; he will think for ever on a nullity, and talk ‘an infinite deal of nothing more than any man in all Venice;’ he will dwell with raptures on the sublimity of a broom-stick, and associate most exquisite sensations with the grunt of a sucking-pig. He will write you an epitaph for a love-sick poodle, or play you the coronation anthem on a Jew-harp, and discourse most excellent music on either. He will get up a waspish satire, or try his hand at a ‘boat’ of single stick, and use both weapons with the same felicity of touch; and will spin a negative into utter extension, in a ream of the ‘best wove,’ off-handed, and put any scrivener to the blush at the purity of its penmanship. But it were a task of less toil and time to wade through Rees’s Cyclopadia, from the indefinite ‘A’ to its unequal ‘Zootomy,’ than to detail the versatility of his reconcilable powers; and we do not, under the absolute persuasion that every one of our readers has a full and perfect intimacy with all and each of them, severally and respectively; we know it, we say, because we are convinced there is not a single page in any given number of our paper, but exhibits one or other of the transcendent capacities which have been above enumerated. Indeed, we wish it to be distinctly understood, that we have had a most allusive eye upon ourselves in the latter examination, and in doing so, we can, we think, be hardly amenable to a charge of egotism, a quality of all others we thoroughly abominate; the innate modesty, (so pre-eminently characteristic of our writing,) suggesting the external injustice we should be doing to ourselves and our exertions by withholding those praises which all the world awards to us; and it would be worse than affectation to assume an ignorance of that which is proclaimed with a loud and a lasting voice. From all parts of the island, in truth, and from every town and hamlet in the three kingdoms, ecumeniums, praise, and flattery, come threatening fast upon us in all the varied forms a lavish patronage can exhibit. And so anxious are our city friends to testify the high estimation in which they hold us, that we were compelled to return, last week, no less than two-pounds-fifteen-shillings-and-four-pence worth of two-penny posters. Our friend LIMBIRD, too, (for whom we have much regard,) respectfully hinted to us last Thursday’s night, that from the influx of customers, and the heavy duties which the sale and publication of the CHRONICLE imposed upon him, he was fearful that his constitution would be seriously injured, but soon resumed his wonted courage, when reminded that his difficulties are somewhat less than those overcome by Hercules, when he destroyed the Lernean hydra.

Although these immediately preceding observations are in no wise necessary to the precise illustration of the proposition with which we set out, yet we deemed it due to our character and capacity to assert our true position in the republic of letters; and to devote the little portion left us in boldly throwing the gauntlet before all comers, and undoubtedly declaring, that from a confucian controversy to the disquisition of a cabbage-stump—WE HAVE NO EQUAL!!

REMEMBERED BEAUTY.

To *****

*'She came—she is gone—we have met—
To meet, perhaps, never again.'—COWPER.*

THY sweet remembrance flits across the waste
Of memory's void, like some bright stful glimmer
Of light on dusky clouds—the phantom dance
Of Hopes, flies like the waking of a summer dream.
Where all was lovely, gliding 'mid the gleam
Of thousand tapers, and the fairy feet
Of Beauty shot along in evensong haste,
As jealous of the space they lightly beat.
Twas e'en in such a dream as this thy beaming eyes
Told to my heart the tale I wish'd were true;
'But, as the mist of morn, the vision flies—
And thou, alas! art fled for ever too.
This sad faint trace of love will never fade,
But hover round my heart, affection's shade.

EPIGRAM,

Occasioned by the Gazette of Saturday, 9th June, 1821.

ENGLAND, complaints have long been made,
About thy bankrupt state,
Thy great taxation, loss of trade,
And thy impending fate;
I fear that these are facts too clear,
Tho' not quite prov'd as yet,
For 'to-day, I saw appear,

THE CAVALIER.

THE cavalier has bared his blade,
The bugle has rang, and the trumpet bray'd,
And he's ta'en his leave of his own lov'd maid,
Like a true and a gallant soldier.
The banner of war to the wind is spread,
The plume waves high o'er each proud head,
And the dark earth rings with the charger's tread
That bears the gallant soldier.
The fight's begun, and the well-poised blade
A thousand times in dust has laid,
And the shot is fired, and the pray'r is said
O'er the corse of the gallant soldier.
His maid! she sits in her tower on high,
And she hears the wind in her dark locks sigh,
And she looks abroad, but can naught desirey
Of her brave and gallant soldier.
Tho' the shock was loud, she heard it not,
She thought but of their happy lot,
And she little dreamt, that the farwell shot
Had been fired o'er her gallant soldier.
High hopes at morn, in the bosoms play'd
Of the gallant youth and his dark ey'd maid,
But, at eve, those hopes in the dust were laid,
A corse was her gallant soldier.
He silent lay in the lone cold tomb,
And a broken heart was his true love's doom.
Oh! that maiden's life is a life of gloom,
Whose love is fix'd on a soldier.
Too soon she heard the story told,
And long she wept for the true and bold,
But her eye is dim, and her heart is cold,—
She sleeps with her gallant soldier.
And sweet, oh sweet is the lover's sleep,
No more they sigh, no more they weep,
And gentle beats the memory keep
Of the maid and her gallant soldier.

Biography.

THE ABBE FARIA.

THE Abbe Faria was born at Goa; his father was a black and a pagan; he, however, embraced the Catholic faith, and even became a member of the priesthood. His son came to Europe at a very early age, went through his studies at Lisbon, and was made a priest at Rome. He came to France during the revolution, and on the thirteenth Vendemiaire, he marched at the head of one of the battalions of insurgents, directed against the convention, since which period he attentively followed the practice of magnetism, having always been one of its most active disciples. It is also asserted, that such was the dread he inspired by the power these mysteries afforded him, that a gaming-house, which he had been in the habit of frequenting, paid him a weekly salary to discontinue his visits; and what, perhaps, is singular enough, is that it was in this very house he made an acquaintance with a gentleman who procured him the place of Professor of Philosophy, at the Lyceum at Marseilles. This fact, however extraordinary, is, notwithstanding, perfectly correct. On arriving at his new residence, he wished to preach in one of the parish churches, but his discourse was of such a nature, and so very uncommon, that the curate was obliged to interfere, after having politely thanked him for his zeal. It so happened, that this same curate was shortly after made inspector of the Lyceum, where the Abbe Faria was professor, and who now was determined to revenge himself by instigating the whole of the class under his care to revolt against their new chief. This he did not find much difficulty in effecting, having great influence over his scholars, occasioned either by his favourite doctrines, or interesting their curiosity by his very extraordinary manners. The confusion and disorders he produced in this establishment caused him to be transferred to the Lyceum, at Nismes. In this town, he established a trough, where he magnetized the crowds that flocked around him; many persons either were, or fancied themselves cured. At length, however, having once consulted a somnambulist respecting a female, he quickly discovered the evil, without, having been able to find out also, that the woman was pregnant; the remedy was applied, and the result was, that the poor patient died shortly after, in consequence of having miscarried. This circumstance determined the police, which had previously been alarmed, to forbid the magnetizer's proceedings; just at this period, a small curacy in the neighbourhood became vacant, and M. l'Abbe Faria, without either the permission of the bishop of the diocese (the Bishop of Avignon), or any power, whatever, hastened to the place, took possession, and began to preach, confess, and magnetize all those who approached him. The bishop, informed of the fact, applied to the authorities to dispossess the usurper; it was not, however, without considerable difficulty that he was torn from his parishioners, who had considered him a prophet, or at least a saint. It was at this period that he returned to Paris, where he again established himself in the year 1813, about which time he was frequently spoken of by the journals; his residence, during the later years of his life, was in the rue St. Anne, where he gave, every Thursday, consultations and representations upon somnambulism: any person was admitted by paying five francs. The Abbe Faria used to say, that a short time previous to the exile of the Braganza family, he had been named by the Regent of Portugal, to a bishopric of that kingdom. The Abbe Faria's character was ardent, active, and turbulent; the expression of his countenance was both terrifying and extraordinary, and served him wonderfully well in his magnetic operations; he was well made, and of an advantageous height. The race of blacks from which he sprung, and whose colour he preserved in a degree, do not resemble those of Africa: they have neither their flat nose, large lips, nor woolly hair, &c. M. Faria excelled in scholastic argument; indeed, it would have been difficult to cope with him in subtlety: he spoke several languages with fluency, amongst which was the modern Greek. We are also informed, that he had composed a Latin Grammar, which he intended to have published.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—On Friday last, this theatre closed, we can scarcely say for the season, as we find it will re-open on Wednesday next. The attraction of Miss Wilson, and the general success which has attended the operas, has, no doubt, rendered it the best season that Drury has known for some years. It might, however, have been rendered much better, if a small portion of that attention which was exclusively devoted to the operatic department, had been bestowed in bringing into action the excellent comic company which belongs to the establishment.

On Monday night, a grand masked festival was given at this house, in commemoration of the battle of Waterloo, for which the most extensive preparations had been made. The pit was boarded over level with the stage, so as to form one immense floor, and it was boarded, too, in a much better style than we have seen elsewhere. The stage, with the side scenes taken away, formed the interior of a magnificent temple; the cornice supported by pilasters of glowing variegated lamps, and the compartments between the pilasters, filled up with romantic scenery and appropriate allegorical designs. In the principal compartment, opposite the audience, appeared a gigantic transparent portrait of the King, surrounded by rays of glory in brilliant lamps; and opposite to this, on the front of the boxes, was placed a portrait of his Royal Highness the Duke of York; and all around were portraits, much larger than life, of the principal commanders of the allied armies on the field of Waterloo. The entire front of the boxes, in addition to their every-night splendour, was hung with festoons of many coloured lamps, intermixed with wreaths of artificial flowers; and from the centre of the temple depended a stupendous buhl chandelier, with moon lamps. In short, it would be difficult for the warmest fancy to imagine a more brilliant coup d'œil. From eight till eleven, the assembling visitors were entertained with a variety of dramatic entertainments. An appropriate ode was recited by Mr. Cooper. 'God save the King' was next sung with great applause. The interlude of the Blue Devils was then acted: Mr. Elliston, as Megrin, was received with particular marks of approbation; it was, however, often interrupted by bursts of laughter, provoked by the ludicrous assemblage which the boxes opened to the view. A periwinkle woman, with a black-eye, and a basket on her head, attracted much notice in the dress circle.

Some disappointment was experienced when Mr. Cooper informed the audience that Mr. Braham was so exclusively hoarse it was impossible for him to have the honour of appearing before them that evening. But the efforts of Mr. Horn and Mr. T. Cooke, of Signor Ambrogetti, of Miss Wilson, Madame Vestris, Mrs. Bland, Miss Cubit, and Mrs. and the Misses Ashe, made them forget every promised pleasure in the enjoyment afforded by a rich feast of harmony actually before them.

The Actress of All Work was acted, in which Mrs. Edwin and Mr. Knight displayed all their wonted humour. They were much applauded; but, towards the close of the piece, the spectators became impatient to change place with the performers, and, to meet their wishes, it was terminated rather abruptly.

Then commenced the animated humour of a masquerade, and those who took a part in them were at once lively and decorous. Many of the groups were most whimsically diversified. Parsons and clowns, lawyers and flower-girls, pilgrims and ballad-singers, went through the mazes of the sportive dance with great vivacity; while the fantoccini, slack-rope dancing, vaulting, and a variety of other well-selected exhibitions, furnished an endless round of amusements, which, sustained by the comforts of a substantial English supper, splendidly set out with an infinity of decoration; produced the most unbounded glee and satisfaction. At two o'clock the theatre presented a scene of jolity and mirth which Comus and his bacchanals could not surpass. It was seven o'clock in the morning before the company separated.

ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.—This theatre opened, for the summer season, on Thursday, when the favourite pieces of Free and Easy, the Rump, and the Vampire, were admirably performed to a crowded audience. The company retains most of its old favourites, and some new performers, including Mr. J. Knight and Miss E. Blanchard, who will add to its strength, so that we anticipate for ourselves and the public much entertainment.

Mrs. GLOVER.—This lady took her benefit at the above theatre on Monday night, and not on the Thursday previous, as our contemporary had it*. The

* The editor of LONGMAN'S CUNNINGYME ADVERTIZER is so fond of 'anticipatory inspections,' that he not only reviews books before they are published, but has actually criticised a performance before it took place. In his number of Saturday last, we met with the following notice:—'On Thursday, Mrs. Glover was Hamlet. We wish it had been Othello well blacked, had it only been for the chance of recalling to our delighted memory the play was Hamlet, and the royal Dane was enacted with much spirit by Mrs. G. particularly in the fencing scene with Laertes, for which she had been, in some degree, prepared by four lessons from Angelo.

MR. MATTHEWS.—This gentleman terminated his fourth season, which has continued unabated in attraction since its commencement, on Saturday night. We cannot say, 'we could have spared a better man,' for we do not know one; but we could gladly relinquish one half of the company, including the managers of some of our royal theatres, to keep Charles Matthews 'at home.' We must not, however, entirely monopolize his talents, but allow him to go abroad, if it is only for the benefit of his health.

SURREY THEATRE.—A very excellent melodrama, called Edith, or the Hag of Poland, has been produced at this theatre, in which there is much good acting by Miss Taylor and Mr. Burroughs. This house has recently attracted very crowded audiences.

SADLER'S WELLS.—Since our last notice of this compact little theatre, a pantomime, Harlequin at Home, has been produced, highly creditable to the taste of the manager. The peculiar excellence of this over pantomimes in general, consists in the elegant, chaste, and interesting style in which the piece commences;—the scenery too is extremely beautiful, and the piece is altogether well fitted for the gratification of juvenile holiday folks.

LUCRETIUS.

Singular Advancement in Life.—The Roman Emperor C. Julius Emilianus was a Moorish slave; Aurelian, the Emperor of Rome was the son of a poor peasant; Pope Alexander the Fifth was a common beggar in the Isle of Candia; and Pope Adrian the Fourth was a poor English monk.

charms of a Venus once exhibited in London. The burlesque was admirable. How so unmerited an attack on a lady whose talents and misfortunes entitle her to respect, could have escaped the editor, we know not, as he has the reputation of liberality; and in the very same page he speaks of the propriety of benefits being exempted from the ordeal of criticism, and even in the same column with this uncharitable notice, has the following observation, to which we most cordially subscribe: 'When we look at the frail tenure by which actors hold all that is valuable to them in public opinion, we cannot but lament every instance of injustice.' To such a lamentation we leave this editor.

Bull of the 'Times'—The Times newspaper of Wednesday se'nights, in a report of some proceedings at the Mansion House, respecting the famed Bridge Street Association, says, Mr. Thackeray 'read over the names of several anonymous correspondents.'—Nil desperandum pro Rege et Lege, P. J., P. V., &c. &c.

Appropriate Texts.—The public have often been amused with cross-readings in the newspapers, in which, from casual combinations of words, very curious ideas are sometimes produced. The following, though not of that class, owes its effect entirely to a fortuitous circumstance:—Dr. Blair, in the third volume of his sermons, after an elegant dedication to her majesty, chooses, for the text of his first discourse, 'Exalt her, and she shall promote thee; extol her, and she shall bring thee to honour.'

There is another laughable instance of a text, accidentally made choice of by a worthy clergyman, the Rev. Mr. Enfield, who, the first Sunday after his marriage, preached from the following text:—'Have pity upon me, Have pity upon me, O ye my friends, for the hand of God hath touched me.'

The Coronation.—It is usual for two gentlemen of the court to walk in the procession as Dukes of Normandy and Guienne, habited in the ancient dress of the ducal peers of France. They are described as follows, in a book of the age of Henry VII. and the account agrees with those of later times: 'Two squires for the king's bodie, bearing in baudrick wise two mantelles, [of crimson velvet] furred with ermyons, wearing two hattes of estate of crysmen clothe of golde, beked over heke, turned upp behinde, and furred also with ermyons, in representation of the king's two duchesses of Gyen and Normaudie.' Of the first appearance of these characters in our coronations, I have not found any account; but it may be conjectured that they were introduced after the conquests of Edward III. for the purpose of perpetuating the claims of our Norman and Angevine princes.

Review of New Books.

Memoir of the Operations of the British Army in India, during the Mahratta War of 1817, 1818, and 1819. Illustrated by Maps and Topographical Plans. By Lieut. Colonel Valentine Blacker. 4to. pp. 494. London, 1821. With a Volume of Plates.

We love peace, and feel much more pleasure in recording the conquests of science and the arts than the triumphs of armies or the aggrandizement of empires; but our duty as reviewers does not always allow us to consult our own taste, and we should very reluctantly pass any new work of four or five guineas' price without a notice. Hindostan, so fertile in wars, has, for the last five or six years, been the only theatre in which the British arms have been engaged; and the war there, though always of much importance as relates to our power in this mighty empire, has attracted much attention, not only from the ability with which it was conducted, but also from its results, which have added so much to our territorial possessions, and extended our sway over provinces which had so often been among the most formidable of our enemies in this quarter of the globe.

Colonel Blacker's work contains a succinct narrative of the operations of the British army during the whole of the three years' Mahratta war; it is a military commentary, written for the information of professional men only, and therefore little calculated for the general reader. The author adheres closely to the subject, and is never for a moment diverted from it by the slightest episode; it is a modest narrative, in which, although 'honour is given to whom honour is due,' yet it is in that sobriety of style, which distinguished all the military reports and despatches of the Duke of Wellington. Here are no affecting incidents, no private anecdotes, no florid descriptions, nor remarkable adventures, and yet, in a literary point of view, we consider it almost as a model for works of this description; of the correctness of the author's judgment, as a military man, we confess our incompetency to judge, for we know little of sieges, marches, and counter marches, stratagems, alarms, and the other numerous details of warfare.

It will, perhaps, be in the recollection of some of our readers, that the conduct of Sir Thomas Hislop, a British general in India, who, on taking the fort of Taloor, hung the Killedar, was the subject of severe animadversion, both in Parliament and at the East India House, although the gallant officer was, we then thought, successfully vindicated; but we confess the account of the affair given by Colonel Blacker has somewhat shaken that opinion. Sir Thomas Hislop, it appears, was quite astonished to find that an insulated place like Taloor should be 'so rash as to oppose the advance of a respectable force'; and, in the first instance, he sent 'a summons to the Killedar, with an intimation of the consequences which would attend his attempt at resistance.' They did not regard the summons, nor the fire which was opened against their defences in general; but the preparations against the gates did not fail to alarm them, and 'they sent out to demand terms of capitulation. In reply they were informed that unconditional surrender alone would be accepted; and they were invited to avail themselves of this offer before the assault of the gates should commence.' The fort of Taloor is well calculated for defence, as will appear by the following description of it:—

'One side of Taloor fort rises out of the Taptee, and the three other sides are surrounded by a hollow way, varying in width from one hundred to one hundred and fifty yards. The walls rise to the height of about sixty feet above this hollow, and the interior of the fort has the same elevation. The only entrance is on the eastern side, and secured by five successive gates, communicating by intricate traverses, whose inclosures gradually rise to the height of the main wall. A winding ramp, interspersed in some places with steps, ascends through the gates to the terrace of the rampart. Great native ingenuity had been exercised to render this part as strong as possible, apparently under the idea that the profile of the rest rendered it secure, notwithstanding the absence of a ditch. The ground immediately surrounding the hollow way, is cut by deep ravines, which run into it. The intermediate parts are crowned with clusters of houses which form the town of Taloor, distant from the fort about three hundred and fifty yards. The country surrounding the town is flat, but separated from it by other ravines which branch off in various directions.'

The garrison did not accept the terms of unconditional surrender, and in the evening the attack was commenced. The storming party passed through the first and second gates without opposition. At the third it was met by the Killedar with a number of Bunjams and artificers:—

'Lieutenant-colonel Conway, the adjutant-general of the army, with Lieutenant-colonel Macgregor Murray, and several others, had entered with the storming party; and it was still doubtful whether resistance would ultimately be made, for at this time there was none. They accordingly passed through the fourth gate, which, as well as the second, appeared so much out of repair, as to be incapable of being shut; but at the fifth, or last gate, they were stopped, though the wicket was opened. A hurried conversation about terms of surrender now took place. It was probably little intelligible, under the circumstances of noise and apprehension which attended it. Colonel Murray, under this state of uncertainty, concluding that there was an urgent necessity for establishing a footing such as would secure eventual success to the attack, should the enemy hold out, entered by the wicket, with Major Gordon, and about three grenadiers; but refrained from drawing his sword, to shew that he had no intention of breaking off the parley. He expected to be followed by as many men as should be able to maintain themselves in a confined situation; but four or five persons only had got in, when the enemy, apprehending the consequences, attacked most furiously, and in a moment laid them all dead except Colonel Murray, who fell towards the wicket covered with wounds. They attempted then to close the wicket; but their efforts were rendered ineffectual by a grenadier, who thrust his musket

(with a happy presence of mind) into the aperture, and secured that hope, while Lieutenant-colonel Mackintosh and Captain Mac Craith forced it open. It was held in this state during the time that the captain was, with one hand, dragging Colonel Murray through it, and warding off blows with his sword in the other. A fire was now poured in through the wicket, which cleared the gateway sufficiently for the head of the storming party, under Captain McGregor of the Royals, to enter; and the place was carried without further difficulty, but at the expense of that officer's life. As soon as the supporting detachment could open the gate, many troops poured in, the garrison were shortly put to the sword, and the Killdeer was hanged on the same evening to a tree on the flag-staff tower.*

We quote as a favourable specimen of Colonel Blacker's style, his account of the submission of the Peishwah:—

'Two more days were lost in fruitless negotiations, before Bajee Rao consented to advance to meet the British commander. Even this concession was marked by evident tokens of apprehension; and he stipulated that he should come only five miles, and but half a mile distant from his hills; while Sir John Malcolm, leaving his force at Metawal ten miles in the rear, should advance with a small escort. Unreasonably as was this proposal, it was not rejected; and the interview took place agreeably to appointment, on the afternoon of the 1st of June, near the Keirree Ghut, where he had established a battery to cover his retreat, in case of need. Previously to this measure, which probably appeared rash to Bajee Rao, he sent his treasures into Asseergurg; and, however he might have expressed acquiescence in the terms which had been communicated to him, in order to induce Sir John Malcolm to come forward, his subsequent conduct shewed his mind was not yet prepared to abandon the flattering illusion of princely ceremony. He affected a durbār on coming to the ground; and seated himself under a canopy, on a thick stuffed bedding, maintaining the form of addressing him through a third person, for Sir John's information, as if he were still in the plenitude of power at Poonah. This melancholy farce was maintained about a quarter of an hour; after which he retired with Sir John into a tent, to discuss, with ease and privacy, the important topics of his future fate. This private conference lasted two hours, during which the conversation principally referred, on Bajee Rao's side, to the subject of his bitter misfortunes, and his hopes that Sir John Malcolm, as his only friend, would intercede in his favour. He pressed his solicitations with a degree of eloquence, which could have been little expected from his pre-vicious habits of supercilious form in conversation. This, however, was natural to him, and is the portion of every inhabitant of India, in a much greater measure than falls to the share of the natives of Europe, of similar rank in life. He warmly invoked the sentiments of disinterested friendship, as his sole resource in hours of difficulty; when not only the tribe of flatterers had abandoned, but even adherents of old attachment were forsaking a distressed master. He designated Sir John as the repository of this inestimable and solitary treasure; for, of his three earliest and best friends, he alone remained, Colonel Close* being dead, and General Wellesley in a distant land. But his mind was not yet humbled by all his misfortunes, to the measure of relinquishing without a struggle, the hopes of maintaining the name of Peishwah, and residing at Poonah; and Sir John's remonstrances on the fruitlessness of his perseverance, appeared to have made insufficient impression, when they separated to return to their respective camps.'

Colonel Blacker says that 'more victories have been gained in the field by British armies in India, through the bravery of the British troops, than by manoeuvres of the commanders; and he gives the following pleasing and proud character of our countrymen:—

'The French make excellent light troops, for that service appears conformable to their genius; but the same cannot be said either of the English, or of the class of natives into whom English feelings, before an enemy, are infused by their officers. They love at once to encounter the very worst to which they can be exposed, and arguing from their own feelings, consider as ineffectual the cautious and indirect manoeuvres of light troops. The same disposition was found in the infantry corps organized for native powers by a few British adventures. They made and received desperate assaults which quite astonished their employers; and during twenty years' active service, when the number of French and British officers in Scindiah's army were equal, only four of the former to fifteen of the latter were killed.

It is a pleasing fact to find the British character maintained by British subjects in all parts of the world, and under the most cheerless circumstances; and the hard service and brilliant exploits performed by these men and their corps, would do honour to any army. It would be a mistake to suppose that De Boyne's corps were officered entirely by foreigners, because his name is French; and whenever they have suffered severely, the names of the officers killed and wounded are found invariably to be British. In the action between Holkar's and Scindiah's troops, in September 1803, we find on the latter side Colonel Vickers, Major Harding, and Major Armstrong; and on the former, Dawes, Catms, and Douglas, all of whom were killed, with six hundred of their men, out of fourteen hundred killed and wounded. Only one officer survived, and Major Harding was killed on the other side. In the previous year also, Holkar had attacked, under the walls of Oojein, a corps of Scindiah's, consisting of four battalions, commanded by Colonel Hlesing's son. Notwithstanding an immense disparity of numbers, these battalions never broke. Three-fifths were killed, one-fifth wounded, and out of eleven officers, seven were saved at their guns. Their names were Captains Graham, Urquhart, and M'Pherson, Lieutenants Montague, Lany, Doolun, and Haden, all British subjects.'

* The late Major-general Sir Barry Close, Bart., during whose nine years' residence at Poonah in a political capacity, the Peishwah had been rescued from the hands of Holkar, and his affairs placed in that train of prosperity which furnished him with the power of exciting hostility against the British government, when he ceased to appreciate the benefits of their connexion.'

The volume of illustrations contains eight maps and thirty-eight plans, admirably engraved.

Travels of Cosmo the Third, through England, during the Reign of King Charles the Second.

THE Grand Duke went to the King's theatre to hear a comedy, in his majesty's box:—

'This theatre is nearly of a circular form, surrounded, in the inside, by boxes separated from each other, and divided into several rows of seats, for the greater accommodation of the ladies and gentlemen, who, in conformity with the freedom of the country, sit together indiscriminately; a large space being left on the ground-floor for the rest of the audience. The scenery is very light, capable of a great many changes, and embellished with beautiful landscapes. Before the comedy begins, that the audience may not be tired with waiting, the most delightful symphonies are played; on which account many persons come early to enjoy this agreeable amusement. The comedies which are acted, are in prose; but their plots are confused, neither unity nor regularity being observed; the authors having in view, rather than any thing else, to describe accurately the passions of the mind, the virtues and the vices; and they succeed the better, the more the players themselves, who are excellent, assist them with action, and with the enunciation of their language, which is very well adapted for the purpose, as being a variation, but very much confined and curtailed, of the Teutonic idiom; and enriched with many phrases and words of the most beautiful and expressive description, taken both from ancient and modern languages.'

The grand Duke Cosmo did not remain long in London during his first visit, but after 'seeing the lions,' and attending the King and the Duke of York, in a party, down the river to Greenwich, he set out for Newmarket, to see the races. On his way, he stopped at Audley End, the splendid seat of the Earl of Suffolk, of which three charming views are given, accompanied by the following brief notice of this celebrated mansion:—

* A recent instance, in another hemisphere, affords an additional proof, were such necessary, of the reluctance with which the forms of gratitude are relinquished.

'The entrance is into a quadrangular court, whose sides are surrounded by porticoes of stone, which, extending with perfect regularity to the distance of several bowshots, inclose a large meadow. The balustrade which runs round the court, is formed, on one side, of the letters which compose the following words:—Sapientia est in consilio fortunam semper habere; and on the other, with those of the motto belonging to the arms of the order of the garter, Honi soit qui mal y pense. The interior of the house consists of many apartments, well proportioned and judiciously disposed; and of a well-lighted gallery, ninety paces or more in length, having a ceiling of stucco, adorned with arabesques, and walls lined with wainscot, which is the custom in all the houses of the English nobility, as a protection against the cold. The architecture of the palace, although it was built only sixty years ago, is nevertheless not regular, but inclines to the Gothic, mixed with a little of the Doric and Ionic. The materials of which it is composed, are brick: the ornaments of all kinds are splendid, and entirely of stone, and the roof of lead. Upon the roof is a gallery, in the midst of which rises a small cupola, containing a clock, the sound of which proclaims to a great distance, the magnificence of this vast fabric; and from the top of this is an infinitely diversified prospect of gardens, meadows, hills, woods, and valleys, which appear at different distances in the most beautiful points of view. The king is so much delighted with this place, that he is in treaty with the earl for the purchase of it, and they say, that some time ago, the price was agreed upon, but as it was not paid, the earl still retains possession.'

The English horse-race appears to have pleased Cosmo, who, not to lose any time while at Newmarket, passed his leisure either in coursing, shooting dotterels, or visiting the villas in the neighbourhood; at one of which, the country seat of Sir John Russell, he saw a daughter of Oliver Cromwell, married to Sir John, whom his highness treated with great politeness, 'giving her the place of honour.' The king was at this time at Newmarket; either from affability or in accordance to the prejudice of the times (for we scarcely think that Charles believed in the mummery), he set apart a day for touching for the king's evil, which, we are told, he was accustomed to perform every Friday, 'according to the ancient usage of the first Catholic Kings of England, which was handed down to their successors, continued after the apostasy, and preserved to the time of the present king.' Cosmo witnessed the ceremony:—

'When his majesty was informed that all was ready, he went from his chamber into a room adjoining, where was placed on a table a cushion, on which lay the prayer-book, appointed by the Anglican ritual, for the use of his majesty. As soon as he appeared, and at a signal given by him, the two assistant ministers, dressed in their surplices, began the prayers with a great appearance of devotion; his highness standing, while they were read, in another room; from which, when the service was finished, he passed into the room in which those who were afflicted with the king's evil, were assembled, for the purpose of observing the ceremony, from the side of the door which led into the room. A carpet was spread upon the floor, and upon it was a seat, on which the king seated himself, and certain invocations in the English language, taken from the prayer-book, having been read by one of the ministers, his majesty began the ceremony of touching the patients in the part affected. These were conducted into the king's presence, one at a time, and as they knelt before him, he touched them with both his hands; after which, without interfering with the others who came after them, each returned to his former situation. This being over, the minister, kneeling with all the by-standers, the king alone remained seated, repeated some other prayers; after which, all rising, the diseased came again in the same order as before, to his majesty, who put round their necks a ribbon of an azure colour; from which was suspended a medallion of gold, stamped with his own image, in shape and weight resembling an Hungarian sequin.'

Cosmo, on leaving Newmarket, visited Cambridge, where he was received with great honours by the magistrates and the heads of the university. He was first complimented in an address of congratulation in English, which was translated to him afterwards in an oration, which, 'although it was in Latin, yet being pronounced with a peculiar accent, was not less difficult to be understood, than that which followed in the English language.' A number of degrees were conferred; and Dr. Dornie, physician to his highness, was placed 'in the number of the Baldratrici of the university.' More Latin speeches, equally unintelligible to the prince, followed. Cosmo next visited the several colleges, of which historical notices are given. At Trinity College, he saw a Latin comedy represented by the scholars, but could not understand it on account of the accent.

From Cambridge, Cosmo went to Northampton, where, on his arrival, 'the bells were immediately rung as a mark of joy, and being well tuned, the sound of them was very agreeable; but the ringing being continued a great part of the night, they proved a great interruption to sleep.' At Althorp, Cosmo dined with the Earl of Sunderland at his lordship's villa:—

'His highness paid his compliments to my lady, the wife of the master of the house, and daughter of my Lord George Digby, Earl of Bristol, by whom the earl had three children, one son and two daughters; and when he had spent some time in this visit, the hour of dinner arrived, which was splendid, and served in the best possible style. At table his highness sat in the place of honour, in an arm-chair, he having previously desired that my lady, the wife of the earl, might be seated in a similar one; the earl also was obliged by his highness to take his place close to him, the gentlemen of his retinue sitting separately upon stools. When dinner was over, his highness was conducted through the other apartments of the mansion, all of which were sumptuously furnished; and having observed the manner in which one apartment communicated with another, he went down into the garden, in which, except some ingenious divisions, parterres, and well-arranged rows of trees, there is little to be seen that is rare or curious; as it is not laid out and diversified with those shady walks, canopied with verdure, which add to the pleasantness of the gardens of Italy and France, but of which the nature and usage of this country would not admit.'

Oxford was next visited, where his highness was received with similar honours to those he had met with at Cambridge; and he went the same round of visiting each college in the university. The library did not appear to his highness to merit the praise bestowed on it, and at the Anatomical Theatre he saw nothing curious, 'except the skin of a man stuffed with tow; a human foot, from the end of one of whose toes was a horn growing out; and sundry animals and skeletons hung up against the wall.'

From Oxford, Cosmo proceeded to Windsor, with the castle of which he was much pleased; he then returned to town, and, among his earliest visits, went to the house of Mr. Boyle, 'whose works have procured him the reputation of being one of the brightest geniuses in England.' The eulogy on this great man is sadly qualified, because he was not a Catholic; it is, however, curious:—

'This gentleman [Mr. Boyle] not only reduced to practice his observations on natural philosophy, in the clearest and most methodical manner, rejecting the assistance of scholastic disputations and controversies, and satisfying the curiosity with physical experiments, but, prompted by his natural goodness, and his anxiety to communicate to nations the most remote and idolatrous the information necessary to the knowledge of God, caused translations of the Bible into the Oriental languages to be printed and circulated. In order to make them acquainted with the Scriptures; and has endeavoured still further to lead the most rude and vicious to moral perfection, by various works, which he has himself composed. Indeed, if in his person the true belief had been united with the correctness of a moral life, nothing would have remained to be desired; but this philosopher, having been born and brought up in heresy, is necessarily ignorant of the principles of the true religion, knowing the Roman Catholic church only by the controversial books of the Anglican sect, of which he is a most strenuous defender and a most constant follower; his blindness, therefore, on this subject, is no way compatible with his great erudition. He shewed his highest, with an ingenious pneumatic instrument, invented by himself, and brought to perfection by Christian Huygen, of Zuylichem, many beautiful experiments to discover the effect of the rarefaction and compression of the air upon bodies, by observing what took place with animals when exposed to it: and hence may be learned the cause of rheumatism, catarrhs, and other contagious disorders produced by air, and of various natural indispositions. It was curious to see an experiment on the change of colours: two clear waters, on being poured into one another, becoming red, and by the addition of another red, becoming clear again; and the experiment of an animal shut up in a vacuum, and the whole exposed to the pressure of the air. There was an instrument which shows of itself the changes of the air which take place in the twenty-four hours, of wind, rain, cold, and heat, by means of a watch, a thermometer, a mariner's compass, and a small sail, like that of a windmill, which sets an hand in motion, that makes marks with a pencil as it goes round; there was also another instrument of a most curious construction, by means of which, a person who has never learned may draw any object whatever. He showed also to his highness, amongst other curiosities, certain lenses of a single glass, worked facet-wise, which multiplied objects; a globe of the moon of a peculiar construction, and several other things worthy of attention.'

The account of Exeter Change, then called the New Exchange, is very curious:—

'The building has a façade of stone, built after the Gothic style, which has lost its colour from age, and is become blackish. It contains two long and double galleries, one above the other, in which are distributed, in several rows, great numbers of very rich shops of drapers and mercers, filled with goods of every kind, and with manufactures of the most beautiful description. These are, for the most part, under the care of well-dressed women, who are busily employed in work; although many are served by young men, called apprentices, who, in order to qualify themselves for this craft or business, are obliged to serve their master for a certain time, not only in the shop, but in the house and out of doors, at his discretion; nor can they claim any exemption, except on certain specified days in the year, on which, being freed from all subjection towards their masters, they do whatever they choose; and so great is their number, that, in order to prevent the inconveniences which might arise, the government of the city finds it necessary, by a particular provision, to oblige the heads of the houses in every street to keep on foot a certain number of men, armed with spears, at the head of the street, by way of preventing the insolence of the apprentices on the days in which this freedom is allowed them, which are at the Easter and Whitsontide holidays, and some others, according to the custom of the city, for uniting together to the number of ten thousand, (and they are supposed to amount to that number or more,) they divide themselves into separate parties, and spread over the different quarters of the city, meditating and frequently accomplishing the annoyance of the public, as it may suit their fancy, taking confidence from their numbers, and from the cudgels which they hold in their hands, (the carrying any other sort of weapon being prohibited), and this they push to such an extent, that it frequently happens, that the authority of any lord mayor has not been able to restrain their headstrong rashness; and even towards this magistrate they have not unfrequently failed in proper respect, and have treated him with contempt and derision.'

In the course of a tour through the city, we have the following brief notice of the Temple, Covent Garden, Moorfields, &c.:—

'His highness spent almost the whole of the morning in conversation, so that there was but a short time left for him to take a tour through the city before dinner; nevertheless, he went in his carriage to the College of the Temple, that is, of the Knights Templars, who, before their suppression by Pope Clement V., used to reside there; and on the pavement of the small church belonging to it, there are still to be seen many figures in baso relievo, representing several of these knights in armour, with the badges of their order, from which the name was taken. The gate of London, which is contiguous to it, serves at present as a residence for some collegians, who study the ancient Norman language, in which are written the laws of the kingdom relating to the administration of justice; there are many masters appointed to instruct them, and to qualify them for pleaders. On his return, he passed by the place of the Common Garden, which is in a square, on rather higher ground than the New Exchange. Two sides are occupied by houses, one by the façade of a church, in a good style of architecture, and the other by the garden of the palace of the Earl of Bedford, the trees of which project over the walls, they not being raised much from the ground; and in the middle of the place or square is erected a pillar, on which are several sundials, which serve for emblems, enlivened by various mottoes, one of which, alluding to the hours, says "Per cent et imputatur." His highness then returned home; and there dined with him some of those lords and gentlemen who had been a little before to pay their respects to him, and his own retinue as usual. After dinner, he again went out in his carriage, extending his drive to the most distant parts of the city, as far as Moorfields, a place composed of two large inclosed squares; this leads to a second, and that again to a third, which are surrounded by abundance of mulberry trees, and add much to the agreeableness of the space of ground occupied by this grand place, which is appropriated to the sale of horses.'

A review of two or three regiments in Hyde Park, leads to a notice of the king's guards, and, among others, the Beefeaters, of whom we are told, that,—

'In the hall, called the Guard-Room, is the guard of the Manica, or sleeve (you mean of the guard), consisting of two hundred and fifty very handsome men, the tallest and strongest that can be found in England; they are called, in jest, Beef-eaters, that is, eaters of beef, of which a considerable portion is allowed them by the court every day. These carry an halberd when they are in London, and in the country a half-pike, with a broad sword by their sides; and, before the king had his body guard, they escorted his carriage.'

His highness appears to have been determined to see every thing, and to make himself fully acquainted with our manners, customs, and amusements; hence we find him at the Cock-pit, and have a page devoted to a description of cock-fighting:—

'Attended by Lord Philip, Nevil, Gascoyne, and Castiglioni, his highness went out in his carriage to see the theatre appropriated to cock-fighting, a common amusement of the English, who even in the public streets take a delight in seeing such battles; and their partiality towards these animals is carried to such an height, that considerable bets are made on the victory of the one or the other. To render the cocks fit for fighting, they select the best of the breed, cut off their crests and spurs, keeping them in separate coops or walks, and mix with their usual food, pepper, cloves, and other aromatics, and the yolks of eggs, to heat them, and render them more vigorous in battle; and when they want to bring them to the trial, they convey them in a bag, put on artificial spurs, of silver or steel, very long and sharp, and let them out at the place appointed for the sport. As soon as the cocks are put down, they walk round the field of battle with great animation, each watching for an opportunity to attack his rival with advantage. The first who is attacked places himself in a posture of defence, now spreading himself out, now falling, in his turn, on the assailant; and in the progress of the contest, they are inflamed to such a pitch of rage, that it is almost incredible to such as have never witnessed it, with what fury each annoys his adversary, striking one another on the head with their beaks, and tearing one another with the spurs, till at length he that feels himself superior, and confident of victory, mounts on the back of his opponent, and never quits him, till he has left him dead; and then, by a natural instinct, crows in applause of his own victory. This amusement was not new to his highness, for he had seen it on board ship, on his voyage from Spain to England, the two young volunteers who were on board frequently diverting themselves with making two cocks fight, which they had previously trained for the purpose.

(To be concluded in our next.)

LIVES OF EMINENT SCOTSMEN.

THE first part of a new work, under the above title, has just appeared, and will be followed by a number every succeeding month. It is printed in the same size as the 'Percy Anecdotes,' and in all the qualities of elegance and embellishment, it is one of the first and cheapest publications of the day. The work, however, possesses stronger recommendations than even its elegant form or its low price—the interest and importance of its contents.

Numerous as are the biographical collections that at present exist, and valuable as we admit some of them to be, yet, from the time of Bayle to the present day, they have been but copies or abridgments of each other; it is true, new lives have been added to continue the work chronologically, but in former lives there has seldom been any attention either to obtain new facts or even to examine into the truth of those already stated. Not so, however, are the 'Lives of Eminent Scotsmen'; for, although the first part contains biographies only of persons who are so well known, that it might be supposed every thing respecting them had already been published, yet we here meet with many new facts, some new productions of the authors, and an original estimate of the talents and character of each individual. We are not led into the track of former biographers, but each is an original memoir, as much so in style and diction as if no other had ever existed.

The work purports to be by the Society of Ancient Scots, and edited by the secretary, Arthur Sempil. It is intended to embrace original memoirs of all Scotsmen 'eminent in arts or arms, in letters or science, arranged into separate classes, of poets, historians, philosophers, &c.' The first part commences with the poets, and includes memoirs of James the First, Thomas Rhymer, (not the Rhymer, as former biographers have invariably called him,) John Barbour, Andrew Wyntoun, Gavin Douglas, Allan Ramsay, William Meiton, John Home, James Beattie, and Robert Burns.

We will not inquire whether the Society of Ancient Scots exists or not, but shall look at the work without the slightest reference to who may be its author or authors; and in going through the first part, we are led to award it our warmest praise. The work is written with great ability, and with the true spirit of a biographer, avoiding, on the one hand, a dry detail of facts and dates, and, on the other, prolix dissertation. All the important facts in each man's life, such we mean as enable us to estimate his character, are briefly related, and the necessary inferences which they warrant are drawn. The theories and speculations of former biographers are fairly weighed, and the merits of each 'eminent Scotsman' is discussed with bold independence and impartiality.

It is not our intention to attempt to abridge or condense any one of these memoirs; but, as we spoke of its originality, we shall select a few passages which appear to us to entitle it to that character. The first extract we shall make, is from an admirably written memoir of Allan Ramsay, and relates to the beautiful pastoral opera of that bard:

'The "Gentle Shepherd," though adapted to the stage, did not make its appearance upon it till several years after its publication. The people of Scotland had not as yet thrown off those prejudices with which ages of stern Presbyterianism had filled them, against all sorts of theatrical representations; there were, therefore, no native actors, and, of course, none who could represent a piece so entirely Scottish.' It was the comedy of the Gentle Shepherd, however, which was destined to strike the first blow at this popular aversion to the drama; and the manner in which this came about, affords a striking illustration of the truth, that every attempt to enslave the minds of men is only productive of an ultimate increase in liberality of sentiment.

A printer in Edinburgh, of the name of Robert Drummond, who had been employed to print one of the editions of the Gentle Shepherd, having, after the rebellion of 1745, published a satirical poem, called the Town Council, containing a smart attack on Mr. Drummond, the provost of Edinburgh; Dr. Wishart, principal of the university; Dr. Webster, one of the ministers of the city;

'In a prologue to the university of Oxford, written by Dryden, he makes the following apology for the absence of several performers from England:—

'Our brethren have from Thames to Tweed departed.

And of our sisters, all the kinder hearted,
To Edinburgh gone, or coacht or carted."

'All of them very estimable men; a circumstance which makes it the more surprising, that they should have countenanced the singularly oppressive proceedings which were adopted against the printer of this meur j'en d'esprit. One of the severest things in it was an insinuation that Dr. Webster, who was much in the confidence of the town council, and its right hand in all the public improvements then going on, had cost the city more claret than would float a seventy-four! These might be some exaggeration in the estimate, but as no one ever doubted this reverend doctor's love for claret, of which, even to this day, the people of Edinburgh preserve many amusing recollections, it was rather too bad to take a poor satirist to task for a mere over-measurement.

'Let us hope, that the reverend doctor himself had no active share in this ignominious prosecution; he was himself a poet of no mean pretensions; and, at his death, in the 76th year of his age, left behind him a character distinguished for liberality and benevolence. Hitherto, Dr. Webster has been little, if at all, known in the light of a poet, and his claims to that character rest, it is believed, on a single piece, which Pinkerton has printed in his Select Scottish Ballads, vol. ii. no. 33, without being aware of the name of the author. It is a piece, however, of rare merit; in elegance and warmth, it rivals even the effusions of Catullus. It was written in allusion to a real event—his own marriage to a lady of noble family. The following is the introductory stanza:—
'Oh! how could I venture to love one like thee,
And you not despise a poor contempt like me?
On lords, thy admirers, could look wif' disdain,
And knew I was nothing, yet pitied my pain.
You said, while they teas'd you with nonsense and dress,
'When real the passion the vanity's less.'
You saw through that silence which others despise,
And, while beaux were a-talking, read love in my eyes."

and several other eminent whig characters. A prosecution was instituted against him before the magistrates, that is, before the very individuals who were themselves among the parties satirized and complaining. The judgment was such as might be expected from irritated men deciding in their own cause. They found that "the poem contained many scandalous, seditious, calumnious, and malicious expressions;" and they therefore ordered the printer, Robert Drummond, "to be carried to prison, and thence, on the 25th of November, betwixt the hours of twelve and one, to the cross of Edinburgh, there to stand bare-headed with a label on his breast, inscribed thus: "For printing and publishing a false, scandalous, and defamatory libel;" till all the copies seized of the poem should be burnt by the hangman; then to lie in prison till he should give bond to remove out of the city and liberties, and not to return for a year, on pain of 100*l.* sterling, and suffering imprisonment till the remainder of the year was run, and to be deprived of the privileges of a freeman for a year." An application was made to the court of justice for an alteration of this unjust and cruel sentence, but without effect. Poor Drummond underwent the whole punishment awarded; his printing office was shut up; and his workmen, of whom he had employed a considerable number, were thrown idle on the town.

Among the works which Drummond had most recently printed, was the edition of the Gentle Shepherd. While it was passing through the hands of his compositors, they had committed to memory some of its most striking scenes, which they used to take pleasure in reciting among themselves; and now that they were deprived of employment by the ruin of their master, the idea happily struck them of attempting a public representation of the comedy for their common benefit. The manager of the theatre then situated in the Canongate, readily agreed to give them the use of his stage; and the great body of the public, comprehending especially the middling and lower classes, hitherto the most adverse to theatrical representations, were induced, from compassion for the fate of Drummond and his men, the victims of power, to suspend their prejudices for a moment, and to regard the humble attempt with that silent acquiescence, which, by leaving the young and gay-hearted to follow their inclinations, had all the effect of a more open encouragement. On the first performance of the opera, the house was crowded in every part; and it was repeated several successive nights to such numerous audiences, that tiers of benches were erected upon the stage to accommodate the overflow. The distresses of the suffering printers were thus in a great measure relieved; but a more general and lasting advantage, derived from these representations, was the cessation of that rooted antipathy which a religious people, still warm with convert zeal, had, till now, persisted in maintaining towards the entertainments of the stage. The multitude being thus dragged, as it were, by sympathy for oppressed merit, to the interdicted regions of pleasure, were induced "to taste the forbidden fruit, and, pleased with the relish, they fed plentifully. Finding themselves not poisoned by the sweets, they returned to the feast with an increased appetite, and brought with them fresh guests to partake of the enticing fare."

It is generally known that Home, the author of "Douglas," incurred the censure of the Scotch presbytery, for being what Mrs. Inchbald a few years ago justly called him, "the only living author of a living tragedy." The following anecdote is, however, new to us:—

"The presbytery of Haddington, to which Mr. Home himself belonged, sent him a citation to appear before it, to answer for the great scandal which he had been the means of bringing on the sacred order; and that of Dalkeith gave a similar summons to one of his most intimate friends and inveterate admirers, Mr. Carlyle of Inveresk. Neither presbytery, however, proceeded to judgment, but referred the cases of both gentlemen to the general synod of Lothian and Tweeddale. A want of form in the reference of Mr. Home's case, caused it to be remitted back to the presbytery of Haddington; and on that of Mr. Carlyle alone, the synod were called to pronounce judgment. Mr. Home, on this occasion, showed great spirit in defence of his persecuted friend. He attended in his place as a member of the synod, and spoke warmly in his vindication. He declared, that if there were any fault, it lay not at the door of the accused, but at his own, with whom the crime had originated; and concluded his observations in the words of the unfortunate Nisus:—

"*Adam qui feci; in me convertite ferrum.
Tantum infelicem misium delexit amicum.*"

—VIRGIL.

"Me, me, he cried, turn all your rage alone On me; the fact confess'd, the fault my own; His only crime (if friendship could offend) Is too much love for his unhappy friend."

—DRYDEN.

"The energy of this appeal is said to have made a sensible impression on the members of the synod, and to have had the effect of greatly mitigating the sentence which they were at first disposed to pass on Mr. Carlyle, on whom, next to Home himself, the wrath of the religious world was chiefly turned. They contented themselves with declaring, "their high displeasure with Mr. Carlyle, for the step he had taken in going to the theatre, and strictly enjoined him to abstain therefrom in time coming."

But what pleases us most in the whole volume, is the vindication of the moral character of Burns. Although

Burns is now be-praised and be-mourned, yet his neglect will long be a reproach to Scotland; and that neglect becomes much aggravated when it is defended on the score of the poet's immorality. His present biographer has, however, vindicated this great poet and amiable man, with spirit, elegance, and ability. He says,—

"It has been said, and too often repeated, that Burns, during his latter years,—nay, from the very moment of entering into society—gave himself up to habits of intemperance, and died its victim. How little to be envied are the feelings of those who can take pleasure in drawing aside the veil from the social follies or weaknesses of such a man as Burns! Were the fact even as represented, does it become that country which so cruelly neglected him, to speak with severity of any alleviation which his wounded spirit may have sought from the state of humiliation and misery to which he was ungenerously consigned? Does it become those who imposed upon him one of "the meanest of pursuits," and an association with "the lowest of mankind," to talk of the excesses to which he may have fled, to toll, for the moment, the revolting sense of his degradation? But the fact has been misstated. Burns was never the dissolute man that he has been represented. He mingled much in society, because it was the only sphere in which he could gratify that strong, and certainly not injurious, passion which he possessed for observing the ways and manners of men; and because the active indulgence of this passion was the only chance which he had of escape from that constitutional melancholy which never ceased to pursue him. He was fond too, most enthusiastically fond, of the social hour which was spent in communion with men of souls congenial to his own; and, when seated with such over the flowing bowl, it is not to be wondered, that he was sometimes slow to rise. Yet, whatever might be the social pleasures of Burns, he was never the man to sacrifice to them either his business, his independence, or his self respect. The supervisors of his conduct, as an officer, testify, that he performed all the duties of his situation with exemplary regularity; the state of his affairs, at his death, shew, that small as his income was, he kept rigidly within it; and his most intimate associates allow, that, however freely he may have partaken in company, he never sank into habits of solitary indulgence. It is not possible, either morally or physically, that the man who was thus regular, thus economical, thus privately abstinent, could have been the habitual slave of intemperance which some writers would have us to believe. That his constitution, naturally delicate, may have been unequal to even the limited indulgences which he permitted himself, and that his death may have been hastened by them, is but too likely. But how much does it not add to his con-try's shame, that possessing a man of genius, whose loss they could never repair, who could only have lived long, by living with exceeding temperance, that he was not placed in a situation where the comforts of life, the refinements of elegant society, and pursuits of a literary nature, might have removed every temptation to live otherwise than the good of his health demanded. Burns, as he tells us, lived only "for the heart of the man and the fancy of the poet;" he could not exist without a plenitude of emotions; and it was not his fault, that he was forced to seek them where alone he could find them.

It is deeply to be regretted, that his amiable biographer, Dr. Currie, should, by lending too open an ear to idle rumours, have contributed more than even the most professed enemy could have done, to give currency to the prejudices which have prevailed with respect to Burns's private habits. Dr. C. appears evidently to have been much fortified in his erroneous impression, by the extravagant warmth with which Burns, in the course of his works, frequently breaks out in praise of our Scottish vin du pays; as, for example, when he exclaims:—

'O whisky! soul o' plays an' pranks!
Accept a bardie's humble thanks!
When wanting thee, what timeless cranks
Are my poor verses.

Or, when he speaks of drinking a health—
— in add Nannie Tinnock's,
Nine times a week!

It seems, unfortunately, not to have occurred to Dr. C. that nothing is more common with poets, than to support an ideal character in their writings, very opposite to what they possess in real life; and that as Thomson has sung an Amanda whom he never saw, it was as possible the Nannie Tinnock of Burns might be a hostess who never knew him as a guest. Nor would the supposition have led him far from the real fact. When the first edition of Burns's poems issued from the Kilmarnock press, Nannie Tinnock, to whom he alluded, and who kept a public-house in the village of Mauchline, being congratulated on the conspicuous figure which she made in the poet's recollections, the good woman shook her head and said, that "the chiel had scarcely ever spent a shilling in her house."

We now conclude with a treat,—a song by Burns, not printed in any edition of his works, but which was transmitted by the poet to the Star newspaper, in 1790, and buried, like many other treasures, in the columns of a daily paper, until dragged forth by the industry of Burns's last and best biographer, the author of the memoir before us:—

'DELIA.

Fair the face of orient day,
Fair the tint of op'ning rose;
But fairer still my Delia dawns,
More lovely far her beauty shows.

Sweet the lark's wild warbled lay,
Sweet the trinkling rill to hear;
But Delia, more delightful still,
Steal thine accents on mine ear.

The flower-samour'd busy bee
The rosy banquet loves to sip;
Sweet the streamlet's limpid lapse
To the sun-brown'd Arab's lip.

But Delia, on thy balmy lips
Let me, no vagrant insect, rove;
O! let me steal one liquid kiss
For oh! my soul is parch'd with love.

This elegant little work has pleased us so much, that we eagerly look forward to the succeeding numbers, confident that if they are executed with equal ability and good taste, the whole will form the best biographical collection that has yet appeared. The part is embellished with a group of five portraits, elegantly engraved.

Italy. By Lady Morgan.

THE second volume commences with Tuscany, and contains an interesting account of the public edifices, in Florence, of which Santa Maria del Fiore, the Duomo, is one of the most prominent. It was commenced in 1298, under the direction of Cimabue, and the successive genius of a hundred and fifty years went to its completion. Its cupola, a miracle of art for any age, was the admiration and almost the despair of Michael Angelo, who declared that art could scarcely imitate, not rival it:—

'The Duomo, vast, ancient, and imposing within, is richly cast with marble without. Near to its ponderous mass, but isolated and unparalleled, the campanile, or belfry, raises its elegant and slender form above all praise, as beyond all description. This gem of architecture, which scarcely belongs to any order, and yet combines the perfection of art, was deemed by the Imperial Charles the Fifth, too precious for public exposition, too exquisite for the plebeian admiration of a republican city. He was wont to say, "it should be preserved in an écluse," and in fact it has the air of a beautiful toy, and looks equally suited to a lady's cabinet, as to the mighty edifice to which it belongs. The campanile is a tower two hundred and fifty-two Italian feet in height, incrustated with precious marbles, worked into the most beautiful groupings, the perfection of sculpture; and yet this work was produced ere sculpture had a school or drawing academy,—when nature gave rules, and patronage lay in the approbation of a free people; for it is the work of Giotto, a peasant, who left his herd in the valley of Vespignano, to labour in the under studio of Cimabue, to become the friend of Dante and of Petrarch, and to die in Florence, full of years, of glory, and of wealth; sung by the first of her poets, and revered by the best of her citizens.'

In the church of Saint Lorenzo, there are several monuments to the memory of the Medici family, by Michael Angelo:—

'The first is a sarcophagus; and on either side are two colossal figures, called Day and Night. This singular monument seems to have no reference whatever to the insignificant subject, to perpetuate whose memory it was raised. Michael Angelo probably thought not of him. He may just then have had some glorious type in his own mind, and seized on the occasion thus presented by pride and wealth for realizing it. The figure of Day almost moves in the marble; there is a bold, rude, restless vigour in every limb and muscle, that gives it a vital character; and yet, powerful and magnificent as it is, the petulance of a genius that could not brook the inadequacy of human force to realize its inspirations, did not permit Michael Angelo to finish it. The splendid works which he left behind him incomplete, seem to indicate that he expected to have called forth perfection by a blow or a breath; and he flung away the chisel of the artist, when he could not direct it with the creative energy of a god. The figure of Night looks like sorrow that slumbers. Vasari has called it "Statua non rara, ma unica." Four beautiful lines," indicating its merits, were written under it, and called forth an answer by Michael Angelo, in the character of Night, which, besides being exquisitely poetical, have a latent strain of plaintive patriotism that give them a two-fold interest.'

The library at Florence, built and finished by the present duke, who, though brother to the Emperor of Austria, is not such a foe to learning, contains forty-two thousand volumes, the principal of which are modern works, and include many in English.

The hall of the Capponi Palace is remarkable for its walls, on which are painted three pictures, representing events in the lives of the patriots of that illustrious house:—

'The most interesting and the best executed of these, is the famous scene between Pietro Capponi and Charles the Eighth of France. The King, after various successes in Italy, (to which he was called by the usurper Lodovico Sforza,) entered Florence with royal pomp and an immense military force, and took up his quarters in the Casa Medici, where he

'La morte che tu vedi in sì dolci atti
Dormire fu da un Angelo scolpita
In questo sasso; e perché dorme, ha vita;
Destala se no l'credi, e parlarli.

† 'Grazo m'è il sonno, e più l'esser di sasso
Mentre che il danno e la vergogna dura,
Non veder, non sentir m'è gran ventura,
Però non mi destar: del! parlo basso.

assumed the tone of the conqueror of Tuscany. Four of the principal citizens were sent to treat with him, one of whom was Pietro Capponi. But scarcely had the royal secretary begun to read aloud the insulting terms of the capitulation, when the deputies showed signs of indignation and impatience, and the haughty monarch, starting up, exclaimed, that he would "sound the trumpets forthwith." Then Pietro Capponi snatched the treaty from the secretary's hands, and tearing it in pieces, replied, in noble language, but in bad French, "à vous trompette, à moi cloche;" and turning his back on the King, went forth followed by his fellow citizens, to ring to arms, and to oppose the energy of free citizens to the military force of a barbarous invader. This act of Capponi, perilous and imprudent as it was heroic, saved the city. The inhabitants made their own terms, and Charles marched peaceably out of Florence." The painter has chosen the moment when Capponi tears the paper from the hands of the secretary, whose astonishment, as well as that of the courtiers, and the stilled rage of the King, are well expressed."

In an account of the Florentine Gallery, there is an interesting anecdote of Michael Angelo. The precious antiquities accumulated in the courts and gardens of the Casa Medici, by Lorenzo the Magnificent, and the permission he allowed to the artists of Florence, to study and work from such perfect models, rendered his domestic residence a sort of public studio:—

"A youth who had engaged to work in the shop of Ghirlandajo, the painter, for three years, for the sum of twenty florins, came like others, to see these prodigies of antiquity, and from that moment the work-shop of Ghirlandajo was abandoned. One of the sculptors, struck by the assiduity of the clever boy, provided him with some materials to try his hand on. He began to copy the mutilated head of a faun; he made good its deficiencies, and produced a miracle. He was still occupied in finishing it, when a person sauntering in the gardens, stopped to consider the work and the artist, and was struck by the perfection of the first by the youth of the second. He begged the lad from his father, and assigned him a place at his table, and an apartment in his house. This host was Lorenzo the Magnificent: the boy was Michael Angelo! and the head of the faun is among the treasures of the gallery of Florence."

At the period of the French invasion, there stood at the head of the gallery and the arts of Florence, one whose enthusiastic love of both still following proud but punning allusion to this act of heroism:—

"Lo strepito delle arme e dei cavalli,
Non potea fare che non fosse sentito
La voce d'un Capponi fra tanti Galli."

makes the subject of many a pleasant anecdote in the Florentine circles, the Cavaliere Puccini:—

"Of this arduous director of the Museum, and zealous guardian of the Venus de Medicis, the Hesperian dragon "was but a type;" one object only had ever divided his passion for the Fine Arts, and that was his taste for the gastronomic ones. Torn by contending inclinations towards his cabinet and the kitchen, he is said to have habitually confounded the phraseology of both,—to have talked of the Venus as a cosa da mangiare, and of mouton à la braise, as being of the true French school. Pointing out the best pictures of the gallery one day, to a Roman gentleman, in his usual strain of culinary criticism, he observed of one, "Come questo quadro è butirroso," how buttery this picture is! of another, "Come è midolloso," (how full of marrow is this,) "If you say another word," interrupted the virtuoso, licking his lips; "I shall eat them."

Lady Morgan accuses Mr. Acton, an Englishman and minister to the King of Naples, of transferring the Venus de Medicis from the custody of his master, to whom it had been consigned by Puccini, to France, and she speaks in very severe terms of this gentleman, whose name she devotes to national execration. She is equally severe on the last remains of the House of Stuart.

"Cardinal York," she says, "has left a wretched character behind him; he is said to have been feeble, sordid, and bigoted; his brother, the Pretender, was 'a legitimate sot, who lived in a perpetual state of inebriety,' and the whole race of Stuarts, from the time of James the First of England, 'the most degenerating and degenerated royal stock of Europe.' These are sweeping assertions, but her ladyship never sticks at trifles when she wishes to be abusive. We pass over the historic sketch of Tuscany, and a sensible article on literary disputes in Italy, in order to attend our fair author on her route to the 'Queen of Cities.' The abbey of the Cassinensi, in Arezzo, contains the chef d'œuvre of Vasari, painted in fresco, on the walls of the refectory:—

"The subject is the feast of Ahasuerus, called in the list of that painter's works, 'Il Convito d'Assuero.' Vasari, according to the fashion of the day, has introduced himself among the courtly group of the Persian king. His handsome face is distinguishable by a long auburn beard. He has also preserved the portrait of one of the brothers of the order, whom tradition reports to have annoyed him much with idle questions, while he was painting. His manner of drawing the monk, a short, fat, apoplectic figure, is very ingenious."

He had just painted a crystal vase of water, when this padre seccatore entered the refectory. As he waddled towards Vasari, brim full of new impertinencies, the arch painter stretched his bulky reflection on the vase; and there it remains: for the monks, who loved a joke, (as well they might, the jolly rogues!) would not suffer it to be defaced, in spite of the complaints of their caricatured brother."

Rome has been so often and so ably described by preceding travellers, that we were not surprised at Lady Morgan's account of it presenting the least novelty of any portion of her work; we shall, therefore, only make a few extracts, the first relating to one of the theatres:—

"A play bill, fastened to the broken trunk of Pasquin, seduced us, by its tempting programme, to visit the Teatro della Pace, resorted to by the people exclusively, and into whose smoky and time-stricken sal de spectacle, few English but ourselves had penetrated. The announcement for the evening promised "Moses," which was asserted to be cosa sopra e stupenda, with a comedy and farce, a monve da ridere (to make you die with laughter). I think our box cost two pauls, and a few baiocchi (halfpence), placed our servant in the pit. For this moderate price, we saw the Jews fed with manna, an interlude, extremely well acted, and a farce, which perfectly fulfilled the promise of the play-bill; for Policinello was the irresistibly comic hero of the piece, which turned in some of its scenes on the ridicule of academies. The exquisite gravity with which Policinello took his place in the poetic circle, the absurdly ludicrous dress he wore, his impatience to seize on every moment of silence, with "adezzo tocca a me" (it's my turn now), to read a canzone, whose length was the counter part of Leporello's catalogue, combined to form a farcical scene of the richest humour; but no one who had not been present at the "real original" of this representation, and witnessed the doggedness with which the sonnetteers there pour forth their endless succession of plattitudes, could comprehend the convulsive roar of laughter it occasioned. The most exquisite part of the theatre was the audience, composed of what an English government newspaper would call wretches, ruffians, the scum of society—the people. Every box was crowded, and every group was a picture worthy of a Wouvermann or a Teniers. The trasteverini were numerous, and as remarkable by their dress, as by their bold, fierce, wise, dark countenances. Among the women, the different costume of the different quarters of Rome was strikingly conspicuous; but still more conspicuous was the marked countenances; their varying and delighted expressions; their keen sensibility to humour, and their loud and boisterous testimony of applause. They shouted, screamed, and mingled their bravos and bravissimos with "gran bella cosa," "cosa superba," "cosa stupenda." Meantime, the most amiable familiarity subsisted between that part of the audience nearest the stage and the performers. The prompter, with his head popped over the stage lights, talked to the girls in the pit; the violinello flirted with a handsome trasterverina in the boxes; and a lady in the stage-box blew out the lamplighter's candle as often as he attempted to light it, to the infinite amusement of the audience, who loudly applauded her dexterity. With an economy duly practised at Rome by all classes, the musicians, when they had done playing between the several acts, extinguished their candles, put them in their pockets, and joined the audience in the front of the house. In justice, however, to La Pace, it must not be concealed, that the same economical custom prevails in many theatres, not of the very first order throughout Italy.

A visit to the Palace of the Princess Pauline Borghese, introduces an anecdote of the mother of Napoleon:—

'Shortly after Bonaparte's elevation to the imperial throne, meeting his mother in the gardens of St. Cloud, half playfully, half seriously, he held his hand to her to kiss. She flung it back indignantly, and presenting her own in presence of his suite, said, "C'est à vous à baiser la main de celle qui vous a donné la vie." We observed the pictures of all her handsome children, in the room she occupied, (and where we generally found her spinning, with her prayer-book beside her;) there were four of them kings when they sat for her, with the emperor, their brother, at their head; viz. the Kings of Spain, Holland, Westphalia, and Naples, (her son-in-law, Murat.) "You see," she said, one day as I was looking on Napoleon's picture, "when my son Bonaparte [were not all her sons Bonapartes?] sat for me, I made him lay aside his crown;" which was the case.'

From Rome, Lady Morgan went to Naples, and one of her first visits was to the Royal Palace at Portici, formerly the residence of the wife of Murat. She vindicates this lady from the charge of plundering Naples, as she left the palaces superbly furnished with plate, pictures, &c.:—

'The apartments of the Ex-Queen are models of elegance and feminine taste. The bed-room, dressing-room, boudoir, and library, are eminently so; and have been left precisely as she last occupied them. Her dressing-boxes are on the toilette; a miniature of her nephew, the little Napoleon (hung by a ribbon), decorates the chimney-piece; her déjeuner, on an English tray, stands in the centre of the room; and some pretty étrennes (worked and embroidered for her by her ladies, a few days before her reverses), are scattered on a sofa. "Niente cangiato," said the Cicerone, "except this" (and she approached her magnificent bed, and pointed to two large black crucifixes, and a pendent vase of holy water hung at its head). "Non è quella una moda Francese." On the king and his wife sleeping one night at Portici, these sacred images were hung up for the occasion. In the dressing-room, all the necessities for the toilette, in crystal and silver, still remain; even some silver brushes, lying where the femme-de-chambre of the late fair inhabitant had left them. It is said, that Madame Murat carried even to affectation her determination of not removing any thing that belonged to her royal estate, and took only what she considered personal and private property. Portici was her favourite residence, and the numerous English and Irish nobility, whom she received there, can vouch for the courtesy and hospitality with which she did the honours of the palace.

'Murat's apartments join his wife's; they were equally luxurious, splendid, and commodious: the hangings all silk and satin; the carpets all English and Turkey; the toilette splendid and recherchee, as that of the vainest petite maitresse or royal beauty. Close to this superb sleeping-room is a simple little cabinet, with a small white dimity camp-bed, where his secretary slept. Here in this little bed of the ex-secretary sleeps the Royal Bourbon—the legitimate King of Naples, when he makes his visits to Portici. It is said, that he walks about the palace in endless amusement, admiring all the elegant finery of which he has become the master; but still adhering to the little dimity bed, which resembles his own homely bed-room, in his palace at Naples. He has added nothing but a large crucifix.

Venice is the last place of which Lady Morgan gives any account; in her route to it from Foligno, she stopped at Senigaglia, and inquired of the waiter at the inn, if the town had produced any celebrated public singers:—

'He paused to recollect, and then coolly replied, as he changed a plate, "Sì, Signora, una certa Catalini, et altri." (Yes, Ma'am, a certain Catalini and others.) The house of Catalini's father, who was a humble tradesman, stands at a short distance from the inn. She had been early in life adopted by some ladies of Senigaglia, who placed her in a musical seminary, from whence she went forth to associate with emperors and kings; while at home, like all other prophets, she is still "una certa Catalini!"

We have now patiently gone through Lady Morgan's Italy, and we are more than ever convinced of her incompetency to write on such subjects as she has here discussed. Of the state of society in Italy she knows nothing, or, at least, has communicated nothing, that has not been often and much better detailed by preceding travellers. Her classical knowledge is excessively limited, and yet she has the hardihood to sneer at Eustace. Of the fine arts, she knows comparatively nothing, and yet she passes judgment on the matchless treasures of Italy, as confidently and as flippantly as if she were discussing the merits of a frill or a tippet. Her political prejudices alone would be sufficient to throw suspicion on every statement in which they can be supposed to have the slightest influence. Against legitimate princes, she wages a motley war; and the very word legitimate, in her vocabulary, is synonymous with every thing that is infamous; while of Bonaparte and his friends, she is an ardent admirer. With her, Murat is 'a kind-hearted man;' and so far from the French revolutionary army plundering Rome, as has been always stated, she tells us, that 'the soldiers bought white gloves to visit the galleries of the Vatican!' In our notice of the first volume, last week, we stated, that her ladyship was tolerably sparing of Italian; her knowledge of the language, however, appears to have increased as she proceeded, and the second volume is a strange mixture of English, French, and Italian. For the consolation of those not well acquainted with the last two languages, we ought to state, that an ordinary vocabulary will give all the information necessary. When we consider the self-importance of Lady Morgan, and the pompous manner in which her work has been ushered into the world, we feel fully convinced of the truth of one of her observations, that, 'whoever has wandered far and seen much, has learned to distrust the promises of books.'

The Evils of Education, elucidated in a Letter to Henry Barker, Esq. M. P.
By St. John Burke. 8vo. pp. 47.
London, 1821.

ALTHOUGH the character of an author is not to be taken into account in estimating the merits of his work, yet we confess we should like to know something of this St. John Burke, (if there be such an individual,) were it only to decide whether we should consign him to the pity or the execration of mankind. To suppose him a maniac is charitable, but the worst maniac that St. Luke's or Old or New Bethlehem ever contained within their walls, was a rational being compared to the infuriate madman whose ravings stretch over nearly fifty octavo pages. We are aware that many sensible men entertain doubts as to the advantages, in a political point of view, which society may derive from universal education; the subject is a fair one for discussion; but what shall we think of a man who comes with the prejudices of St. John Burke, and declares that 'among the disguised enemies of human happiness, education is the most remarkable and the most formidable,—the subtlest serpent with the loftiest crest.—Education,' says this wise-acre, 'like gems of great value and fine polish, ought to be found only where it can appear with adequate grace and dignity, as the personal property of princes, or the princely gift of courtly bards and secretaries;' and that 'beyond the battlements of the castle, without the limits of the privileged mansion, the rudest trace of letters ought never to be found. If,' adds he, 'education were as difficult of access as turtle, claret, and venison, I should feel no alarm; but when it has become cheaper than the beverage of porters, the fears of the wise are as great as they are just.' These, however, form but a small portion of the 'evils of education,' which, by 'unsettling the faith of men, would destroy at once their honesty and their happiness; they would neither pay their debts nor enjoy their food; they would cheat and steal and murder, and when brought to justice and punishment, they would refuse to be comforted, for no heaven remained for their faith.' All this would appear to be strongly contrasted by a subsequent assertion, were not the author the unblushing advocate of rulers in the 'right divine to govern wrong.' When speaking of the dangers of education in overturning the present system of political power, he says, 'education inspires a pride of sentiment and a love of independence, which will not brook absolute and irresponsible dominion.' We hope so, and we account it one of the strongest eulogies that can be bestowed on education. What an advocate St. John Burke is for 'absolute and irresponsible dominion,' we shall see by and by.

Printing is the next object of attack; it is 'an infernal art,' the invention of which was 'the pouring out of the fourth vial of wrath, for its effect has been to scorch men with the fire of an intensity of light;' and among the vials, he declares he cannot find any curse to be compared with the universal education now proposed to be sanctioned by law:—

'Had the art of printing never been heard of, learning might still be salutary, and education might be praised, without hazarding all we hold dear; but this accursed art has realized far worse evils than all the fabled plagues of Pandora's box. That the devil should have been a party to the invention, is both natural and credible, for no art that was ever practised among men, can be compared to it, for malignity of operation and extent of mischief. By it, books of all kinds and characters become as common as instruments of husbandry, or household furniture; by it, the maxims, the practices, and the peculiar ideas of the refined classes of men, are exposed on the stalls of the poor, vile as rotten mackerel; by it, the sober and innocent streams which flowed through humble vales, and visited lowly cottages, are converted into rivers of wine and torrents of brandy, intoxicating peasants with the insolence of sedition and the violence of treason.'

From printing, he passes on to the circulation of the scriptures, which he condemns on equally sapient grounds; he says, 'that Christianity was not designed by its divine author, for circulation in printed and cheap volumes, must appear evident to the pious, from the fact that Jesus Christ invented not the art of printing!' The reformation, he says, was, perhaps, in some degree necessary, 'but it has occasioned many evils, and none more flagrant than the circulation of the Bible:—

'This hideous evil has been greatly mitigated among us, by the judicious selection of lessons for the service of the church. Did the serious and devout never open their Bibles at home, but wait upon their God only in his courts, we should then be acting like the chosen people of heaven in ancient times; and piety, humility, and submission, would flourish in our land. I acquit our Bible Societies of evil intention, but malignant and extensive beyond measure is the mischief they have done. Compared to them, Paine was a holy patriot, and Cobbett an angel of light. To the general circulation of the Bible, we may fairly ascribe the existence and the pernicious power of such writers.'

There remains but one subject more on which we shall quote St. John Burke; that is his defence of the 'powers that be,' in church and state, in which he is so extravagant, that we have doubted whether he could be serious or not. Education is to him so formidable, that he sees in its progress the destruction of 'thrones, principalities, and powers;' but really were the authorities such as he describes them, education could do nothing better than accelerate their downfall. We take his own account of them:—

'The hostility of education to the ecclesiastical dignity and social wisdom of our church, is supremely alarming.' It is impossible for the imagination of man to conceive any institution more profound in its policy, or more salutary in its power; it is wealthy, without insolence; powerful, without contention; and dignified, without envy. All degrees, orders, and characters of men find, here, their corresponding monitors in holy things; the prince is edified by his companion at the bottle and the dice; the squire, by his competitor on the turf or in the dance; the mechanic, by his model in worldly address and carnal relaxation. While the proudest peer is not above the society of the pampered prelate, the humblest peasant is not below the sympathy of the hungry curate. There is a fitness, an adaptation, in all this, so striking and so suitable as to require no further remark.'

He is a warm advocate of priestly magistrates; but, unfortunately, the very arguments he urges in their favour are sufficient to prove that the magistral and the priestly offices should not be united. He says,—

'In ancient times, the same persons presided over the highest offices of the state and the sacred ceremonies of religion. It is further known from experience, that priestly magistrates, having their judgments directed and their feelings controlled by the holy principles of divinity, are never hampered or misled by the earthly suggestions of humanity. What magistrate, yielding to the impulse of humanity, could have performed the divine part of the Rev. Mr. Chairman Hay, on the 10th of August, 1819? Infinite are the advantages derived from their sanctified zeal against pouchers and parodists, against the murderers of hares and the revilers of dignities. At elections and in all political agitations, they are the very ribs of the state. Without them, the feeble planks and unsupported junctures of the vessel would yield to the slightest storm, and sink in the vortex of revolution. O, that they alone, as in times when the sun of prosperity shone upon our island, were suffered to wield the pen, and to touch the sacred volume!'

A strong recommendation this of priestly magistrates, truly! His defence of the nobility is, however, much worse:—

'Generosity, pride, honour, and might, are the distinguishing attributes of nobility. None can be generous who is obliged to set any bounds to his bounty or his vengeance; none can display pride who is ever exposed to mortification; none can exert the true grandeur of might who can possibly recoil in weakness. Characters thus endowed are truly the Corinthian pillars of the state; men thus magnificent, irresistible, untractable, are the glory of humanity. Is there in existence a being so gross and grovelling as to think that water should always drop

gle through rocky masses, sneak round huge fragments, or steal along the dull plain? Who delights not to see the dashing cataract and the plunging cascade? The rolling flood, sweeping whole villages along in its proud career, is the grandest object in nature. Children may scream, mothers may loudly lament, and the sensitive father may feel a moment's agon, as they are all borne away in the wild impetuosity of the generous element, but they only add to the noble interest of the scene. We feel not for the fish that rises writhing on the hook; we sympathize not with the hare that drops palpitating at the foot of the "nobler hound." Contemptible, therefore, is Pythagorean compassion for vulgar men, women, and children, terminating their laborious life by a momentary visitation of graceful sublimity. Yet what, in point of sublimity and generous power, is the overflowing flood to the dash of cavalry among a linked multitude? What is the washing away of a village to the instantaneous dispersion of one hundred thousand men, women, and children, by a chivalrous corps of yeomanry? What are the falls of Niagara to the onset of Birley? This is the order of nature still. The larger fishes feed upon the smaller; foxes live on chickens and lambs; cats devour mice. It is a senseless error to imagine all men to be of the same species. They are most distinctly two, the ruling and the ruled, the consuming and the productive, the noble and the vulgar, the gay and the sordid,—and for the former to prey upon the latter is as natural, right, and conducive to the general good, as for a cock to peck at a worm. But the worm must not be educated. Delenda est Carthago.

Here we will rest, for although we might go much further, yet, as Jeannie Deans says of a poor creature whose mental aberrations excite no other feeling than pity,—'It were to be as mad as himself to listen to him;' and we ought, perhaps, to apologize for bestowing the slightest notice on a pamphlet which is too ridiculous to be treated seriously, and is so monstrous as to carry with it its own refutation. The letter, as the title states, is addressed to Mr. Banks; perhaps this gentleman will not feel himself much flattered by the distinction, although he is complimented with the epithets of 'most wise and worthy sir,' 'generous and mighty sir,' and is described as 'learned and full of faith.' The conclusion is, however, rather unfortunate.

* This never-to-be-forgotten hero saved Manchester from conflagration, and England from revolution, by the prowess of his arm. Greater than the force of many waters was his pluck, more permanent than the flow of rivers shall be his fame. Semper bonus, nomenque tuum, laudesque manebunt.

nate; the worthy member is told, that as a goose saved Rome, so his voice, 'if mortal voice is destined to avail, must give the alarm and save the state.' 'Prodigious!' as our friend Dominic Sampson would exclaim, were he told that the safety of the state depended on Mr. Banks and St. John Burke. Prodigious! indeed.

MA. WYATT'S MONUMENTAL TROPHY.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—I was very sorry to read, in your hitherto liberally conducted paper, a very ill-natured and unfounded attack on the monumental trophy, in honour of his late Majesty, designed and to be executed by Mr. Matthew Wyatt. Your chief cause of wrath appears to be, that the work has not been laid open to competition. The objection would have reason in it, had there been the least reason to hope, that a better plan than Mr. Wyatt's could be procured; but the honourable committee of noblemen and gentlemen, who have taken the thing in hand, were convinced, in their own minds, that a better was not to be devised, and this being the case, you must confess, that it would have been a great piece of affectation in them to have pretended to advertise for a better. The style in which you criticize Mr. Wyatt's design, shews that you have no taste for the grand in art. Every person qualified to give an opinion on the subject, has pronounced it to be, on the whole, one of the noblest conceptions ever attempted to be embodied in sculpture. But, besides, what injustice would it not be to open a door for depriving Mr. Wyatt of the benefit of his own scheme or invention? It was Mr. Wyatt who proposed the monument; it was Mr. Wyatt who brought the committee together; and it was Mr. Wyatt who, at a vast deal of personal trouble, got up the grand public dinner in honour of the undertaking. And what man of justice or feeling would say, that it would now be a right thing to turn Mr. Wyatt adrift, and give some other person the benefit of the execution of the plan? You say there is nothing in the idea of a monument. The same thing might be said of some of the greatest inventions of which the world is possessed. The most important discoveries always look wonderfully simple after they are known; the merit of finding them out is, however, still the same.

Your's,
PHILO-WYATT*.

The Family Trunk,

No. VII.

BY MOSES VON MUCKLEWIT, GENT.

THE ASS.

AMIDST the multifarious variety of my father's lucubrations, he would occasionally direct his researches to Natural History, and more particularly to that portion of it, which embraces the history and peculiar characteristics of such animals as live upon the most familiar footing with the human race. Hence it was, that he had collected an incredible mass of learning of the most curious interest, relating to dogs, cats, cows, horses, sheep, and the whole tribe of creatures, even the most minute, that are known to frequent the 'haunts of men,' and with the very near familiarity of some of which many people, no doubt, would very gladly dispense. But, be this as it may, it must in conscience be acknowledged, that my father, in the ardour of his inquiries on this subject, had gone a little too far,—farther, perhaps, than his own nice and scrupulous delicacy would, at other times, have allowed him. There are, therefore, a few of his collections in this department of my FAMILY TRUNK, which it behoves me, in filial reverence for his memory, to conceal from all mortal eyes but my own.

Now, of all animals, whose history and attributes my father had thus delighted to discuss, none stood higher in his estimation or had a greater share of his favour than the ass. Not that he had any particular penchant for asses in common, such, I mean, as we are constantly jostling in our ordinary avocations:—it was the genus not the species,—it was the ass of nature, not the ass of the world, that thus engaged my father's fond partiality. And the more was this the case in proportion as he contemplated the unjust and oppressive treatment which this meek and much-calumniated creature had, at all times, experienced,—its very name having, most unwarrantably, passed into a proverbial synonyme of every thing mean and contemptible.

It was to vindicate his unhappy favourite from this load of indignity, that

* We have inserted the above defence of Mr. Wyatt on the same principle that the Earl of Blessington stated the committee to have adopted the plan,—not that it is the best, but because it is the only one that has been offered.—Ed.

my father so humanely took up his cause, with which view he made a voluminous compilation of all the favourable traits which history records of his character. He even went to the extent of uniting, in one digest, all the anecdotes and bon mots that have, at various times, been ascribed to the ass; and at the head of the latter stood his celebrated speech to the prophet Balaam, which, if duly considered in all its bearings, few of this animal's oratorical namesakes, even within the walls of St. Stephen's, have since surpassed.

It cannot be expected, that, within the limits to which I am confined, I should be able to retail even the substance of all my father's curious lucubrations. I shall content myself, therefore, with extracting from them a few of the most important testimonies as to those qualities, which historians, contrary to vulgar misrepresentation, assign to this much abused quadruped. The first that occur, relate to his courage, some extraordinary instances of which are recorded by oriental writers. In Mesopotamia, in particular, it is reported to have been so great, that he was never known to turn his back on the enemy; on which account the very name of this animal carried with it, in popular usage, an idea of human perfection, and was actually borne by one of the Moslem princes of the Ommidan dynasty, as one of his highest honours. In Egypt also, at this very day, the nobleness of this animal's carriage, and the vigour and beauty of his paces, are in such esteem, that he is employed to carry persons of the highest rank, and even the wives of the beys, in preference to the horse himself. But it must here be observed, that the ass has always been more signalized for the qualities now mentioned, in the east than in this part of the world, a circumstance which has been ascribed by some naturalists to the superior warmth and dryness of the oriental countries, and which agrees with Pliny's observation, when he describes the ass as an animal 'frigoris maximè impatiens.' We may, therefore, reasonably conclude, that whatever we find of degeneracy in his disposition, in these colder regions, has been occasioned by his removal from those climates, which alone are congenial with the display of his natural qualities.

Another remarkable particular, relating to this insulted quadruped, is the mysterious and somewhat sacred character he has borne from the most remote times. Hence the old proverb —'An ass carries mysteries,'—which Cornelius Agrippa, of erudite memory, who has written an elaborate panegyric on this animal, refers to the conspicuous part he acted in carrying our Saviour to Jerusalem, and to which divine example it is, perhaps, owing, that the impostor Muhammed is related by some of his biographers to have taken his journey to heaven on an ass. Nor was the apparently sacred character of this animal confined to the christian and muhammedan religions:—for Apuleius has recorded, that he was also admitted to the mysteries of the Egyptian deity, Isis; and his very head, we read, was an object of worship amongst the Nauplians, who held him in grateful veneration, for having first, by browsing their vines, taught them the art of pruning. As a proof of the reverence, in which he was formerly held in the Romish church, it is only necessary to mention the 'Feast of the Ass,' of which a full account is given by Du Cange. From this it appears, that the ceremony was common to several churches in France, and was originally established in commemoration of the Virgin's flight from Egypt. The chief actor in the scene was, on this solemn occasion, caparisoned in the richest style, and on his back was seated a young girl, superbly attired, with an infant in her arms. In this form the ass was led in procession to the altar, where high mass was celebrated with all the pomp and splendour of the popish religion. The ass was also instructed to kneel at the proper periods of the service; a hymn, in every way worthy of the occasion, was chaunted in his praise. Finally, at the conclusion of the ceremony, the priest, in order to confer on the animal all possible honour, dismissed the congregation by braying three times, and received from them in return, instead of the customary responses, a valedictory greeting of the like melodious description.

—Arcades ambo,
Et cantare pares, et respondere parati.

We have already seen the genuine character of the ass vindicated from the imputation of cowardice, to which it has been so long and so unjustly exposed. I shall now adduce an anecdote from among my father's store, which will, I think, prove that this animal's proverbial reputation for stupidity is little short of a gross calumny.—A certain learned professor, but of what country the narrative makes no mention, once undertook to instruct an ass in the Greek tongue within a limited period, upon being allowed a certain stipend for his trouble. Some of my readers, while reflecting upon the ill success which has attended so many modern professors (those of both universities not excepted) in a similar enterprise, may be apt here to exclaim—

Quid dignum tanto feret hic promissor hiat?

However, without stopping to notice this cavil, which would imply that our hero was not a whit wiser than asses in general, I proceed to mention, that the monarch, to whom this proposal was made, took our learned pedagogue at his word, demanding merely, on his own part of the contract, that the said professor should consent to be hanged in the event of his failure. There was, as may well be imagined, something excessively outré, as well as unexpected, in this stipulation; but there was no alternative. Our monarch was one of those facetious characters, yeapt absolute sovereigns, and accordingly insisted on his condition being performed to the very letter:—aut Caesar aut nullus, was to be the fate of the astounded professor. Many a man, in such a desperate dilemma; would have had recourse to the remedy so well known in this happy country; but our preceptor unfortunately was no Englishman, and chose rather to depend upon chances, than rush at once on a disagreeable reality, for which he had so sort of relish, notwithstanding the example of the renowned Cato himself. He accordingly set about his enterprise with becoming earnestness, and with a confidence, that might seem to be inspired by an anticipation of certain success, consoling himself inwardly, however, with the hope, that, before the expiration of the time allotted for the completion of his task, either the king, the ass, or himself might be no more.—What the event was the historian has enviously concealed from us; but, when it is considered that the celebrated Ammonius of Alexandria enrolled the ass among the students of his academy, it may not unreasonably be inferred, that our learned professor succeeded sufficiently to elude the gripe of the executioner, and especially as his pupil is so well known to possess, in an eminent degree, the qualification, which Horace appropriates to Grecians, or, as we should here say, learners of Greek.

—GRASS DEDIT ORE ROTUNDO
Musa loqui.

Who, that hath ever heard the ass in all the majestic energy of his eloquence, will deny him the full praise of vociferating ore rotundo?

I shall merely observe, in addition to these few particulars of my father's favourite quadruped, that his name has, in various countries, been borrowed as a mark of high honour. Besides the case of the Moslem prince, already noticed, one of the first Patrician families of Rome bore the name of Asinaria, and, no doubt, well merited this enviable distinction. More than one illustrious family of Great Britain also, to their infinite credit, quarter the ass's head on their family shield. And so honourable did our hero's panegyrist, Cornelius Agrippa, before cited, deem the appellation, that he has not hesitated to apply it to the holy apostles themselves. Who, after this, shall use the name as a term of obloquy or derision? At least, who shall dare to assert, that the ass of the world is not a far more contemptible creature than the one that browses the thistle?

SONG.

WHEN midnight o'er the azure deep
Spreads wide her silken veil,
And zephyrs light its bosom sweep,
And kiss the shivering sail;
The weary sea-boy o'er the bow,
In musing sadness flows,
And chides the wave that rolls below,
And parts him from his friends.
But should warm fancy o'er his soul
Her magic sweetness shed,
He eyes no more the billow's roll,—
His dangers all have fled.
Sweet prospects in his bosom rise
Of many a future day,
When home again shall bless his eyes,
And love each care repay.

ENIGMA.

I've swam in the water and down thro' the air,
I've a body transparent and round,—
And sometimes I tell you the thoughts of the fair,
Though I never yet utter'd a sound.
The humble in station, by my friendly aid,
Have great riches and honours acquired While some to the prison's dark cells I've betray'd,
Who at length on the gallows expir'd.
I stand by the judge when declaring the laws,
His words pierce the poor criminal's heart;
And, in fact, our courts ne'er decided a cause
In which I have not taken a part.
In the senate, where eloquence brilliantly flows,
I have always secured a seat;
And in the old attics where poets repose,
With me you may constantly meet.
In forming of riddles I'm frequently used,
And perhaps it will not be amiss,
In order that you may be better amused,
To declare that I helped to make this.

GIVE THE SPRING A CHORUS.

Now the mowers cut the grass,
And the crop is tending;
Now the clouds in splendour pass,
And the leaves are spreading.
Young and lovely,—old and grey,
Give to Spring a chorus;
Dance your hearty roundelay—
Summer is before us!
Fruits are ripening on their trees,
And the swallows diving;
Flocks with lambs in pastoral ease,—
Insects skill contriving;
Waters near their shady hues,
Skies are blue before us,—
And, since this is Summer's news,
Give to Spring a chorus! J. R. P.

SONNET TO HOPE.

In anticipation of Parting.
To live from now, best loved of all her kind,
To bear a dreary distance, measured space,
Stretching its length beyond the strong eye's trace!
Ah! thought distressful; come, thou solace, bid
These breaking heartstrings; come, sweet
Hope! efface
Each anxious fear, and calm the troubled mind,
Which, losing thee, can no true comfort find.
One cheering beam can speedily dispel
The heaviest gloom that shades the darkest hour;
So, when two voices falter with farewell,
Do thou thy most delicious influence pour;
Blend with the future memory of the past;
Sweeten the fond embrace; the kiss, the warmest and the last! L.

Fine Arts.

ROYAL ACADEMY.

WE have always considered the Model Academy, if not the most interesting, at least the most original part of the exhibition at Somerset House, and we hurry with pleasure from the host of unmeaning faces have puzzled the painter's skill, to have a peep at the animated productions of a Chantrey. This great sculptor, for so he really is, has no fewer than eight busts in the exhibition: Among these, the most prominent, both in point of execution and the celebrity of the individuals, must be placed those of Sir Walter Scott, the Marquis of Londonderry, and Mr. Wordsworth.

No. 1133, 'The Bust of Sir Walter Scott,' would alone stamp the character of Chantrey as a sculptor. He really seems to have been inspired with his subject, and has made the poet of chivalry and of nature live in marble. No one can look on this bust without feeling that it is one of no ordinary individual. It possesses an eye of romantic and intellectual observation, and the whole countenance is expressive of vigorous original genius. It is the test and proof of genius to rise with the subject, and this Chantrey always does, but never more strikingly than in the present instance.

No. 1132, 'The Bust of the Marquis of Londonderry,' is a splendid effort of art. The person and the countenance of his lordship are highly favourable to the sculptor, and so happily have these been represented, that we should almost have thought his lordship had been modelled while engaged in an animated debate in Parliament, instead of when quietly sitting in Mr. Chantrey's studio. The fine manly features of this statesman beam with life and intelligence. The flesh, the hair, and the draperies, are all as distinctly marked in the marble as they could have been by the painter. This is an effort of art in which Chantrey is unrivalled. In point of delicacy of execution, this bust is superior to any thing of modern times.

No. 1134, 'The Bust of W. Wordsworth, Esq.' The countenance of the Lake Poet is rather of a reflective than an observing character, more expressive of philosophic contemplation than vigour of imagination. The profile is not unlike that of Locke, but with less intensity of mind and dignity of aspect. The bust is remarkable for truth of conception, fidelity of outline, and simplicity of execution.

Nos. 1126, 1128, 1131, 1136, and 1139, are well-executed busts by the same artist, of the Hon. Walter Charteris; Mr. Phillips, R. A. a very spirited head; a gentleman; the Bishop of Rochester; and Sir Anthony Hammond. All these bespeak the skill of a master, but they do not call for particular observation.

Westmacott has only two subjects in the exhibition, No. 1084, 'Resignation,' a statue in marble, which, though a work of considerable merit, both as to conception and execution, does not please us so much as one on the same subject by Flaxman, generally known by the name of 'Thy Will be Done,' a sentiment so beautifully expressed.

No. 1085, 'A Hindoo Girl,' a statue in marble, being part of a monument to be erected at Calcutta, in memory of A. Colvin, Esq. This is an excellent performance, by Westmacott, who has imparted great interest to the figure of the girl, whose simplicity of character, and natural attitude, are well expressed.

No. 1086, 'Caledon and Amelia,' groupe in marble: C. Rossi, R. A. This is the best production in the poetic department in the academy. The moment chosen is very judicious. It is when the ill-fated maiden hears, in the dreadful voice of the storm, her untimely summons to the grave, and when—

'In vain assuming love, and confidence
In Heaven, repress'd her fear; it grew and shook
Her frame near dissolution.'

To portray such a scene is a task of great difficulty; but the artist has surmounted it, and the story is so told that it is impossible to mistake it; the moral beauty is exquisite; the purity, fondness, and shrinking timidity of this 'stranger to offence and inward storm,' is most happily represented, by giving to this part of the marble the most tremulous and sensitive expression, while the violence of the storm is described with equal felicity in its effect on the drapery. The confidence and manly assurance of the lover, who finds his safety to be near his love, and 'thus to clasp perfection,' is given with an elevation of feeling which approaches to the sublime. The execution of the whole is full of spirit, freedom, and delicacy.

No. 1017. 'Medallion Portrait of Captain Cartwright, R. N.' G. Mills. On seeing this portrait, we were surprised to recognize an admirable likeness of the venerable father of reform, as he has been whimsically enough called, Major Cartwright. As we could contemplate the copy with less uneasiness than the original, and without the pounce of hearing a long speech, we could not but remark the firmness of character and calm enthusiasm which the face indicates.

Not 1089. 'Temptation;' L. A. Goblet: has nothing tempting about it.

No. 1092. 'Telemachus and Hippas;' J. Buck. There is a great deal of vigour in these figures, without a very strict attention to anatomical correctness.

No. 1104. 'Bust of the Rev. Dr. Parr;' G. Clarke,—is very much like the worthy Grecian; and, therefore, not the most pleasing object of contemplation.

No. 1105. 'Colossal Bust of the Rt. Hon. H. Gtattan;' C. More,—is a very animated likeness of that animating senator.

No. 1110,—is another excellent bust of the same individual, by Turnerelli.

No. 1113. 'Bust of Lady Caroline Lamb;' F. Turnerelli,—is more remarkable for vigour and spirit than feminine delicacy.

No. 1125. 'Bust of the Right Hon. George Canning;' W. Spence. This distinguished statesman should apply for an injunction, to prevent his expressive countenance from being caricatured, as it is in the present instance.

No. 1150. 'Bust of Charles Phillips, Esq.;' C. Moor. A very rational looking face, and yet very like the 'celebrated Irish barrister,' who, we understand, is now ready and willing to display his oratorical talents in the English law courts. We wish him employment and success.

No. 1152. 'Night producing Æther and the Day: the agony of Hesiod;' J. E. Hinchcliff. This is an attempt to embody a very difficult subject; and, although we cannot say it is quite successful, yet the group is graceful, and displays much genius as well as good taste.

Nos. 1153. 'Sisyphus;' a sketch; 1153. A 'Faun;' and 1154. 'David rescuing the Lamb from the Lion;' J. Gott,—are all very creditable productions.

No. 1155. 'Benevolence;' part of a monument now erecting in memory of the late Archibald Seton, Esq., at Calcutta; J. Bacon. This is the only production that this artist has contributed; it, however, does him much credit, as he has been very successful in representing this god-like virtue.

No. 1164. 'Model of his late Majesty George the Third;' R. G. Freebairn. We do not envy either the taste or the feelings of those who seek to perpetuate the recollection of the afflicting malady under which our venerable sovereign so long laboured, by representing him like an old Jew or a hermit. This has been often done in prints, and we have turned from them with disgust; and we wish that the talents of Mr. Freebairn had been more worthily employed.

NEW HAYMARKET THEATRE.

Among the improvements at the court end of the town, and immediately in the vicinity of Carlton Palace, now stands conspicuously ornamental, the New Theatre Royal, in the Haymarket. It is an elegant tasteful structure, with a noble portico, sustained by five lofty pillars, of the Corinthian order of architecture. Without side the portico, at each extremity, are the gallery doors; within are five other doors, opening to the pit, boxes, and box-office, surmounted by five windows, which open into the saloon. Over the portico, is a frame of circular windows, which give light to the galleries and upper parts of the house. The whole frontage is stuccoed, in imitation of plain stone, and is unostentatiously neat and elegant.

The entrances to the boxes and pit are far more commodious than they were in the old theatre, and the descent to the pit is considerably less. The interior is extremely beautiful, and the proscenium, with an elegantly painted ceiling, particularly excite admiration. There are two tiers of boxes, built geometrically, with projecting fronts, unsupported by pillars, so that the view of the stage is completely unobstructed, and the elegant frequenters of this part of the theatre will add conspicuously to the beauty of the coup d'œil. Behind the front part of the second tier, extending the whole width of the house, is a commodious saloon, tastefully fitted up.—Even with the lower gallery, which is very spacious, are slips, so constructed as to leave the view from the gallery entirely open from every part; and the pit is somewhat larger and better laid out than the old one.—The entire building reflects much credit upon the artists engaged in its erection, and is admirably calculated to ensure to the proprietors an accession to their extensive patronage.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—This theatre re-opened on Wednesday night, with the opera of False Alarms, and Giovanni in London. On the Monday preceding, the masked festival was repeated with alterations. Sylvester Daggerwood, and a scene from the Mayor of Garratt, were followed by the 'grand entrée of the Champion of England, with the ceremony of giving the defiance,' and all the appropriate costume 'on Horses.' The exhibition was, however, not very splendid, and was much surpassed at the other house, to which we turn.

COVENT GARDEN.—The extensive stage of this theatre was, perhaps, never employed to so much advantage as on Monday night, in the revival of the second part of Shakespeare's Henry the Fourth. The play was admirably performed. Macready's Henry was a touching and powerful representation of a regal spirit sinking under disease, but yet retaining 'the ruling passion strong in death.' Farren's Justice Shallow was one of his very best characters, and we never saw the lack-brain magistrate so well represented. These, however, were objects of minor interest when compared with the coronation, which developed its glories at the conclusion of the play. The first scene was the procession to Westminster Abbey. The pageant moved along a crimson path, curtained with crimson cloth, escutcheoned with royal emblems. The costume of the nobility of England was very rich, and the liveries of the attendants were stiff and sparkling with every ornament of the old costly time of coronation. In the procession, were dukes and duchesses, bishops and headles, heralds and herwomen, judges, lawyers, sheriffs, &c. &c. Mr. Kemble was the monarch, and looked the character extremely well. The second scene displayed Westminster Abbey; Henry the Seventh's chapel with the window illuminated, and the ceremony of crowning, which was very imposing. The final scene was the grand banquet in Westminster Hall, where the champion entered on his white charger, and boldly challenged to defend his sovereign's right to the crown. The whole was very magnificent, and announced for repetition amidst the greatest applause.

Mr. Mathews.—This gentleman, on concluding his fourth season 'At Home,' on Saturday the 16th inst. delivered the following farewell address:—

'Ladies and Gentlemen,—It has been said, and I believe truly, that every man, however gifted by talents and cultivated by learning, has some point in his character open to the attacks of flattery and accessible to the assaults of vanity. To partake of this weakness, therefore, in common with the clever and the wise, is a disgrace to no man. Be this as it may, I freely acknowledge myself, albeit neither learned nor wise,—in the highest degree vain, and to the greatest extent susceptible of flattery. The flattery of which I speak is your undiminished approbation and applause, and the vanity which I think so excusable as to make it my boast, arises from the belief that no man, by his own single exertions, ever was so fortunate as to excite the public notice and attention for so long a period as I have had the happiness of exciting your's. This evening will close the 160th performance in which I have stood alone before you; and I may, therefore, with truth assert,—what few in the world, perhaps, can assert so truly,—that I have passed 160 evenings with unmixed pleasure, for I have seen nothing around me but cheerful friends and happy faces. If this world be, indeed, what we are told it is, a world of trouble and care, how gratified should he feel who (for a few hours, at least,) can banish those demons from the hearts of his friends; and, believing as my vanity (pardonable vanity I trust,) induces me to believe, that I have been the happy means of accomplishing this desirable end, I confess my gratifications will be unbounded and complete, provided you allow me the pleasure of anticipating at cheerful a meeting next year; and, in the mean time, accept with gracious kindest my heartfelt thanks and most respectful farewell.

SADLER'S WELLS.—Mr. Dibdin's celebrated piece, the Heart of Midlothian, was produced, on Monday, at this theatre, and was played effectively to a crowded audience. The characters were respectably sustained. Mrs. Egerton plays Mudge Wildfire, and receives unbounded applause. The scenery and costume are appropriate.

Literature and Science.

Mr. Valpy has issued proposals for publishing, by subscription, a collection from the works of the most celebrated poets of Italy, from the end of the twelfth to the beginning of the 19th century, accompanied by biographical and critical accounts of their lives and writings. The work, which it is calculated will extend to forty-eight parts, will be under the direction of William Roscoe, Esq. the elegant author of the Life of Lorenzo de Medici.

A poor blind man, of the name of James Watson, of Edinburgh, has invented and brought to perfection, a musical instrument which unites the power of two violoncellos; it has a range of sixty-four semi-tones, and more could be added if necessary. He plays on this instrument himself, with a remarkable degree of practical dexterity.

A desideratum in Scotch history; the long lost MS. of Sir Geo. Mackenzie, of Roselamagh, has been recently discovered, and is now published. It is a history of the affairs of Scotland, from the restoration of Charles the Second to the death of the author, in 1691. About four years ago, a large mass of papers was brought to a grocer in Edinburgh, and purchased by him for the humblest purposes of his trade. From these his curiosity induced him to select a MS. volume, which appeared to be something of an historical nature. He handed it to Dr. McCrie, the well-known author of the Lives of Knox and Melville, who, on examining the volume, soon discovered, from its tenor and contents, that it was the composition of Sir Geo. Mackenzie, and that in truth it must be a portion of the history of his own times, so long a desideratum in Scottish literature. This was most satisfactorily and decisively ascertained.

The Bee.

*'Floriferis ut apes in saltibus omnia hument,
Omnia nos iidem depascitur aura dicat.'*
LUCRETIVS.

Fontenelle.—This agreeable author lived to be nearly a hundred years old, and preserved his wit to the last. A lady of nearly equal years said to him one day in a large company, 'Monsieur, you and I stay here so long, I have a notion death has forgotten us.'—'Speak as low as you can, Madaam,' replied Fontenelle, 'lest you should remind him of us; the proverb says, the sleeping lion must not be roused.'

The Grace of God in Dollars.—I met a fat plumped-faced speculator the other day, staggering under a heavy canvass bag. With true yankee freedom, I asked what he had in his bag; 'the grace of God,' replied the wag. Ah, said I, I have often heard of that article, but never saw it in a bag. By this time he had slipped his hand into the bag, and taking out a dollar, 'there,' said he, 'Dei Gratia, Ferdinand VII. is stamped upon the face of every dollar in the bag.' I was surprised to hear a speculator say he had the 'grace of God,' especially such a load as to stagger under it; but, upon explaining himself, my surprise ceased, and I smiled. He had cleared three hundred dollars that morning, by the sale of public papers. He was too much pleased with the abundance of his grace to stand discussing nice points, and we parted.—*Amer. Bon Mot of Voltaire.—Lord Chesterfield happened to be at a rout in France, where Voltaire was one of the guests. Chesterfield seemed to be gazing about the brilliant circle of ladies, when Voltaire thus accosted him:—'My lord, I know you are a judge; which are more beautiful, the English or French ladies?'—'Upon my word,' replied his lordship, with his usual presence of mind, 'I am no connoisseur in paintings.'—Sometime after this, Voltaire, being in London, happened to be at a nobleman's rout with Lord Chesterfield. A lady in company, prodigiously painted, directed her whole discourse to Voltaire, and entirely engrossed his conversation. Chesterfield came up, and tapped him on the shoulder, saying, 'Sir, take care you are not captivated.'—'My lord,' replied the French wit, 'I scorn to be taken by an English bottom under French colours.'

Good Kings.—(From the French of the celebrated M. Mercier.)—In the sixteenth century, a certain person inscribed, in the circumference of a farthing, the names of all the good kings, ancient and modern, and still there was room left. I wish this fancy were renewed in our days, as there is some humour in it, and that this fine coin were current.

O happy farthing, decorated with the names of good kings, thou would'st, in my opinion, exceed the finest quadruplex; and I would wear thee at my button-hole!

Let us all assist in composing this uncommon farthing. Let us recapitulate the names to be admitted, and those that should be rejected. Though this work would not be very voluminous, it would require much accuracy and understanding.

I admire that fine expression of Montesquieu:—'Clemency is the distinguishing quality of monarchs.' Monarchs obtain so much by clemency, it is followed by so much affection, so much glory attends, it that it is almost ever a great happiness for them to have opportunities of exerting it.

Singular Custom, at Westwickham, in Kent.—In rogation week, there is an odd custom in the country, about Keston and Wickham, in Kent. A number of young men meet together for the purpose, and, with a most hideous noise, run into the orchards, and encircling each tree, pronounce these words:—

Stand fast, root; bear well, top;
God send us a yeuling son!
E'er twig, apple big;
E'er bough, apple enow.

For this incantation, the confused rabble expect a gratuity in money or drink, which is no less welcome. But if they are disappointed in both, they, with great solemnity, anathematize the owners and trees with altogether as insignificant a curse.

'It seems highly probable,' says Mr. Hasted, in his History of Kent, 'that this custom has arisen from the ancient one of perambulation among the heathens, when they made their prayers to the gods for the use and blessing of the fruits coming up, with thanksgiving for those of the preceding year. And as the heathens supplicated Eolus, the god of the winds, for his favourable blasts, so in this custom they still retain his name with a very small variation, the ceremony being called yeuling, and the word is often used in this in their invocations.

TO ADVERTISERS.

THE attention of Advertisers is particularly called to the peculiar advantages that must result from their Advertisements being placed in the columns of The Literary Chronicle, over any weekly or daily publication. Besides finding a station for a work not merely of immediate but of permanent interest and constant reference, it must be obvious that they come directly before the eye and under the notice of intelligent readers, who are looking for novelties in literature and subjects connected with the Arts and Sciences. Far different are the views of the readers of diurnal journals, where the news of the day is the principal object of pursuit, and where the crowded miscellaneous advertisements bury or exclude those for which a literary paper is evidently a fitter medium.

* To insure regular insertion, it is requested that Advertisements be sent by Thursday, at the latest, the extent of the weekly impression of the Literary Chronicle, requiring that the work should go to press early.

IMPROVED GLOBES.

W. PINNOCK respectfully informs the Nobility, Gentry, and the Public, that he has on sale, variously mounted and ornamented, Addison's NEW and IMPROVED GLOBES, which, from their superior elegance and correctness, have obtained the highest praise and distinguished honour of being patronized by, and appointed GLOBE MAKER to, His Most Gracious Majesty GEORGE IV.

These Globes are constructed upon the best principle, and engraved from entirely new Designs, containing every Discovery and Improvement (including those of Captain PARRY) that have been made both in Geography and Astronomy up to the present day. The elegant 18-inch Globes have, by the express command of His Majesty, been recently fitted up at Carlton Palace. They are in great estimation by the most scientific persons, and are very generally introduced into the Libraries of the Nobility, their beauty and correctness being unrivalled. W. Pinnock, however, begs to observe, that the smaller Globes are on the same correct principles, and are admirably adapted for Private Teaching and Public Schools, forming at the same time a truly useful as well as ornamental article of Furniture. The Globes mostly in use, are the 12-inch, in mahogany frames, on pillar and claw stands, with Marriani's Compass, 6l. 6s.; or in stands, table high, 4l. 10s.; and the 16-inch, 13l. 13s.; or, in round frames, 16l. 10s.; 12-inch common, 3l. 12s. 6d. The covers, if had, are extra charge.

N. B. Parties possessing old Globes, may have them re-covered with the above new and improved plates, on reasonable Terms.

SUPERIOR TONED PIANO-FORTES,

W. PINNOCK has the honour of announcing to the Nobility and Gentry, that he has constantly on Sale a Choice and Elegant Assortment of SUPERIOR-TONED PIANO-FORTES, which, for brilliancy and sweetness of tone, delicacy of touch, and quality of action, are in fact, and durability, are unrivalled. That the Public may be assured of the correctness of W. P.'s pretensions to superiority in this respect, he hereby observes, that it is his invariable practice to offer no Instrument for sale that he cannot assure warrant for the qualities above described, in proof of which, he undertakes to exchange any Piano-Forte which may be purchased of him, if not approved, within three months after the delivery, from any part of the kingdom.

N. B. Piano-Fortes tuned and repaired. Second-hand by the most estimable Masters, constantly on sale, or taken in exchange for others from any part of the country. A good toned second-hand Instrument may be sold for Twenty Guineas, and a square Piano, by Broadwood, for Eighty Guineas.—Music and Musical Instruments of all kinds prepared to order, and Music Teachers of eminence recommended. All orders from the country punctually attended to.

Review of New Books.

Lorin; or, the Wanderer in Wales. A Tale. By Jos. Jones. 12mo. pp. 101. London, 1821.

A poem, in two cantos, has just appeared under this title, of which, from the gratification it has afforded us, we are desirous of offering to our readers a brief account. And this we shall do without further preface.

The poem embraces the history of a young man, named Lorin, whom a series of disasters had driven, in a state of melancholy madness, to seek a refuge among the woods and mountains of Wales. The unfortunate result of an early passion, which Lorin had entertained for a young lady, to whom the poet gives the name of Julia, accompanied by some other misfortunes, occasioned by his own iniquity and the treachery of a friend, had been the cause of his abandonment of his home, as well as of the mental agony, in which he became a 'wanderer in Wales.' The gloomy and misanthropic feelings of the outcast, while in this dreary condition, are painted with a strength of fidelity that indicate considerable powers in the writer for portraying the darker emotions of the human mind. Thus destitute and distracted, Lorin continues to roam for some time, a prey to the most excruciating torment, until, at length, by plunging from a rock into the sea, he attempts to put a period at once to his life and his sufferings. From this state of peril, however, he is rescued with much difficulty, by Ivor, the village pastor of the place, who had long witnessed and commiserated his distress, and who now, by his humane exertions, restores him to life, and to those better feelings which had so long deserted him. Lorin's gratitude to the worthy priest, induces him to recount the tale of his woes, which, although simple, is interesting and well told. It embodies the causes of the wanderer's flight from his native place, and of his subsequent misanthropic disposition, as already briefly alluded to.

Not long after this event, a vessel is stranded on the neighbouring coast, and Lorin and a few others, who are witnesses of the melancholy scene, set out, through a tempestuous sea, to its assistance, but arrive only in time to save one of the unfortunate passengers, a young female, at the very moment when she is sinking into a billowy grave. This female proves to be no other than Julia, whom her father, the more effectually to snatch from her lover, had sent abroad, and had caused a report to be spread of her death. Shortly afterwards, however, the father himself dies, and Julia returns to her native country, and is actually in quest of Lorin, when she is thus indebted to him for her life. The happy lovers, thus miraculously restored to each other, are, by the assistance of the delighted Ivor, finally and indissolubly united.

Such is the brief outline of this story, the simplicity of which, it will at once be seen, affords little or no scope for incident. Indeed, the writer's aim, it appears to us, has principally been to develop, as he has often done most successfully, the moody workings of a diseased and misanthropic mind. And it must have been with a view to this main purpose of the poem, that the author has set out with a sort of poetical dissertation on misanthropy, which occupies eight pages before we come to the tale itself. To some this may appear objectionable; but it must be allowed to be in unison with the prevailing character of the poem. We do not mean to insinuate, however, that this 'tale' is throughout marked by the feature we have alluded to: on the contrary, there are some passages of a brighter and lovelier cast, which, like transient sunbeams, act as a redeeming contrast to the less cheering peculiarities of the poem. There is, besides, in several parts, a strain of philosophic sententiousness, which is much to our taste, and especially as it is occasionally enriched with apposite illustrations, which the author has introduced with much skill. Nor is the poem by any means deficient in those picturesque traits which belong to descriptive poetry, and are ever among the fairest charms of the muse. But it is time that we should exemplify these remarks by a few extracts. The first we shall select, is taken from the introductory account of Lorin, and briefly sketches the harrowing state of his thoughts:—

—Young hapless Lorin!—no admiring eye
That once beheld thy fair prosperity;
Thy face and love, thy form with scarce a peer,
Thy grateful mind, thy heart's unbounded cheer.

Could e'er believe thou wert so changed as this,
And bold denied the metamorphosis.

And yet 'tis he—who now, with jaundiced eye,
Scowls on each breathing thing he passes by;

A moody imprecating soul of woe,
To man and beast, to heaven and earth a foe;

And if he claim congeniality
With substance or with shadow, low or high,

With uncreated or created thing, it is
Some fiery spirit of that dark abyss,

Where the foul tongue gives harsh and horrid vent

To the lost soul's engendered sentiment;
Dawning and damned wherever it may roam,

And cursing Time,—past, present, and to come.

In the following passage, the first appearance of the morning is described in lively colours, and with a happy association of imagery; and we regret that we have not room for the whole description, of which this extract forms the commencement:—

'A single star is left in heav'n—which seems
From pensive eye to shed her pale bright beams;

Night's vestal regent and her sister train
In distance fading on the other main:—

But there she lingers, as if bound by spell
To the sweet silent scene she loves so well;

'Tis hard to part, but more she darest not stay—
One soft adieu—and then she glides away.

Up starts the blue-eyed Goddess of the morn,
Her bluish laced and along her bugle-born;

Fresh for the race, as merry and as free
As well becomes such hastening to be—

A light coronal binds her golden hair,
And half the pride of that fair breast is bare,

Wooded by the breeze that wanton plays around,
And her slight waist is slightly cinctured bound.

Away she trips, with fairy step along,
O'er hill and vale, the bosk and dale among;

Kissing the rose, and sipping off the dew
That hangs upon the herb-dell's lip of blue—

Through her bright horn, in sounds that stir and shake,

She cries, "Up, sleeper, up—Awake! awake!—
Nature's blest harmony revives again,

And calls to action the best sons of men."

We cannot refrain, however, from transcribing, also, the close of this description, which, we are sure, our readers will admire, both for the beauty of the sentiment and the easy flow of the verse:—

‘Enchanting beauty of the fair young day!
With all creation innocently gay—
Nature to smiles—and all her tribes, allied
In tender union, smiling by her side:
No fear, care, pangs, retrospect of gloom,
To cast a shade of darkness on the bloom,
But every scene diffusing life and love—
Gladdens below and glories all above!
Enchanting loveliness of life’s young morn!
Ere from the tree the tender bloom is torn—
The fair white blossom sweet expanding forth, Stainless and pure, the prince and pride of the earth:
No withering decay impress by time,
No guilty stigma from a touch of crime;
But a bright sunny innocence of heart
Pervades the whole, and shines in every part;
Elastic vigour for each limb supplies,
Words for the tongue and love-beams for the eyes.

A passage of a nature similar to the foregoing sketch of Aurora, and of nearly equal merit, describing the setting sun, occurs in a previous part of the poem. The illustration contained in the ensuing lines, although sufficiently obvious, and not altogether new to poetry, is drawn with a chaste and classical accuracy:—

‘When the full crescent, with barbaric sway,
Waved on the fanes of Delphi’s god of day,
And Moalem’s furious ignorance laid waste
Each finished masterpiece of ancient taste;
The marble that had felt art’s magic wand,
Beneath a Phidias’ or Lysippus’ hand,
Till a plain column of cold Parian stone,
To lovely life and breathing form had grown;
Let the harsh gong and harsher yell resound,
Barbarian conquest upon classic ground;
Let Islam roar, with genius e’er at war,
And hands that grasped the bloody scimitar,
Urge on the havoc,—while one touch remains Of “glorious limb”—art triumphs, though in chains;

Tear, crush, deface, and mutilate at will,
In every fragment there is beauty still.
So ‘tis with man—when nature’s hand, replete
With all that blends the lovely and the great,
O’er the fine form has lavished every grace,
And given her cast of beauty to the face;
Let all the angry bolts of fate be sped
In stern succession to his helpless head,
Their utmost power is but to disarray,
They cannot altogether raze away
Those noble traits he wore in better day.’

We might add considerably to these extracts, both with pleasure to ourselves, and, we think, with gratification to our readers; but our limits unfortunately forbid us. We must, therefore, close this portion of our task with the concluding lines of the poem, which briefly relate the nuptials of Lorin and Julia:—

‘Why smiles our Ivor, with his surplice on?
And well-starched band,—why smirks the holy man?

Because he scorned one upright thought to hide,
And his warm heart was dancing in his side;
But now with solemn, yet with placid air,
He gave his blessing to that tender pair:
Their hands he joined, their souls were so before—
Love archedly smiled—and man could do no more—

Llangarmon’s bells long sounded merrily,
The rustics shouted in their revelry;
And long Llangarmon’s vale shall bless the day,
When first a misanthrope, with mind astray,
Young Lorin of Lyndale a wanderer came that way.’

To sum up our judgment of this poem, we would observe, in the first place, that, although denominated a tale, it is rather didactic than narrative,—abounding more with sentiment than with incident. The story of Lorin appears to have been selected merely as a vehicle for misanthropic musings and sententious moralizing, enlivened, indeed, as we have already noticed, by some picturesque touches and much pleasing imagery. And to this we may add, that a bold originality, both of sentiment and illustration, occasionally presents itself. Of the mere poetry we may say, that, although unequal, it is, for the most part, harmonious and forcible, reminding us, in several instances, of the terseness and vigour of Dryden’s lines, and, occasionally, of the more luxuriant numbers of Byron. But, indeed, it is not improbable that Child Harold may have been present to the writer’s mind while engaged on this tale; and we fancy that we have been able to detect an occasional similarity of thought, as well as of versification, in the two poems. In a word, ‘Lorin’ is entitled to much praise, and especially if it be, as it would seem, Mr. Jones’s first public effort. That it possesses some minor blemishes we do not mean to deny; but, as these are chiefly faults of redundancy, they are the more venial, and, at all events, are not of sufficient importance to detract from the general merit of the production.

Queen Elizabeth’s Progresses. Volume IV. Part I. The Queen’s Entertainment by the Countess of Derby, at Harefield Place, Middlesex, in July, 1602. With some Particulars relative to several Earlier Visits at Loseley, Winchester, &c. &c.; the Princely Entertainments at Kenilworth, &c. &c. 4to. pp. 100. London, 1831.

THE Progresses of Queen Elizabeth have always been considered as presenting a faithful and highly curious picture of the times in which they were undertaken; they formed a very prominent part of the royal amusements of the maiden Queen, and were, of course, chronicled with great minuteness, and with a talent far superior to that of the Court Newsmen of the present day, by some of the attendants on her majesty. These Progresses, which were scattered in numerous volumes and tracts, some of which were extremely rare, were first collected by that indefatigable antiquary, Mr. John Nichols, who added much to their interest, by the valuable notes and illustrations with which he enriched them. This work had become very scarce, when the same editor, full of years, which had been spent in his favourite pursuit, undertook a new edition, to which he has brought much additional information, gained with unwearied industry. The present part nearly completes the series; the first portion of it, the Queen’s Entertainment by the Countess Dowager of Derby, is now for the first time printed, from some papers belonging to the late Sir Roger Newdigate, Bart. which had been supposed lost, but were discovered in the year 1803; this MS. had long been a desideratum among antiquaries, and was, we believe, the only document wanting to render the Elizabethan Progresses complete.

It is not from any single extract that an estimate can be made of a work of this nature; we shall, however, venture to make one. The Queen, on entering the stables of Harefield, was met by two persons, one representing a bailiff, and the other a dairy maid who welcomed her in a set dialogue of the preparations that had been made to entertain her. When her Majesty was entering the house, PLACER and TISS entered her with a second dialogue, in which her praises were not forgotten. On her departure, PLACER, which, at her coming, wore ‘a partie-colored robe, like the brick-house,’ was now ‘attired in black mourning apparel,’ bade her farewell in the following quaint speech:—

‘Sweet Maistie, be pleased to look upon a poor wydow, mourning before your Grace. I am this Place, which, at your coming, was full of ioy; but now I your departure am as full of sorrow. I was then, for my comfort, accompanied with the present cheerful Time; but now he is to depart with you; and, blessed as he is, must ever fly before you; but, alas! I have no wings, as Time hath. My heauines is such, that I must stand still, amazed to see so greate happiness

some benefit me. Oh, that I could remove with you, as other circumstances can! Time can go with you, Perseus can go with you; they can move like Heaven; But I, like dull Earth (as I am indeed), must stand unmovable. I could wish my self like the enchanted Castle of Loze, to behold you here for ever, but that your virtues would dissolve all my enchantments. Then what remedy? As it is against the nature of an Angel to be circumscribed in Place, so it is against the nature of Place to have the motion of an Angel. I must stay forsaken and desolate. You may go with majesty, joy, and glory. My only suite, before you go, is that you will pardon the close imprisonment which you have suffered ever since your coming, imputing it not to me, but St. Swythen, who of late hath raised so many storms, as I was faine to provide this Anchor, for you, when I did understand you would put into this creeke. But now, since I perceive this harbour is too little for you, and you will hence sayle and be gone, I beseech you take this Anchor with you. And I pray to Him that made both Time and Place, that, in all places where ever you shall arrive, you may anchor as safely, as you doe and ever shall doe in the harbours of my Owners.

Extracts from some letters in the British Museum, respecting this visit of the Queen, illustrate the original account. The remaining portion of this part contains some curious particulars respecting other visits, which will be considered as choice morsels to the antiquary, while the account of the visit to Kenilworth, from the circumstance of the subject being rendered so recently popular, by the great unknown, is well calculated to gratify the general reader.

An Autumn near the Rhine; or, Sketches of Courts, Society, and Scenery, in Germany.

SOCIETY, at Frankfurt, is divided into the circles of the diet and those of the citizens; and, at the balls, dreadful alterations for precedence have sometimes taken place between the wives and daughters of their excellencies the ministers, and of their worship the civic magistrates. The German diet is ordinarily composed of seventeen plenipotentiaries, who hold their sittings at the residence of the president, the Ambassador of Austria.

Our author happened to be at Frankfurt on the 18th of October, the anniversary of the battle of Leipzig, a day celebrated every year with much ceremony throughout Germany, under the title of the Allen Deutschen Fest, the Feast of all Germans. Like most rejoicings among the Germans, it partook deeply of a religious character. The day was observed strictly as a sabbath, the shops closed, and the churches crowded with persons of all ranks; singing and preaching being the alternate orders of the day; but we must pass over the details to a very interesting account of Theodore Körner, the young hero, whose energetic poems helped so powerfully to kindle a patriotic spirit in Germany. Like Tyræus, of Sparta, he at once led the van in the field, and inspired his countrymen by the enthusiasm of his songs, which breathe the very soul of martial, daring, and patriotic heroism. Many of them were written at night,—in the bivouac,—on the eve of battle,—or on the bed stained by bleeding wounds:—

‘But Körner was not alone a soldier and a lyric poet. His tragedies of Zriny and Rosamunda, (the last woven into a beautiful drama from our historical tale of Henry and Rosamund Clifford,) prove him to be gifted with a powerful dramatic genius. At the age of twenty, his scenes delighted audiences throughout Germany, and he was appointed dramatic poet to the theatre of Vienna. At his death, at the age of twenty-two, Körner left behind him eight or ten dramatic pieces, some of them of great beauty, and several volumes of poetry, displaying strength of thought and felicity of diction, and breathing the affections of a tender and pure heart, and the noble ardour of a hero. While his country was struggling for freedom from a foreign yoke, Körner’s spirit could no longer endure the indolent occupations of a poet. He left Vienna in March, 1813, and joined a distinguished free corps—in which he soon rose to rank and became the idol of his comrades. He courted danger and death with the cool devotion of heroism; and his poems perpetually breathe a quiet foreboding of his approaching fate. He was killed in an engagement with the French, at Rosenberg, in Mecklenburg, on the 26th of August, 1813. On the morning of that day, he wrote in his pocket-book and read to a friend, when the signal for attack was given, his exquisite dialogue with his sword, called “The Sword Song.” The effect of Körner’s stirring strains on the indignant and struggling Germans, was electrical. They struck on the soul with all the power of the most inspiring martial music—at this day they are universally loved and adored. They revive the recollections of glory, and penetrate the hearts of the Germans like the notes of the trumpet of victory, or the triumphant din of battle melting in the distance. I send you a translation of one of his patriotic songs. It was commenced in a bivouac hut on the Stecknitz, on the morning of an engagement. The metre is exactly preserved:—

‘MEN AND DASTARDS.

A SONG. (KÖRNER.)

The land is roused—the storm breaks loose—
What traitor hand now shrinks from its use?
Shame on the pale-faced wretch, who covers
In chimney corners and damsel’s bowers—

Shame on thee, craven recreant sot!

Our German maidens greet thee not—

Our German carols joy thee not—

Our German wine inspires thee not—

On in the van!

Man to man!

Whoe’er a faulchion’s hilt can span!

While we bear the brunt of the rainy night,
And watch through the pelting hail-storm’s spite,

Canst thou in soft slumber thy senses drown,
And stretch thy limbs on the lazy down?

Shame on thee, craven recreant sot!

Our German maidens greet thee not—

Our German carols joy thee not—

Our German wine inspires thee not—

On in the van!

Man to man!

Whoe’er a faulchion’s hilt can span!

When the trumpet’s voice, like the thunders roll,

Wrings and pierces our inmost soul,
Go and delight in the dulcet sounds,
Where the eucuch trills, and the dancer bounds—

Shame on thee, craven recreant sot!

Our German maidens greet thee not—

Our German carols joy thee not—

Our German wine inspires thee not—

On in the van!

Man to man!

Whoe’er a faulchion’s hilt can span!

When the noon-tide sun darts down his rays,
And no water-drop thy thirst allays,

Can’st thou at the banquet board be found,
With the champagne goblets foaming round?

Shame on thee, craven recreant sot!

Our German maidens greet thee not—

Our German carols joy thee not—

Our German wine inspires thee not—

On in the van!

Man to man!

Whoe’er a faulchion’s hilt can span!

While we on the eve of the murderous fray,
Think on our true-loves, far away;

Thou may’st thy husband’s charms ensfold,
And buy her tainted love with gold.

Shame on thee, craven recreant sot!

Our German maidens greet thee not—

Our German carols joy thee not—

Our German wine inspires thee not—

On in the van!

Man to man!

Whoe’er a faulchion’s hilt can span!

When the bullets whiz, when the lances glare,
And death in a thousand forms we dare;

Can’st thou stake thy fish and smirk at thy play,

And shuffle thy cards in their mimic array?

Shame on thee, craven recreant sot!

Our German maidens greet thee not;

Our German carols joy thee not;

Our German wine inspires thee not.

On in the van!

Man to man!

Whoe’er a faulchion’s hilt can span!

When our hour is come on the blood-stained heath,

We welcome the soldier’s martyr-death.

Whilst thou in thy sickly couch's gloom,
Shall shrink and shriek at the yawning tomb.
Thou diest, thou craven recreant sot!
Our German maidens weep thee not;
Our German songs bewail thee not;
Our German beakers ring for thee not.
On in the van!
Man to man!
Whoe'er a faulchion's hilt can span!

In the notice of Hanau, we have an account of the famous battle fought by Bonaparte against the allies. It was during this engagement that a mill, on the river Kenzig, was the scene of desperate struggles. The French drove back the Bavarians to the banks, and thrust hundreds into the deep stream. The miller, at the hazard of his life, coolly went on amidst the shower of balls, and stopped the flood-gates, so as to leave a safe retreat to the Bavarians over the mill-dam. At Hanau, resides a merchant, whose history is rather curious:—

'A quarrel with his step-mother had induced him to "leave his father's house," when young, and embark for England. Having acquired in trade, in London, a fortune sufficient for comfort in Germany, he married and returned to his native town, where he found that his parents were dead, and that their property had devolved to him. A large rambling house, containing thirteen rooms on a floor, and adorned with pictures of old electors and landgraves, was a part of his patrimony. The house goes by the name of Noah's Ark, from the singularity of its construction, arising, as the story goes, from a cause not less singular. The upper story is a complete second house, erected on the first. The builder, an opulent citizen, who possessed ninety-nine houses in Hanau, was ambitious of rounding his number to one hundred—but the jealousy of the citizens opposed his whim, unless he consented to pave a path to the church, some hundred yards long, with Reich Dollars. He declined this exorbitant tax; but, unwilling to resign the distinction of owning one hundred houses, he contented himself with a hundredth placed on the top of one of the ninety-nine.'

In Germany, the watchmen do not announce the hour in the hoarse blunt manner that our guardians of the night do, but by the sound of a horn, and a quaint hurraque in audible recitative every half hour, to the great annoyance of the stranger who is unaccustomed to it. The following is a translation of a national watchman's song in Germany:—

WATCHMAN'S SONG.

'Hark ye neighbours, and hear me tell—
Ten now strikes on the beffy bell!
Ten and the holy Commandments given,
To man below, from God in Heaven.

Human watch from harm can't ward us—

God will watch, and God will guard us;
He through his eternal night,
Give us all a blessed night.

Hark ye neighbours, and hear me tell—
Eleven sounds on the beffy bell!
Eleven apostles of holy mind,
Taught the gospel to mankind.
Human watch, &c.

Hark ye neighbours, and hear me tell—
Twelve resounds from the beffy bell!
Twelve disciples to Jesus came,
Who suffered rebuke for their Saviour's name.
Human watch, &c.

Hark ye neighbours, and hear me tell—
One has peal'd on the beffy bell!
One God above, one Lord indeed,
Who bears us forth in our hour of need.
Human watch, &c.

Hark ye neighbours, and hear me tell—
Two resounds from the beffy bell!
Two paths before mankind are free,—
Neighbour choose the best for thee.
Human watch, &c.

Hark ye neighbours, and hear me tell—
Three now tolls on the beffy bell!
Threefold reigns the Heavenly host,
Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.
Human watch, &c.

In an excursion to the Forest of Oden, our author visited the Riesensäule, or Giant's Column, a large well-proportioned pillar of granite, which he thus describes:—

'The Riesensäule lies in a wood on the declivity of the mountain. Descending a narrow winding path, conducted by the Jager's little girl, the great column presently lay before us, half buried in thick brushwood, in a hollow made by its own weight. It is above thirty feet long, and about four in greatest diameter—nearly cylindrical, and tapering with an exact proportion. At one end a sort of semicircular step is cut, apparently either to fit it to some other stone, or to fix machinery for moving it. The granite is of the hard dark description, of which all the masses in the neighbourhood are composed. The appearance of this gigantic and well-finished column, whose perennial hardness has preserved it for centuries, without a trace of the effects of time, is extremely striking. One little expects so singular a vestige of the power and ingenuity of man in a wild sequestered forest, where its use and object are totally unaccountable. The column has excited much speculation among German antiquaries. The magnificent Elector Palatine, Charles Theodore, would fain have brought it down from the mountain, to grace the grande place of his capital, Manheim; but it was too massy and weighty for removal entire, and the stone baffled the saws of his workmen, who, in attempting to cut it, have left on it two insignificant incisions in evidence of their failure. Kotzebue, who has sprinkled ink upon almost every imaginable subject, proposed that it should be erected on the field of Leipsic, in memory of the victory, a scheme easier to propose than to execute. To mention no other obstacle, it is not probable that the Grand Duke of Hesse, to whom it now belongs, though a very patriotic German, would very much enjoy furnishing a monument to commemorate a battle in which his son and his troops were beaten and taken prisoners.'

Our author gives an animated picture of the court at Carlsruhe, and is equally happy in describing a table d'Hôte, at Baden, with an account of which we close our extracts for the present:—

'Notwithstanding the unfashionable season, a pretty numerous party assembled at the table d'Hôte, headed, as usual, by the substantial landlord and his pretty wife, who fed daintily, and looked and talked softly to the admiring cousins. Her spouse was a complete German host, dignified, bulky, and stupid. On discovering my country, he recounted a long list of Englishmen who had lately visited Baden; but who might as well have been Hindoos for any indication of their country conveyed by the names the good host assigned them. They were all, however, according to his description, either lords or vornehme Leute, (people of distinction); but as to most of them he remarked, with some surprise—« Sie machten nicht viele aufwände, nicht viele pomp » (they did not spend a great deal, or make much show.)—a circumstance which seemed not at all to accord with his notions of a Milord Anglin. A German host presides at the table d'hôte, carries the dishes, and dispenses his good cheer and attentions to the guests with a sort of taciturn dignity which is sometimes highly amusing. He has a sort of air of pomposity and chuckling importance, which reminds one of our English Bonifaces in the times of Chaucer and Shakespeare. The subaltern officers, and other regular frequenters of the table, appear to court his conversation, and to desire to stand well with this important personage—generally a well-fed portly man, who, especially if he happen to be a state comptable, as Mr. Postmaster of the station, is well-versed up in fat official complacency. His eldest son has, perhaps, held a commission in the army—Mrs. Postmistress has been, or is still a beauty,—or he has a fine family of little ones, who, in such case, frequently adorn the walls of the saloon, and whom I have seen introduced in their best dresses after dinner, as if their company must necessarily be as interesting to the guests as that of the children of a friend. If the sons and daughters dine at table, they generally occupy, with their visitors, the best places round papa and mamma—rarely offering civility to any one, talking easily among themselves, and showing, by their whole deportment, that they consider themselves to the full the equals of the father's guests. One of the sons frequently holds the office of Herr Wäher Keller, (Mr. Upper Waiter),—the Germans never defrauding this useful personage of his title—who, after waiting upon his sisters and their admirers, in common with the company during dinner, I have seen resign his official napkin, and take a hand at whist with the family friends, which he would not lay down though the bells rang, and “Herr Keller” resounded from all corners of the inn. Göthe has an excellent picture of a German host in Herman and Dorothea. He makes him choleric, conceited, and well-fed, apt to dispute after dinner, relenting and good humoured in the evening, a great man in his little town, and fond of talking of the causeways, the pavements, and the white-washing of the church, effected during his administration as building-inspector. There is something ludicrous in these parochial details being couched in the stately classic hexameter, which is the metre of the poem:—

“Does not the traveller praise our newly carpeted town-gate,
Our neat fresh whitened church, and our glittering belfry?

All applaud our streets, our gutters with water flowing,
So well concealed and neat, use and necessity serving.

Is it not all accomplished since that sad conflagration?

Six times in council with credit, chief inspector of buildings,

Have I received from my townsmen votes of warm approbation.”

“I have not very often met with any thing like real civility in a German inn; for the matter-of-course bows, and old-fashioned wishes of “a good appetite,”—“a prosperous journey,”—“a sound sleep,” &c. &c. are mere German formalities. The host’s indifferent phlegm rarely gives way to any thing but an officious servility towards consequence which he is capable of appreciating. Our Baden host, the most silent and sententious of his race, became all bows and bustling civility to a little man decorated with the cross of Malta, who came in late to supper, and who proved to be a baron, holding some office under government. “Would the Gnädiger Herr (gracious gentleman) like this dish, or should he fetch something hot for his grace?” and other similar attentions were poured forth with an alacrity quite surprising. The contrast of this obsequious humility, with the promise of independence held out by his broad rosy face and solid figure, gave it a high air of the ludicrous. It something reminded me of Falstaff’s solidity of person, coupled with his milky heart.”

The Percy Anecdotes. Part XIX.

THE nineteenth part of this excellent little work, is devoted to Anecdotes of the Pulpit, and is dedicated to the Rev. Daniel Wilson, though on what grounds we know not, unless private friendship has dictated the choice.

But this is no affair of ours, and we therefore proceed to make a few extracts from the two hundred anecdotes, which we suppose the volume contains:—

“A Scottish Covenantant.—In the year 1666, when the Whigganores, alias Covenanters of Scotland, were in arms, a Master of Arts of the College of Aberdeen, preached at Aberdeen a sermon from these words in Jeremiah:—“Sion is wounded.” In this sermon, a copy of which is preserved in the British Museum, (Bibl. Birch, 4452) we have an amusing specimen of the style of preaching which prevailed in those days. He sets out with shewing, that by the Sion in the text, was meant “the puir Kirk o’ Scotland,” and then asks, “wha has wounded her, trow ye?” “To this purpose,” he says, “I’se tell you a tale; but I’ll no say ‘tis true; but be it true, or be it fause, tak it as I tak it, a God’s benison.” When I was a young lad, there was a winsome man Student o’ Theology at the College o’ Aberdeen; and he was to mak a preaching before the Maisters, Regents o’ the College, and out o’ a’ the Holy Scripture o’ God he wailed this text:—

“What will ye gi me, and I’ll betray him to ye?” and he could ha’ said it in Latin, (Quid dabitis?) And there was an honest auld man in a blew cap, sitting at the feet o’ the pewpitt, and he says till him, “Sir, gin ye betray him, I’se gie ye a good fat bishopric.” Now ye may learn by this, wha it is that betrays and wounds the peace o’ the Kirk o’ Scotland.” Having thus fixed the sin of wounding Sion or the Kirk of Scotland on the prelates, he proceeds to show how she was wounded; first, in her head; second, in her hand; third, in her heart; and fourthly, in her feet. Of the first head there are three subdivisions, shewing how the prelates had wounded the Kirk. 1st. “With the sword o’ their pride.” 2d. “With the sword o’ their gluttony.” and 3d. “With the sword o’ their covetousness.” In illustrating the fourth head, or wounding the feet, he says, “I can remember weel since the Kirk o’ Scotland might have been likened to a bonny nag, that could have ambled and paced it fu’ sweetly; but the bishops, these galloping swingers, they gat o’ the back o’ the nag, an’ they quited jaded him up to ruin, for they laid upon his back the Book o’ Common Prayer, the Book o’ Canons, and since they cam frae Lunan, the Aith o’ Supremacy, and the Kirk law-books. I wonder what errand they had there; but, beloved, what here and what there, they ha sae used him, that they have no left him a fast nail in his feet. Having discussed the four sorts of wounds, the preacher proceeds.—

“And now, beloved, we may tell a tale without laughter; we can liken her to a nag; but Balaam’s ass, for in that story there is four things to be heeded: 1st. The ass, that we may compare to the Kirk o’ Scotland. 2dly. The riders, that’s e’en the proud bishops. 3dly. The auge that stopt the ass by the way; and wh trow ye that it? I’se sure ye wad fain hear that. Its e’en my gude Lord Eglington, God’s benison light on his bonny face. There he sits, the trimmest sight that e’er the puir Kirk o’ Scotland saw. 4thly. There was a portmanteau behind that nag, an what trow ye was in it? E’en the Book of Common Prayer an the Book of Canons, an the Aith o’ Supremacy, and the Kirk law-books; But I hope the good angel will take him (episcopacy) out o’ the saddle, for he hings by the hough, hauf in and hauf out; fain wad he keep in; an’ tellys ye, let him but stay in, and he’ll na’ trouble ye wi’ a portmanteau any more; but the de’e’s a wily pow; let him but get in his little finger, an’ he’ll soon get in his whole hand; let but the loon get in the saddle, and we may a’ pow till we are weary before we get him out again. But a word or two o’ use; an first a word o’ encouragement to a’ the gude people that ha’ already set their hearts an’ hands to the reading an’ avowing the solemn league an’ covenant. Weel, I say uae mare but this, as ye ha begun this gude work, e’en sa perfect it, an’ ye shall nae want your reward in heaven.”

“Dilemma.—A preacher, who had but one sermon, which he had delivered on the Sunday, being praised by the lord of the place, was called upon to preach on the next day, which was a fast day. The preacher ruminated the whole night on what he was to do, to rescue himself from the predicament in which he was placed. The dreaded hour arrived, when he mounted the pulpit, and with great solemnity, said, “Brethren, some persons have accused me of advancing propositions to you yesterday, contrary to the faith, and of having misrepresented many passages of Scripture. Now, to convince you how much I have been wronged, and to make known to you the purity of my doctrine, I shall repeat my sermon, so pray be attentive.”

“Revocation of the Edict of Nantz.—When it became evident that the King of France intended to revoke the edict of Nantz, the ministers of the Church of Charente kept many days of solemn fasting and prayer. On one of these occasions, when they had been engaged all day in exercises of devotion, an eminent minister attended the pulpit, and in a lively manner set before the people the danger of the Ark of God. His heart was so full, that he could not go on; and there were floods of tears shed, and an universal outcry throughout the assembly. After a considerable pause, he resumed the discourse, but was again interrupted by excess of sorrow; upon which, he turned his discourse into prayer, and with great fervour interceded for the mercy of God, acknowledged his justice in whatever he should bring upon them, and by a very solemn resignation, laid themselves and all their privileges at his feet, begging, that if he saw it for his own honour to suffer the bodies of that generation to fall in the wilderness, he would revive his work in the next; to which the whole congregation gave their assent by a loud —Amen.

Henry Brooke.—One Sunday, while the congregation were assembled in the rural church of the parish in which lived the amiable Henry Brooke, author of the Fool of Quality, and other admired works, they waited a long time the arrival of their clergyman. At last, despairing of his coming, they conjectured that some accident had befallen him; and being averse to depart without some edification, they, with one accord, requested that Mr. Brooke would perform the service for them, and expound a part of the Scriptures. Mr. Brooke, though not in orders, consented; and, after the preliminary prayers were over, he opened the Bible, and preached extemporarily on the first text that caught his eye. In the middle of his discourse, the clergyman entered, and found the whole congregation in tears. He entreated Mr. Brooke to proceed, but this he modestly declined; and the clergyman as modestly declared, that after the testimony of superior abilities which he perceived in the moist eyes of all present, he would think it presumption and folly to hazard any thing of his own. Accordingly, the concluding prayers alone were said, and the congregation dismissed for the day.

English Preachers.—It has been observed of Jeremy Taylor, that while he displayed great power of expression, and a rich exuberance of fancy, he blended true sense, false wit, and pedantic quotation. This misfortune, the result of a taste pedantic and affected, was partly the fault of the man, and partly of the time. Taylor, indeed, by the fire and vigour of his genius, threw off all the cold and phlegmatic pedantry which chilled and clouded the invention of such preachers as Bishop Andrews. He stood on a kind of isthmus between the affectations which disgraced the pulpit in the reign of James the First, and the classic purity, united with clear ratiocination, which began to develop themselves after the restoration of his grandson.

The writers and preachers of the reign of Charles the First, seem to have studied themselves out of their understanding and their taste together. In their pulpit declamations, addressed for the most part to congregations more illiterate than their descendants of the present generation, these learned triflers could not prove a point of Christian doctrine from St. Paul, or urge, a Christian duty from the words of Christ. Their astonished audiences must hear in languages which they had never learned, what a whole series of Christian fathers had said on the one, and a whole tribe of heathen moralists on the other. To render such a mode of public instruction profitable, or even tolerable, the gift of interpreting tongues ought to have revived in the church. These learned and senseless farrales were further disgraced by the spirit of witticism and punning, which proved something worse than the preacher's want of taste—his want of seriousness; for no man who had a proper sense of the office of a Christian preacher, would have either leisure or inclination to twist a pun, or trifle with the jangling of words. Meanwhile, "The hungry sheep look'd up, and were not fed."

It may seem a wild and groundless imagination, that this unedifying and pedantic way of preaching, contributed to the downfall of the church which followed; but it must be remembered, that this very depravation in the mode of public instruction, gave birth to another style of oratory in the coarse mouths of the puritans, at once slovenly and unlearned, but powerful and enthusiastic, which reached every understanding, moved every heart; and when directed, as it quickly was, against the governors and government of the church, became the most powerful engine in subverting it.

At the restoration of Charles the Second, the old race of orthodox preachers were either dead or dumb from age; while the rude brawlers of the commonwealth were condemned to silence, or to secret conventicles; profligate, however, as he was, and indifferent to all doctrines, Charles had a true taste for style; and as the decencies of his station condemned him to hear one sermon weekly, he determined, that whatever became of his conscience, his ear and understanding, at least, should not be offended. The revolution was instant; nor did the transition appear more abrupt and striking from the sourness of the court of Oliver, to the dissolute gaiety of that of Charles; than from the cant, the nonsense, and the sanctified blasphemy of Goodwin, Sterry, and Hugh Peters, to the irresistible reasonings and the majestic energy of Barrow; or at a somewhat later period, to the more diffuse and captivating eloquence of Tillotson.

The Eton Latin Grammar; being an Introduction to the Latin Tongue; revised, corrected, and greatly improved. Enriched also with copious Notes. By the Rev. T. Smith. 12mo. pp. 220. London, 1821.

WHILE every improvement has been made in elementary treatises on education, comparatively little attention has been paid to facilitating the study of Greek and Latin, if we except some theoretical works little calculated for youth. The Eton Latin Grammar, though a work of great merit, was not free from faults, and was particularly deficient in the accentuation of words. This error has been very carefully corrected by the present editor, who has not only marked the accents, but also the quantity of every Latin syllable in the book. The notes are valuable, and will be found of great service to the student who has made some progress in the language.

The Peerage Chart for 1821.

THIS chart is similar to that published last year, of which we spoke very favourably, with such additions and alterations as time has rendered necessary. It presents a complete coup d'œil of the British nobility, and should have a place in every library. It appears, from a general summary, that the descent of 156 peers can be traced to the conquest, or 11th century; that of 51 to the 12th century; 52 to the 13th century; 35 to the 14th century; 50 to the 16th century; 59 to the 17th century; and three to the 18th century. The ancestors of seventy-eight of the peers, whose descent can be traced to the conquest, were settled in England previous to that event; the other seventy-eight came over with the conqueror.

The Baronetage Chart for 1821.

THE success of the Peerage Chart has induced the author to construct one on the same plan, for the baronets of the united kingdom. It contains the date of the creation, age of the present baronets, number of children, if any, and the nature of the services for which the title was first obtained. The number of English baronets is 624. Of these, 11 have acquired their titles by diplomatic services—52 by naval—56 by military—20 by civil—47 by legal—14 by medical—20 by civic—10 as courtiers—12 by marriage—and 392 chiefly on account of their wealth. Eighty-three baronets can trace their paternal ancestry to the conquest.

The Secretary's Assistant; exhibiting the various and most correct Modes of Superscription, Commencement, and Conclusion of Letters to Persons of every Degree of Rank. By the Author of the Peerage and Baronetage Charts. 12mo. pp. 136. London, 1821.

We could not, perhaps, urge any thing stronger in favour of the utility of such a work as the one before us, than the recommendation of the Psalmist, which the author has very happily selected as a motto—"Give unto every man his proper title, lest he be offended, and ye betray your ignorance." Such persons as have had occasion to mix much in the world, and particularly in the titled world, must have observed the punctiliousness with which many individuals watch that they are addressed by their proper title. The omission of any portion of it, or the substitution of Knt. for Bart., or C. B. for G. C. B., with them would be a very heavy offence, and if the writer should be seeking any favour, he would either be refused, or, at least, rebuked for his inattention to these little but very essential details in epistolary correspondence. The 'Secretary's Assistant' is an infallible guide in this respect, and we give it our hearty recommendation.

A Grammar of the English Language, in which the Genius of the English Tongue is consulted, and all Imitations of the Greek and Latin Grammars are discarded. By W. G. Lewis. 12mo. pp. 216. London, 1821.

We are very far from thinking, that Mr. Lewis's work will ever get extensively introduced into schools, but as its object is to render the acquisition of a knowledge of grammar, within the reach of persons who have little leisure, and cannot avail themselves of the assistance of a teacher, it may assist the purposes of self-instruction.

CORONATION SERMON

GEORGE THE THIRD.

[WHILE we, in pursuance of our promise, were preparing an article on the Coronation, a much valued correspondent, to whom we are largely indebted, sent us a copy of the last Coronation Sermon, which is now become so scarce and valuable, that we believe we can do our readers no better service than by re-printing it. The sermon was preached by Dr. Robert Drummond, then Bishop of Salisbury, but a few days after promoted to the Archbishopric of York. 'The concluding part of this discourse,' says a contemporary writer on the subject,

* Thompson, in his Coronation Ceremonies, for a review of which, see Lit. Chron. No. 48.

'time has since shown to be almost a prophecy, at least it was the best prayer which loyalty could offer to heaven for a beloved monarch, and has been amply fulfilled.' We make no further apology for laying the whole before our readers.—Ed.

A Sermon Preached at the Coronation of King George III. and Queen Charlotte, in the Abbey Church of Westminster, September, 22, 1761. By Robert, Lord Bishop of Sarum. Published by His Majesty's special Command.

1 KINGS, x. 9.—Because the Lord loved Israel for ever, therefore made he thee king, to do judgment and justice.

THESE words were addressed to Solomon, when he ruled over Israel in the fear of God, and his kingdom was established greatly.—We need not employ our reflections upon the history which occasioned them: we need not enter into the reasons of the peculiar Providence which God exercised over the Jews, or the special appointment of Solomon to the throne of David his father.—The words convey a general proposition, full of instruction; and correspond to that Providence by which all kings reign and all princes decree justice. They are not, surely, unworthy the attention either of the prince or of the people, and may well claim our regard on this solemnity, which affords ample matter for our best affections to work upon; which calls for our devoutest thanks to the Giver of every good gift, for the blessings we already enjoy; and raises in us a confident expectation of the continuance and increase of them.

The words lead us naturally to two important truths:—

1st. That when great and good kings reign, they are the means by which God blesses a people.—It is not said, because the Lord loved Solomon, but because he loved Israel, therefore made he Solomon king.

2dly. That the duty and end of royalty is to do judgment and justice.

The Supreme Governor of the world, constantly exercising his providence in promoting the virtue and happiness of his rational creatures, put man under strong obligations of necessity, convenience, and inclination, thereby to draw him into society; and left him in the hand of his own counsel to reap the benefits of it; to form models of government, to enact laws, and pursue order for the peace, safety, and public good of mankind. For these gracious purposes, all the powers that be, are ordained of God. When these powers are separated from the public good, nothing can be more unnatural and destructive; when united with it, nothing more just and beneficial: and the true end of civil society is then only attained, when the people are blessed.

The merit of wise and righteous government must certainly redound to the honour of the person who administers it: the divine prerogative of communicating happiness and glory to a great people, of feeding them with a faithful and true heart, and ruling them prudently with all his power, must surely fill the mind of a prince with that inward delight and satisfaction, that attend every act of a conspicuous and distinguished virtue; but the general utility is to the people: and however he may partake of their felicity, the difficulty, the disquietude, the constant care lie upon the prince.

Is it a small thing to hold the reins of government, and direct its course with ability and uprightness? Every considerate man must be sensible of the weight, and every honest man will endeavour to support the hand that bears it. Supported and assisted it must be in the extensive concerns of a great kingdom; but the colour, the vigour, the consistency of public conduct rest chiefly upon the prince himself. To be acquainted with the connexions and dependencies of power, and to look through their force and consequences; to protect a nation from foreign injury and domestic disorder; to execute law, to exercise authority, and secure obedience, by an uniform and well-tempered scheme of mercy and goodness, of truth and faithfulness, of justice and impartiality; are matters of no ordinary skill and care. Solid principles of wisdom and virtue, enlarged views, a discerning spirit, strength and presence of mind, with constant application and watchfulness, are required to keep the sources pure, from whence flow all the benefits of civil government and order.

Is it a small thing to stand firm in so elevated a situation? not to give way to the self-sufficiency of power, or the security of ease, or the allurements of grandeur, which too often pervert even the best dispositions of natural temper, and vitiate the heart? to be superior to all the temptations which so independent a station suggests? and to avoid all the defects that diminish a great character as well as those that corrupt a good one?—Whoever knows mankind must allow the heart to be very resolute and steadfast in its integrity, which, under such trials, can pursue its course invariably towards the highest perfection.

Besides these difficulties, which arise from the weight of government, and the hazard of moving amidst so many snares; other difficulties may occur in particular cases.—To succeed to a prince, whose grave was just covered with the unfeigned tears of his happy and grateful subjects; who had long been accustomed to love and reverence him as their common father and friend;—to succeed to a kingdom full of power, and riches, and honour, whose name stands foremost among the nations, and whose fame is raised to a pitch above the praise of former ages;—to succeed with the warmest expectations and inclinations of men of all ranks, interests, and opinions:—this, undoubtedly, affords a pleasing prospect; but, at the same time, it calls for all the faculties of an understanding heart to profit by these favourable circumstances; to maintain the affections of the people, the stability of the throne, and the glory of the nation.

Whoever looks through the appearances of things, must see, that even they, who are the worthiest and fittest to be instructed [intrusted] with royalty, cannot be free from difficulty and care; and that the benefit does not accrue so much to them as to the community. This is the purpose of Providence thus to extend its blessings, and this purpose is in fact answered, in proportion to the goodness of the prince. He bears the weight of government, that his subjects may live easy under it; he avails himself of the prerogative, and resists the dangers of his exalted station, that he may be a living law to them; and he exerts himself to act up to the glory in which he finds his people, that their security, tranquillity, and power may be established, strengthened, settled. To a just prince, the difficulties will be rather a spur to action than a curb; because he will be ever warmly animated with the love of his country: his mind will be free, and strong, and constant, because it is pure; and he will find his dignity in that, in which alone it can really consist—in fulfilling his duty; in doing judgment and justice.

This is the second consideration arising from the words of the text:—Because the Lord loved Israel for ever, therefore made he thee king, to do judgment and justice.

The reason of things to an attentive mind makes it evident, that man cannot be set up on high above his fellow-creatures, merely for his own indulgence, dominion, and advantage.

External greatness, pre-eminence, and honours are indeed due to all that are in authority, and should be maintained; and, above all, when we look up to the supreme head, that is set upon the throne of a great kingdom, we naturally and justly pay the tribute of the most dutiful allegiance; and show constantly every mark of respect, submission, and veneration to the sacred character. Yet no tribute, which a king receives, can be compared to the glory which the greatness of his own mind feels, in doing judgment and justice. This is a talent intrusted with a prince, of which he must give an account; and it is a talent of the noblest kind, that can be committed into the hands of any of the sons of men: for he is the minister of God for the happiness of mankind, and, in discharging this trust faithfully, will be his wisdom and understanding and dignity in the sight of all nations.

This trust is best discharged when those principles are cultivated, from which cometh order and every good work.—To this end, a wise prince, for his own as well as his people's interest, will give public honour to pure religion and virtue; and, for their support, to knowledge and science and every thing that is praise-worthy.—This conduct will give encouragement and life to whatsoever things are true, honest, just, pure, lovely, and of good report; will keep vice, infidelity, and prophaneness in awe; and thwart the selfish and dangerous designs of wicked men. The sentiments, the manners, the passions, the pursuits of many will take a right tendency; and who-ever are bound by the tie of a well-informed conscience, will preserve a sincere respect to law and a cheerful obedience to government; which, without that tie, no authority can command, no power can enforce. Such a conduct will raise the dignity of a prince; will constitute the genius, form the character, and fix the credit of a people; and, steadily pursued, will produce happiness beyond this age to the community, and to the individuals beyond this life.

A wise prince will not only cultivate those principles, which strengthen the bands by which every society is knit together; but he will also unalterably adhere to those means, and pursue those ends, which secure the foundations and promote the benefits of the constitution, at the head of which he is placed. If this happy lot fall in a country, where the constitution in church and state is founded upon the principles of purity and freedom, and justly poised between the extremes of power and liberty, he will find himself clothed with every degree of authority, that a heart well-intentioned can desire, and at the head of a constitution the best formed to convey peace and happiness to mankind; and it will be easy to him to make the law the rule of his actions, as he measures his own interest by that of his people, and his own duty by the public good. A free constitution hath numberless depending motions, which are necessary to check each other, and which may be sometimes stopped or disordered by the passions of men; it requires, therefore, early, resolute, and uniform vigilance in the administration of government; but these very checks mark out more distinctly the mutual interest of prince and people, and necessitate both to pursue it, if they are true to themselves. In such a constitution, the power of the prince is not absolute, but sufficient for every right purpose, and which a great and good mind will delight in executing. The obedience of the people is the obedience of men, not slaves,—unforced and unfeigned, and therefore the more honourable and more acceptable to an upright king; and the temper, the affection, the rigour, which liberty inspires, will carry the dignity and greatness of a sovereign to a higher pitch, than can be attained by any other principle of government.

When these public demonstrations of wise and righteous administration are strengthened by the prince's personal example of love to true religion and to the constitution, the hopes and happiness of a people are built upon the surest foundation. When a prince acts under an habitual persuasion of his dependance upon God, he gives the strongest pledge of right and steady conduct towards man. A mind well endowed, and a heart well disposed, are not easily drawn aside into the crooked paths of oppression or cunning, but are rooted and grounded in true policy, which dispenses blessings all around. A character thus founded in virtue, will scatter away all evil with his eyes, and will not only maintain a decorum in manners, so essential to dignity, but exact it incessantly and yet powerfully from others. Enlarged principles of sound religion will en-ble him to act with ease and firmness and honour in every occurrence; and the efficacy of so eminent a pattern will insinuate itself through all degrees of men. When, to complete this amiable character, the love of the constitution is known to be implanted in the bosom of a prince, this spirit will diffuse itself through all orders of his subjects: his example will secure it, his influence will improve it, his countenance will create emulation in every honest heart to perpetuate it; and the fruit of this conduct will be mutual confidence, strength, and glory.

When he that ruleth over men, founds his dignity in thus fulfilling his duty, God is truly loving unto that nation, and his blessing is upon that people.

When we rejoice in making the application, let us also seriously consider the duty we owe to the Almighty, who hath shewn this loving kindness to us; and the duty we owe to that prince, who is the instrument in the hands of Providence to bestow these blessings upon us. But the most signal bounty of Providence, the most assiduous care and concern of a prince for the public welfare, cannot make a corrupt, a dissolute, or an abject people happy. Let favour be shewed to the wicked, yet will he not learn righteousness; in the land of uprightness will he deal unjustly, and will not behold the mercy or the majesty of the Lord. We must fear God before we can create a confidence that we honour the king with a steadfast heart. It becometh us to walk uprightly in both these paths of duty, which coincide, and to preserve a constant sense of due subordination, and a right conduct in our respective stations. Conscience, gratitude, and even self-love, should prompt us to lessen the weight and heighten the dignity of the crown; and should incite us to co-operate, by all the means in our power, to maintain the cause of pure religion and virtue, of just government and liberty.—If we do not, we shall despise and defeat our own happiness; and the blessings offered to us will aggravate our condemnation. But such fears would ill become this day. Let us promise ourselves better things; and let our present prayers to the Most High, who ruleth in the kingdom of men, be the sincere pledges of our uniform and hearty endeavours, that the reign of the king may be one uninterrupted course of felicity to him and to his kingdoms.

What then remains, but to exhort

you; and what can be more becoming this great and solemn occasion, than to offer up the most fervent supplications with one mind to heaven; that the holy spirit of that God, in whose presence the king and people are preparing to declare their mutual engagements, may pour into their hearts a sincere zeal for each other's happiness, and unite them in the strictest bands of affection? May the sacred oath, which our sovereign takes at the altar of the King of kings, ever recur to his mind, as the genuine intentions of his own heart. May the homage, which we pay him in all truth and faithfulness, be bound upon our hearts and minds with the ties of duty, gratitude, and love! and from us, may unfeigned loyalty spread itself through all ranks, give a right temper to the conduct of all his subjects, and establish his kingdom. May justice and judgment be the habitation of his throne! May mercy and truth go before his face! May the Almighty mark every year with fresh instances of his goodness to him and to his people! May every happiness of private life alleviate the cares of royalty! and every blessing of public prosperity, yea, and abundance of peace be in his day! Late may he becalmed to an heavenly crown of eternal glory! And here on earth, through the mercy of the Most High, to these kingdoms, long with unsullied lustre may his crown flourish, under the guidance of that wisdom in whose right hand are length of days and honour! Amen.

MARIAN; A SKETCH:

A free Translation from the Welsh.

MARIAN, didst thou but feel the powerful operation of love that rends my heart and fires my veins, thy tender and compassionate nature would quickly allay the flames that threaten destruction to whatever of mortality belongs to me.

Resign thee, then, my soul unto thy fate!

Presumptuous will it be in me to solicit thee, oh Marian, for a reciprocal return of that affection with which my heart bounds to thee.

Fain would I wish thee devoid of those possessions, that intitle thee to wealthy suitors, and render my advances arrogant.

Thy native charms, the beams of understanding that radiate from thy polished brow, thy gentleness, thy piety, my adorable Marian, have captivated a heart impenetrable by haughty beauty or sordid riches.

Then, Marian, fare thee well! Thy wealth has formed a barrier to my happiness on earth. Oh, pity me, ye woods, where erst I haunted in your shade, and sung my Marian's praise. Ah, miserable me! no sympathizing sigh for me, ye utter! Impressed with thy mind's perfections, and all those qualifications to make life happy, I bid the world and thee adieu. My harp, which sweetly tuned thy praise, hangs now unstrung, beneath yon blighted oak; now, welcome Death, thy icy hand shall quickly cool the ardour of my throbbing heart, beneath this willow tree. Then, Marian, fare thee well!

POETICAL COINCIDENCES;

ON,

'A breeze whispering among the trees.'

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—With but few exceptions, the English poets have shewn so warm an attachment for the couplet of which I write, that it does not require an apology for its introduction to your pages. Whether the using of particular epithets be essential or not to produce genuine poetry, I will not inquire;—that, in almost all of the ancients as well as the moderns, such and such phrases exist, a few examples may suffice, and prove clearly the ridiculous affectation of critics attributing this idea or that sentence to some antecedent or contemporary poet. Although few of the excellent in versification have been accustomed to a seafaring life, yet it is astonishing how they have eulogized the breeze! Nor have the majority of them, perhaps, spent much of their time in cathedrals, yet how they exult in the whisper! Whenever they sat down in a shady valley in some delicious reverie of inspiration, the charm, it should appear, could not be wound up without a breeze to hush its whispers among the trees.

I should intrude, Sir, were I to give illustrations from Cowley, Milton, Spenser, and many others of the earlier schools of poetry; but, as Pope thought it right to satirise the writers of his day with a smart breeze, I will whisper a word or two among the trees of Twickenham, about him:—

'As snows collected on the mountains freeze,
When milder regions breathe a vernal breeze,
The fleecy pile obeys the whispering gales,—
Ends in a stream, and murmurs thro' the vales.'

Hooper's Odyssey, book 10, p. 123.

Before I proceed further, sir, I would remark, that in most instances there is much murmuring in the cloisters of rural solitude for those—

'Who bear from rustling oaks Jove's dark decrees;
And catch the fates, low whisper'd in the breeze.'

Ibid., book 16, p. 96.

Tickell, in expressing his admiration of the Earl of Warwick's scenery in the Spectator, says,—

'How sweet the glooms beneath thy aged trees,
Thy noontide shadow, and thy evening breeze!'

P. 3.

And Addison, with increased satisfaction replies, that—

'The acut comes warm in every breeze.'

P. 94.

He then would praise—

'The tenderness of his trees,
Chide the late spring and lingering western breeze.'

Translat. 125.

Where buzzes echo through the hive—

'Like winds that softly murmur thro' the trees.'

P. 129.

And, wonderful to know,—

'All this is done when first the western breeze
Beoms the year.'—P. 131.

But, as St. Cecilia ought to have the pre-eminence in charming the ear, she makes—

'A thousand trills and quivering sounds
In airy circles o'er us fly,
Till, wafted by a gentle breeze,
They faint and languish by degrees,
And at a distance die!—Ode, p. 137.

Poor tender creatures! But Mrs. Singer will give you a joyful resurrection, in—

'The eastern breeze,
And send you dancing thro' the trembling trees.'

Pastoral. p. 52.

And Solomon being renowned for wisdom, Prior becomes his ambassador, to raise,—

'By just degrees,
From valleys crown'd with flowers, and hills with trees.'

Sol. p. 93.

Mrs. Rowe was very partial to—

'The whispering breeze
Among the trees,

And Watts, who felt reciprocally with her, in his lyrical effusions, sends her back on—

'Young zephyrs breathing o'er the stream,
Or whispers thro' the trees.'

And sometimes in

'The weening breeze
Sporting thro' the trees.'

Although Andrew Marvell declared it but—

'Only a fluttering breeze
Discombing with the breathing trees.'

Thomson, who had an eye for nature,

'Look'd thro' the trees and heard

'The hollow whispering breeze,'—P. 24.

in spring; and in his hymn he sung,—

'In hollow whispering gales.'—P. 141.

Further, in his Castle of Indolence, p. 258,—

'Aerial music in the warbling wind,
At distance rising off, by small degrees,
Nearer and nearer came, till o'er the trees
It hung.'

But in his 'Nuptial Song,' p. 314,—

'A genial spirit warms the breeze
Unseen among the blooming trees.'

While—

'In the quivering trees,'

Mrs. Opie makes

'Soft zephyrs sigh.'—P. 124.

On the other hand, Montgomery sings,—

'Thus the pestilent upas, the demon of trees,
Its boughs o'er the wilderness spreads,
And with livid contagion polluting the breeze,
Its misdeeds influence spreads.'—P. 162.

Whereas Leigh Hunt, in his Foliage, admired—

'The new-mown hay that scents the swelling breeze,
Or cottage chimney smoking thro' the trees.'

And Shelley's Queen Mab swam on

'The lightest leaf
That quivers to the passing breeze.'

But, sir, as I dare say you think I am extending my observations beyond your convenience and patience, lest I should infringe on the one and tire the other, it behoves me to draw to a conclusion: at the same time, I have dozens of breezes in my folio, yet on record, especially of Blackmore, Ferguson, Scott, Campbell, Watts, and others; for, as you like it, Shakespeare says,—

'Tongues I'll hang on every tree,
That shall civil sayings show.'

Your's respectfully, CANTAB.

Biography.

NAPOLEON BONAPARTE, EX-EMPEROR OF FRANCE.

'A name at which the world grew pale.'

THE most extraordinary individual that any age or country ever produced—Napoleon Bonaparte—is no more.

He whose will was law to countless millions,—whose empire threatened to swallow up the whole world, and who had only to say to one king or emperor 'go, and he goeth; and to another, come, and he cometh;' he who but yesterday might—

'Have stood against the world, now lies he there,
And none so poor to do him reverence.'

But, as a living poet has beautifully expressed it:—

'All must die; kings, princes must obey
The freeing call. Statesmen must one day stoop.

To pay their court to the despoil'd tomb;
Laymen must thus refund the fee of life;
Heroes unarm'd, forgetting sieges, battles—
Must, far from glory and the sound of praise,
Take their last station.'

The news of Napoleon's death, which must, we think, excite sympathy even in the coldest heart, reached town on Wednesday, and although we would gladly have accompanied our first announcement of the event with a connected memoir of his life, yet we are compelled for the present to give a brief and imperfect sketch.

There was a time, and with some, perhaps, it is not yet past, when it was fashionable to load Bonaparte with every accusation that malice could invent. Not only every virtue, but even every talent was denied to him. Posterity, to which will be left ample materials, will, perhaps, do him that justice which party prejudice has hitherto denied him, and while it records his errors, will not be insensible to his merits, or to the services he has rendered.

One of the most frequent charges against Bonaparte was his low origin, which, though a thousand times refuted, was still renewed on every occasion. His brother, Louis, the Ex-King of Holland, has, however, in his 'Historical Documents,' traced back his family to the middle of the thirteenth century, when one of his ancestors was Potesta of Parma, and a Knight of the order of Gaudenti†. The Bonaparte family, which had been long fixed in Corsica, in subsequent ages, quitted it when it was ceded to the English, and settled first at Lavalette, near Toulon. Napoleon was the eldest son of Carlo and Letitia Bonaparte, and was born at Ajaccio, in the Island of Corsica, on the 15th of August, 1769, the same year that gave birth to his great opponent, the Duke of Wellington. He was educated in the Military School, at Brienne, in France, and first distinguished himself at the siege of Toulon, when that place was in possession of the English. His military career was marked by a rapidity known only during periods of revolution; and, at the age of twenty-seven, he was appointed to the command of the French army in Italy, when he defeated the Archduke Charles and the ferocious Suvoroff, and, running a glorious career of victory, made peace with Austria on terms highly favourable to France. He afterwards projected the memorable expedition to Egypt, and returned to France in sufficient time to rescue her from the distracted councils of the Executive Directory, which he dissolved in as summary a manner as Oliver Cromwell did the English Parliament. He was appointed First Consul for a limited term of years, and afterwards for life. New triumphs, in a new war against Austria, enabled him again to compel that power to make peace on terms still more advantageous, and, in 1804, he was raised to the throne, under the title of Emperor of the French, and was crowned by the Pope. Every succeeding year added new glories to his military fame, and new territories to his empire; until he succeeded in raising four of his brothers to thrones, and placing one of his generals the next in succession to the throne of Sweden. The whole of Europe, England excepted, succumbed to his power; and the continental sovereigns and princes attended his summons like vassal lords doing homage. At length, vaulting ambition, that o'erleaps itself, urged him to the war in Spain, where, during a period of almost twenty years, he met with his first reverses. The Russian campaign followed, in which he lost the finest, most numerous, and best appointed army that ever took the field. After returning to France, he raised a new army, and again took the field with varied success, until, at length, the tide of war, which he had urged from the Rhine to the Moskwa, rolled back upon him, and he was compelled to contend on French ground. Never, perhaps, did Bonaparte display so much skill as on this occasion, when, with a mere handful of men, he kept the armies of Russia, Austria, Prussia, &c. from Paris. At length, however, the capital fell into the hands of the allies, and Bonaparte abdicated the throne on the condition of having the island of Elba in perpetual sovereignty, and a pension from France. This pension was not paid, and, on the 20th of February, 1815, Napoleon, with a few hundred faithful followers, left the island, and landed at Frejus on the 1st of March; a more daring enterprise was never undertaken, nor one attended with such success: the armies sent to oppose him, on seeing him, voluntarily threw down their arms amidst cries of Vive l'Empereur, and, in a march the most triumphant that history records, he reached Paris on the 20th, and immediately resumed his imperial sway. One act will distinguish this reign of a hundred days, and render it memorable:—the abolition of the slave trade by France, which England was too tame to demand, and Louis not generous enough to do, was effected by a single stroke of Napoleon's pen. The powers of Europe, however, were determined, if possible, to dethrone him, and large armies entered France. Bonaparte raised a considerable, but ill organized force to meet them; the battle of Waterloo followed, in which his army was utterly defeated. He returned to the capital and abdicated in favour of his son, but France, ungrateful France, would no longer support him when deserted by fortune, and he quitted Paris in hopes of escaping to America. Finding this impracticable, he surrendered to an English ship of war, throwing himself, as he said, into the hands of the most determined, but the 'most generous of his enemies.' How little claim our conduct had to the last title was proved by sending him to St. Helena, where the privations and restrictions he was under were much greater than his safe custody required. From this custody he was released by the merciful hand of Death on the 5th of May. The best particulars that have hitherto transpired respecting this event, are as follows:—

The illness of the Ex-Emperor lasted, on the whole, six weeks. The effects of this long illness on the frame of Bonaparte, as described by an officer who had frequent opportunities of seeing him during that period, were so powerful as nearly to reduce him to a skeleton, and to obliterate all traces of his former features. During the latter part of his illness, he frequently conversed with his medical attendants on its nature, of which he seemed to be perfectly aware. He declared that it was hereditary, and that his father had died of the same disease. It is said that he gave directions about his affairs and papers till five or six hours before he died, having retained his senses till that period. He said he wished to be opened, in order that his son might be informed of the nature of his disease. The body was opened by his own surgeon. On examination, the stomach was found in a state of extreme ulceration, so that it appeared in some places perforated in large openings. His medical attendants gave it as their decided opinion, in which the physician who was called in coincided, that the disease was incurable, and that the climate had had no effect in producing it. One trait of character displayed itself in his last moments, which marks the—

'Rolling passion, strong in death.'

As he found his end approach, he was habited, at his own request, in his uniform of field marshal, with boots and spurs, and placed on a camp-bed, on which he was accustomed to sleep when in health, and preferred to every other. In this dress he expired*.

It has been asserted that the Rosario, which brought the dispatches, also brought the body of Bonaparte to England; but this, we understand, is not the case. His attendants wished his body to be conveyed to Europe; but on opening his will, it was found that he had left a request that it should be interred in the island, and pointed out the spot where he wished his remains to rest, in a beautiful valley near his residence. Though Bonaparte is supposed to have suffered much, his dissolution was so calm and serene, that not a sigh escaped him, or any intimation to the by-standers that it was so near. At the departure of the Rosario, no day had been fixed for the funeral, but it was understood that it would be solemnized with the military honours due to his rank.

A likeness of Bonaparte, after his decease, was sketched by an English officer, and is brought to England. Count Moatholon, we hear, arrived by the ship which brought the intelligence of this event, and immediately forwarded it by an extraordinary courier to the French ambassador. Numerous expresses left town immediately, to announce the death of Bonaparte to the different European courts.

To this very imperfect sketch, for which want of time must be our apology, we add a few anecdotes, referring our readers to our preceding volumes for several others †.

In March, 1779, Napoleon, being then in his tenth year, was sent to the school of Brienne, in Champagne, which was superintended by some of the holy fathers, called Minims. Of a silent and stern disposition, prone to solitude and meditation, he seemed as if cast by nature for the rigid order of life imposed by the rules of the establishment. Each pupil was locked up by himself at night in a cell, the whole furniture of which consisted of a girth bed, an iron water picher and basin; yet gloomy as this seclusion was, young Napoleon preferred retiring to it during the intervals of scholastic exercise, to joining with his school-mates in their usual sports and amusements. At a later period he was wont to prose into his solitary studies in a little garden, which he had contrived to inclose for his own exclusive use, by prevailing on some of the scholars to assign to him the shares allotted to them, and adding these to his own. It has been told of him at this period, that on one occasion when the other school boys were thrown into great consternation by the explosion of a fire-work which they were engaged in preparing, and when some of them, in their haste to get out of the way of the danger, broke through into the territory of the young soldatier, he seized his garden tools, and attacking the invaders, drove them with equal spirit and non-chalance back into the midst of the peril from which they were seeking to escape. In consequence of these cold and forbidding features in his character, he soon acquired the nick-name of the Spartan, which he retained during his residence at Brienne.

The branch of study to which Napoleon directed his almost undivided attention, was mathematics. He paid but little attention to the languages, and still less to the elegant arts; nay, even in writing he is said to have taken so little pleasure, as to neglect it almost entirely: whence it has arisen, that we never hear of any paper written by him in his riper years, without a note of wonder either at its illegibility or its legible incorrectness, both in character and orthography.

With a book of mathematics or history—Enclid or Plutarch in his hand, his great delight was to shut himself up in his little garden, to walk and to meditate. His mind seemed for a long time to disdain all lower occupations and less important studies; but a desire for action at last broke in upon his repose, and he had no sooner mixed with his school-fellows for this purpose, than he began to act the part of the incipient general among them, taught them the military exercise, and instituted, for their usual sports, the combats of the Roman circus, and the evolutions of the Macedonian phalanx. His school-fellows began now to testify an uncommon desire of respect and attachment towards him; they felt, and were the first to pay tribute to that fascinating or rather commanding influence, which was afterwards so principal a means of raising him to empire and renown.

In the hard winter of 1783, Napoleon conceived the idea of constructing a little fort of snow. With the assistance of some of his most zealous comrades, and with no other instruments than the ordinary garden tools, he perfected a complete quadrangle, defended at the corners by four bastions, the walls of which were three feet and a half high. So well was it executed, that some remains of it were in existence many weeks afterwards. While it lasted, nothing but sieges and sallies were the order of the day.

Some of his leisure hours he employed in writing a poem on the liberty of his native country, Corsica. It was constructed on the idea, that the genius of his country had appeared to him in a dream, and putting a poignard in his hand, had called on him for vengeance. The effort appears to have been an abortive one; since beyond the bare mention of the piece, nothing more of it is recorded.

After he had passed five years in this academy, the royal inspector, on his annual examination, found him so well informed in the art of fortification, that he removed him to the ecole militaire, at Paris, where he arrived on the 17th of October, 1784. Here young Napoleon was under the direction of able and meritorious officers, and found excellent teachers in all the arts and sciences, particularly those connected with war. In the mathematics he had the celebrated Monge for his preceptor; and benefited so much by his instructions, that on passing his first examination after joining the school, he was placed as an officer in the corps of engineers.

While yet a cadet, he went on one occasion to witness the ascent of a balloon in the Champ de Mars. Impelled by an eager curiosity, he made his way through the crowd, and unperceived entered the inner fence which contained the apparatus for inflating the silken globe. It was then very nearly filled, and restrained from its aerial flight by the last cord only, when Napoleon requested the aéronaut to permit him to mount the car in company with him. This, however, was refused, from an apprehension that the feelings of the boy might embarrass the experiments; on which Bonaparte is stated to have exclaimed, 'I am young, it is true, but fear neither the powers of earth nor of air!' sternly adding, 'will you let me ascend?' The erratic philosopher sharply replied, 'No, sir, I will not; I beg that you will retire.' The little cadet, enraged at the refusal, instantly drew a small sabre, which he wore with his uniform, cut the balloon in several places, and destroyed the curious apparatus which the aéronaut had constructed with infinite labour and ingenuity for his experiment.

Such was the last notable act of the boyhood of Bonaparte; it would seem as if on the verge of manhood, he had in this one adventure prefigured the whole of that extraordinary career which he afterwards ran; as the clouds aspiring, as the air trackless, its only object to ascend; its only rudder the whirlwind; a vapour its impulse; downfall its destiny.

When Bonaparte was forming the Code Napoleon, he astonished the council of state by the readiness with which he illustrated any point in discussion by quoting whole passages, extempore, from the Roman civil law, a subject which might seem to be entirely foreign to him, as his whole life had been passed in the 'tented field.' On being asked by Treillard how he had acquired so familiar a knowledge of law affairs, he replied—'When I was merely a lieutenant, I was put under arrest, unjustly it is true; but that is nothing to the point. The little room which was assigned for my prison, contained no furniture but an old chair, an old bed, and an old cupboard; in the cupboard was a ponderous folio volume, older and more worm-eaten than all the rest; it proved to be the digest. As I had no paper, pens, ink, or pencils, you may easily imagine that this book was a valuable prize to me. It was so voluminous, and the leaves were so covered with marginal notes in manuscript, that, had I been confined a hundred years, I could never have been idle. I was only ten days deprived of my liberty; but, on recovering it, I was saturated with Justinian, and the decisions of the Roman legislators. Thus I picked up my knowledge of civil law.'

The first campaigns of the French after the revolution, were remarkable for that sudden excitement which precipitated towards the frontiers of France

a million of new and undisciplined men, to oppose by their courage and enthusiasm, the confederated force of the finest troops of which Europe could boast. The campaign of Italy presented Europe with a spectacle still more astonishing; in this one campaign, which was nothing but a continued series of battles, three armies were successively destroyed: more than one hundred and fifty colours were taken; forty thousand Austrians laid down their arms; the whole of Italy was conquered; and all these prodigies were achieved by no more than thirty thousand French, and a young general of twenty-eight years of age!

The rapidity with which the French army moved, far exceeded what Cæsar reports of the Roman legions in his Commentaries. The Roman legions marched at the rate of twenty-four miles a day; the French marched thirty, and fought every day.

It was a common saying with the troops,—"The general has discovered a new method of making war; he makes more use of our legs than of our bayonets."

On a subsequent occasion, when the extreme fatigue which the soldiers underwent was a subject of observation, Bonaparte observed, "if I force them to march, it is to spare their blood."

At the memorable passage of the Bridge of Lodi, it was not less the celerity and promptitude of movement than invincible heroism, that carried the day. The fire of the enemy, who defended the passage with thirty pieces of cannon, was terrible; the head of the charging column of the French appeared to give way; "a moment of hesitation," says Bonaparte, in his official despatch on the occasion, "would have lost all." "Generals Berthier, Massena, Cervoni, D'Allegagne, the chief of brigade Lanne, and the chief of battalion Dupat, dashed forwards at its head, and determined the fate of the day, still wavering in the balance." Bonaparte does not include his own name in the list of this heroic band, though well known to have been one of the foremost in the charge; the modesty which dictated this concealment, even his revilers must admire. "This redoubtable column," he continues, "overturned all opposed to it; Beaulieu's order of battle was broken; astonishment, flight, and death, were spread on all sides. In the twinkling of an eye the enemy's army was scattered in confusion."

"Although," he continues, "since the commencement of the campaign we have had some very warm affairs, and although the army has often been under the necessity of acting with great audacity, nothing has occurred which can be compared to the terrible passage of the Bridge of Lodi."

"Our loss has been small; and this we owe to the promptitude of the execution, and to the sudden effect which the charge of this intrepid column produced on the enemy."

TO WILLIAM,

In reply to his Enigma.

Your Enigma's solution oft comes from a goose,
Sometimes from a crow, cock, or hen—
(And above it hath tended myself to trace)
For 'tis what I am using—a pen.

It hath swam in the water and down thro' the air,

In the wings of the goose and the crow;
It tells, in the love-scroll, the thoughts of the fair,

'Tis transparent, round, dumb, we all know.
The humble to riches have oft by it risen,
Industrious knights of the quill;

While the forger has found his way into a prison

And paid, with his life, for a bill.
In the senate it aids the reporters and clerks;
It warrants the rogue's execution;
It preserves for the poet wit's choicest sparks,
And, to finish—it wrote this solution.

SONNET TO 'W. B. L.'

'He draws most important conclusions from the whim of a young puppy, and discusses a mutton-chop or a metaphysical inquiry, with an equal facility. He will deduce most sapient inferences from a parboiled turnip, and preach on the stings of conscience from the contemplation of a hedge-hog.' Vide 'On Ancient and Modern Writers,' Literary Chronicle, No. 110.

It is not that thou comest in a die
Of partie-coloured brightness and displeasure,
Byspredde with lustrys of a diverse raie,
And all besemlic to a merrie eie;
It is not that thou dauncest omne ye waie
Thiseelfe doeth strewe with wide and sorrell flowers,

Whither thine fittfull fancies bide thee strae
In jouteine moods amonge righte plessaunte bowes—

Thatte I doe love thee, "L," but thatte I deeme
The rather thatte myne hearte delighteth well

To toyatte ye spieie springes whyche thine doeth weene

To reveill in, with thyrrye unslykeabel;
Ande it may bee—for thatte mie wittes doe glize,

Thatte I have kenn'd thee well, within farr differring guise. I. B.

Downed by a separating fate

To feel a novel pain;

Oh! say, will absence ere create

False vows or cold disdain?

When the broad ocean rolls between
Thy plighted one and thee,
Will memory paint what once has been?
Will memory tell of me?

When in the recreative round
Of pleasures,—(powerful spell)
Wilt thou forget that well-known sound,
Which spoke the sad "farewell"?

Down, rising doubts; and from my mind
Be banished all distrust;
Hence, mingle with the mighty wind,
"Twirl scatter, ye like dust!"

For I have fully tried thy love;
Full well have scanned thy heart;
And know thou can't not faithless prove,
Nor act so vile a part.

The tongue but ill supplies the need
To praise thee as I ought;
So 'were ingratitude to feel
One base suspicious thought. L.

THE CRUSADER.

GREY twilight rested on the plain
Strewed with the dead and with the dying,
The star of glory in her wane,
Seemed from the crested warrior flying;
Sir Hubert stretch'd him on the ground,
For Moslem sword had left him wounded;
He heard the distant bangle sound,
His fainting pulse now quicker bounded;

And his glazed eye rested on a form
With graceful sorrow bending o'er him,
Whose eyes, like stars amid a storm,
Beamed on the dreary waste before him;
He gazed again—he knew her face—
He bore her from the haven flaming—
He bore her as his tottering pace
Told that his spirit fast was waning.

He stretch'd his hand,—the chill of death
Had froze his veins, the life-blood failing,—
On her bosom be breath'd his latest breath,
And the air resounded with her wailing:
The turbaned horde rode fiercely on,
The silver crescent brightly gleaming;
And as in life their souls were one,
In death one crimson tide was streaming.

RETIREMENT.

'Hail, mildly pleasing solitude,
Companion of the wise and good.'

OBSCURITY! what sweet elysium's thine,
In view how beautiful—possess'd, divine!
Thy seat is fix'd where judgment rears its throne,

Where silence reigns, and wisdom's rules are known;

Where contemplation spreads her cherub wings,
As adoration with the night-bird sings!

Estrang'd from envy, guilt, remorse, and strife,
(Corroding worms that waste this feverish life),

Those restless dreams that shake the tortur'd breast,

Ne'er haunt the hermit, nor disturb his rest;
Majestic reason, tho' unskill'd in schools,
Weights the just balance by law's nicest rules;
As Meditation loves in shades to dwell;
On herbs and fruits, by dower'd crystal well.

Whilst on his mind no anxious thoughts intrude,
But those of peace and calm beatitude,

On whose meek brow mild resignation there
Makes heaven of earth—and God his only care!

ROYAL ACADEMY.

AMONG the works of art exhibited this year at Somerset House, particularly deserving of notice, are three small landscapes, painted by a Mr. Edwart, Nos. 507, 745, and 822. The style of these pictures is a perfectly new invention, and does infinite credit to the artist. At a little distance they resemble enamel, with, however, a truth of colouring that is seldom if ever found in enamel paintings; but a closer inspection shows that they are oil paintings, fastened to plate glass. The advantage of this mode over enamel is obvious, inasmuch as the artist is not confined to copy other works, but has a free range in the field of original composition.

The first of these elegant little productions is a copy, or rather an imitation, of 'Tobit and the Angel,' by Claude, which we recollect to have seen in the picture gallery at Malmesbury. It strikes us that Mr. Edwart must have copied the drawing of this picture from a print, for the colouring seems wholly his own. The other two landscapes are original compositions. The execution of all three is exquisite, and not unworthy of the pencil of our greatest masters. The trees, particularly, are touched with a delicacy and a freedom that are really enchanting.

On seeing these works in a style of which we feel convinced that this is the first specimen ever exhibited, we felt disposed to make inquiries concerning the artist by whom they were contributed. The result of our inquiries leads us to suspect that the name of Edwart is assumed, and that these beautiful little pictures are the work of a foreign officer, who cultivated as an amusement, an art in which he has attained such excellence. Whether our conjectures be well founded or not, we sincerely hope that Mr. Edwart will continue to exercise in this country, a talent of which the specimen he has given us leads as to form so high an opinion.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—The opera of Rob Roy was played for the first time at this house on Tuesday, for the benefit of Mr. Cooper and Mr. H. Johnston, which we were happy to find well attended. The principal attraction of the evening was a Mr. Mackay, from the Edinburgh Theatre, whose delineation of the Baillie, Nicol Jarvie, is said to have been honoured with the approbation of Sir Walter Scott, and a present from Jedediah Cleishbotham. Mr. Mackay gives a very correct representation of the Baillie as drawn in the novel, with a happy observance of costume; but we much doubt that his portrait of him would ever be so popular with a London audience as that of Liston.

On Monday, a new afterpiece, from the pen of Mr. Moncrieff, was produced, entitled The Spectre Bridegroom, or a Ghost in spite of himself. It is a bustling piece full of equivoque, and was favourably received.

NEW THEATRE ROYAL HAYMARKET.—This elegant house opened for the season on Wednesday night, and although it has assumed the title of the 'New Theatre,' yet we were very happy to find it still entitled to the appellation, endeared by a thousand pleasing recollections, of the 'Little Theatre in the Haymarket.' It is certainly larger than the old theatre, but there is scarcely a seat in the whole house, boxes, pit, or gallery, where the actors cannot be seen and heard distinctly. To facilitate the latter, a sounding-board has been constructed, which projects considerably over the orchestra, and somewhat disfigures that part of the house.

On the ceiling, is an allegorical representation of Morning, attended by Zephyr, appearing in the horizon, while in the opposite quarter, Cynthia is seen retiring from the presence of Apollo. The ornaments which encircle the design are composed of four groups of Cupids, bearing emblematic trophies of the different seasons. On the proscenium are various figures and embellishments, correspondent with those upon the ceiling.

The new drop-scene represents, on the left hand of the audience, the entrance of a temple of the Composite Order, richly ornamented with basso relievo, and dedicated to Apollo. The statues of Thalia and Melpomene surmount the principal entrance. On the right hand is an altar, dedicated to Beauty, and flowers and various ornaments, allusive to the costumes of the Bacchantes, are introduced. The era of the new building, as well as of the new reign, are alluded to by the temple of the muses, illuminated by the rising sun.

An opening address, written, we suspect, by George Colman, was admirably delivered by Mr. Terry. It contained some smart hits at the monopoly of the winter theatres, and concluded with allusions to the performers who had been introduced to the public on the Haymarket stage, including Matthews, whom it had found 'a wanderer,' but who was now so much 'at home;' 'Liston' and 'their favourite Young,' the mention of whose names was received with loud applause, as was the address generally. The national air of 'God save the King' was twice sung by the whole company. The play was Sheridan's first dramatic production, The Rivals, a play which combines a great deal of rich humour and exquisite tenderness; but which we must confess we have seldom witnessed with so little pleasure. It introduced to the public some old favourites and some new faces, whether the latter will become favourites or not seems rather questionable. Mr. Terry, who is without an equal as a testy old man, played Sir Anthony Absolute with great spirit. It was a finished performance. De Camp, who has been absent from the London boards four or five years, was favourably greeted on appearing as Captain Absolute. Sir Lucius O'Trigger was rendered a very vulgar and a very insignificant personage by a Mr. Ward, from Dublin. The most successful debut was that of a Mr. Tayleure, from Liverpool, in the character of Acres, who represented the vanity, foppiness, boasting, and timidity of 'fighting Bob' with good effect. It was, however, a rather unequal performance: some of the best scenes were—his first interview with Absolute and Faulkner; his conversation with Sir Lucius on the intended challenge; when he really fancies that he is valiant; and his dialogue with his servant David, when, notwithstanding the remonstrances of that faithful adherent, Bobby still retains his valour, though now and then interrupted with a few quails. Tayleure is a bustling actor, who promises well. Faulkner was enacted by a Mr. Faulkner from Newcastle, who imitated Mr. Elton's manner and voice, but wanted the spirit of that gentleman. The Fag of Mr. Baker, and the David of Mr. Williams, were both good. Miss H. Johnston, who during her absence from the stage has added considerably to her emboupoint, played Lydia Languish with great animation; and Mrs. Chatterly made a very interesting Julia. We had nearly forgotten Mrs. Malaprop, which was very well sustained by Mrs. Pearce.

After the comedy, a new Vaudeville opera in two acts was produced, entitled Peter and Paul, or Love in the Vineyards. An apparently pre-determined disposition to oppose it, which displayed itself during the whole performance, rendered it very unintelligible to the audience. The story turns on a young rustic on the point of marrying a lady, who, nineteen years ago, had been engaged to her grandfather, if he should continue so long in the same wish. He unexpectedly comes to claim her. A brother, so like him that it is impossible to know which is the 'real Simon Pure,' comes at the same time, and a series of mistakes result, which terminate in the union of the lovers. We cannot but consider the opposition made to this piece as very ungenerous. It is not usual with Englishmen to condemn unheard, and yet this may be said to have been the case with this little opera, which deserved a better fate. It was with considerable difficulty that Mr. Terry could get leave to announce it for repetition.

ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.—A little piece in two acts, called Love's Dream, was produced at this theatre on Thursday night, with complete success. The story may be briefly told. Miss Dormer (Miss Kelly), is strongly attached to Henry Morton (Pearman); but, from some supposed slight on his part, she engages to marry Frederick Easy (Wrench). Easy and Morton are very intimate friends, and accidentally meeting, when the former is on his matrimonial excursion, Morton accompanies him, without knowing the intended bride until he gets to the house. The marriage contract is signed, and Morton is reluctantly prevailed upon to be one of the trustees. Miss Dormer is a somnambulist, and the night before her marriage, she unconsciously finds her way to the Pavilion, where Morton, unable to sleep, is sitting. In her dream, she discloses her attachment to Morton, and gives him a ring. On retiring, she leaves her veil, which is found by Easy. The secret is discovered, the match broken off, and Easy generously resigns the lady to his friend. The piece, though not possessing much originality, is a very pleasing production. Wrench played with great spirit, and Pearman sung prettily, but the piece rested chiefly on Miss Kelly, who rendered the scene of 'Love's dream' particularly effective. The piece was received with great applause.

SURREY THEATRE.—Mr. C. Kemble's drama of The Point of Honour, has been produced at this house under the title of the Soldier's Father. It is extremely well played, particularly the characters of Darimel, by Haastley, and Bertha by Mrs. W. Fearnham, from the York stage, who made a very successful debut. Bengough, Fitzwilliam, Wyatt, and Miss Poole, added much to the strength of the piece.

Literature and Science.

Mr. Ackermann has announced 'The History of Little Johnny, the Foundling of the late Doctor Syntax, a Poem,' from the same pen and pencil as the three tours of Doctor Syntax already published.

Library at Vienna.—An historical account of the public library in Vienna, has lately been published—Kurzgefasste Beschreibung der Kaiserlichen Bibliothek in Wien, by which it appears to have originated in the year 1440, consisting only, at that period, of some MSS. which the Emperor Frederick IV. had purchased. It is indebted for its first organization to the poet laureate Conrad de Celtes, who, in 1495, was appointed librarian to the Emperor Maximilian I. Since that time it has been successively augmented by the incorporation of other libraries and collections of MSS. including those of Conrad, Busbeck, Fuggen, Tycho Brahe, Baron Hohendorf, the Prince Eugene of Savoy, Apostolo Zeno, &c. as well as the collections which had been before formed at Ambras, Innspruck, and by Mathias Corvinus, King of Hungary. The immense building which it occupies at present, was constructed in 1723, by the Emperor Charles VI. and since its transfer thither has been made public. The literary treasures it contains are divided into four principal classes: the collection of MSS.; that of engravings; the incunabula or principles editions; and modern works. Among the scarce objects in the first classes is a geographical chart, the most ancient known, called the table of Peutinger, dated in the 13th century. A hieroglyphical MS. of Mexico, done upon sixty-five leaves of deer-skin. Hilarion Pictaviensis de Trinitate, an Egyptian paper, of the 4th century. Several MSS. on parchment, coloured purple, with gold and silver letters. The original MSS. of Jerusalem Delivered, by Tasso. The original act of the Roman senate for the abolition of Bacchanals, dated in the year 1806, before the Christian era, engraved on tables of bronze. The collection of engravings is about 30,000, filling 800 cases, of which 217 contain portraits, and twenty-five miniatures painted on parchment. In the number of incunabula, are seven Xylographic works (i. e. printed with wooden characters.) The total number of printed volumes amounts to 300,000. This library is open to the public for six hours every day; but, in the true spirit of the Austrian monarchy, the curiosity of readers is thwarted by a prohibition to read many of the books, and the persons in attendance strictly observe the injunction.—Classical Journal.

LUCRETIVS.

Aristo.—A friend once expressing his astonishment, that he who had described such magnificent edifices in his poem, should be contented with so poor a dwelling, Aristo answered, that 'words were much easier put together than bricks;' and leading him to the door of his house, pointed to this distich, which was engraven on the portico:—

Parva, sed apta mihi, sed nulla obnoxia, sed non Sordida, parva meo sed tamen are domus.

Sir John Falstaff.—The knight whom Shakspeare has ridiculed under the character of Sir John Falstaff, was Sir John Fastolf, 'a valiant general, of an ancient family, born at Yarmouth, in Norfolk, about 1377. He attended the Duke of Clarence, as Lieutenant of Ireland, about 1405 and 1406, and in 1408 he married a rich widow of that kingdom, and soon after went over to France, where, under the English regency, he was promoted to places of trust and honour. He returned home in 1440, covered with laurels bravely won in the field, and in his private conduct he now exhibited the hospitable, generous, and benevolent man. He bestowed large legacies on Cambridge, to build the schools of philosophy and civil law, and was a most liberal benefactor to Magdalen College, Oxford, founded by his friend Wainfleet. He died, 1459, aged upwards of eighty, according to what Caxton, his cotemporary, has mentioned. Fastolf, as is well observed, was a young and grave, discreet and valiant, chaste and sober commander abroad; and eminent for every virtue at home. Shakspeare has been severely censured for abusing this great and good man.

Review of New Books.

The History and Antiquities of the Tower of London, with Biographical Anecdotes of Royal and Distinguished Persons, deduced from Records, State Papers, and Manuscripts, and from other Original and Authentic Sources. By John Bayley, Esq. F. A. S. one of His Majesty's Commissioners on the Public Records. In Two Parts. Part I. 4to. pp. 306. London, 1821.

WHEN we first saw this work announced, we felt happy that a place of such interest and importance as the Tower, the history of which has been long neglected, was at length to possess its share of illustration, and that it was undertaken by a gentleman so competent to the task. From the proface we learn that the work was begun some considerable time ago; and that, about the middle of the year 1819, when a large portion of it had gone through the press, it was destroyed, together with the manuscript, by the fire at Messrs. Bensley's printing office. This must have been a sad mortification to Mr. Bayley, who had to begin his work de novo, under circumstances so disadvantageous and discouraging.

The portion of the work now submitted to the public, contains a compressed chronological and general history of the Tower as a palace and fortress, with a description of all its material buildings. The Second Part will contain an account of the Tower as a state prison, with biographical notices of the most distinguished personages that have been confined there; an account of the ancient customs, jurisdictions, and privileges attached to the Tower. This part, which is promised to be published next season, will be the most interesting.

It has been a common opinion, though unsupported by historical evidence or any local discovery of a satisfactory nature, that the Tower owes its foundation to the Romans. This idea is rejected by Mr. Bayley, who says that there is not the slightest ground for supposing any fortification of importance ever did exist on its site until some years after the Norman conquest, when the principal structure, now called the White Tower, was built by command of King William the First, under the superintendence of that celebrated military architect, Gundulph, Bishop of Rochester. Several additions were made to the buildings by William Rufus and Henry the First; and, so early as the reign of the latter, the Tower was used as a place of confinement for prisoners of state. In the year 1100, soon after the death of William Rufus, Ranulph Flambard, Bishop of Durham, was imprisoned there by the order of the king. It does not, however, appear to have been used as a royal residence until the year 1140, when King Stephen retired to it with but a slender retinue, and kept his court there during the festival of Whitsuntide. It was soon after fortified against him, by the Governor Geoffrey de Mandeville. In the reign of Richard the First, the charge of the Tower was confided to Longchamp, Bishop of Ely, who strengthened its fortifications and surrounded it with a deep ditch. It appears that King John often kept his court at the Tower, and made considerable additions to its fortifications:—

In the year 1215, the long kindling flames of discord broke out between John and his barons; and at the very commencement of hostilities, the latter took possession of the capital at the invitation of the citizens, and laid siege to the Tower; but, although there were only few within to defend it, it held out until the signing of the great charter; when, as a security for the performance of certain conditions, exacted with that celebrated code, the king was obliged to agree that the City of London should remain in the possession of the rebels, and the Tower be delivered in trust to the Archbishop of Canterbury till the 15th of August, or the fulfilling of this agreement, when both were to be restored to the royal authority. Engagements, however, which were obtained by force, John thought himself but little bound to observe; and, aided by the terrific power of the Pope, he had no sooner the means than he employed them in recovering his kingly prerogatives, and endeavouring to shake off the yoke which had been thus imposed upon him, civil war ensued; the barons remained masters of the city, and the Archbishop continued in charge of the Tower till after the arrival of the French in the following year, when it was given up to Prince Lewis, who had been invited into England to take possession of the crown.

King Henry the Third frequently resided at the Tower, and not only strengthened it, but also adorned the chapels with paintings and pieces of sculpture. It was during the reign of this King, in 1249, that the additional line of fortifications which he had but just completed, were, on the night of St. George, destroyed as if by an earthquake. The foundations gave way, and a noble portal, with the walls and bulwarks, all fell down; and, strange to tell, no sooner were the works restored, than, in 1241, the whole again fell down, on the very same night, and, as we are told, at the self same hour that had proved destructive to them the year preceding. In the latter part of the reign of Henry, the Tower forms a prominent feature of history, as its possession was strongly contested in the war between Henry and the barons.

Neither King Edward the First nor the Second evinced much partiality for the Tower, though the latter occasionally retired to it as a place of safety. Here he left his Queen and family when he marched against his unruly barons; and here his eldest daughter was born, who, from that circumstance, was called Jane of the Tower. In the reign of Edward the Third, the Tower was peopled with some illustrious inmates, among whom was King David Bruce, who, with several Scottish chiefs, was taken prisoner at the battle of Neville's Cross:—

The King was conveyed from York under an escort of twenty thousand men, and the day of his entering the capital was one of as great joy and satisfaction to the people, as that was to the Romans on which the brave Caractacus was brought in chains to the imperial city. David was seated on a high black courser, so that he might be seen to the multitudes who had assembled to witness the glorious spectacle. At the entrance to the metropolis, he was met by all the craft, clad in their respective liveries, and, with a great shew of honour, was conducted from street to street, till he came to the Tower, where, on the 2d of January, 1347, in the presence of the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Treasurer, he was delivered into the charge of Sir John Darcy, the constable of that fortress.

Charles of Blois, one of the competitors for the crown of Brittany, the valiant John of Vienne, the Governor of Calais, with twelve of the bravest defenders of their native city; and lastly, John, King of France, and his son Philip, were added to the Scots King, as prisoners in the Tower.

In the memorable insurrection of Wat Tyler, the young King Richard the Second, with his mother and several of the nobility, took refuge in the Tower; and while he was on the point of going out to meet the rebels, by appointment, at Mile End, a chosen band of them rushed into the fortress, and committed the most barbarous cruelties; pillaging the royal apartments, and dragging the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Chancellor, and Sir Robert Hales, the treasurer, to instant execution. Richard afterwards became a prisoner in the tower, and it was here that he resigned the crown to Henry of Lancaster.

In the context between the Houses of York and Lancaster, there are many circumstances connected with the history of the Tower which are very interesting, particularly the succession of Edward the Fifth, the young King's imprisonment in the Tower, the accession of Richard, and the final disappearance of the young princes. The latter circumstance is involved in much obscurity, and Mr. Bayley defers attempting to develop so intricate and important a question to the second part of his work, in order to take the chance of any further information he may gain on the subject. In the description of the 'Bloody Tower,' however, he returns to it, and offers some very cogent reasons for believing that the traditional story of the young princes is not the most correct. He says,—

'In the careful and very minute survey which was taken of the Tower in the reign of Henry the Eighth, this building is called the Garden Tower, by reason of its contiguity to the constable's or lieutenant's garden, which now forms a part of what is termed the Parade. In the year 1597, another survey was made of the fortress, by order of Queen Elizabeth, and it was then known by its present appellation, [the Bloody Tower] which it is generally supposed to have derived from the circumstance of the two young princes, Edward the Fifth and his brother, Richard Duke of York, sons of King Edward the Fourth, having, as it is said, been put to death in this particular spot, by order of their uncle, the Duke of Gloucester, afterwards King Richard the Third. It has already been noticed that the whole story of the two royal youths comes to us in so "questionable a shape," that it can never be entertained without some serious doubts; if we admit, however, that the young princes really came to a violent death in the Tower, the idea of this place having been the scene of their destruction rests on no authority; and the story which the wardens, whose trade it is "to tell a wonderful tale," so gravely propagate, respecting the discovery of their bones under the little stair-case above alluded to, is still more glaringly false; bones, it is true, were found in the Tower, in the reign of King Charles the Second, and they were looked upon to be those of children, of ages corresponding with the two princes; but it is most decidedly known that they were discovered in a very different part of the fortress; namely, on the south side of the White Tower, at the foot of a stair-case which leads to the chapel in that building.

Without dwelling on the seeming inconsistency of the epithet bloody being applied to a building, because, as it is imagined, two children were smothered in it, it may not be amiss briefly to inquire how far it is likely that its name can be connected with that circumstance. Soon after the death of King Edward the Fourth, his two sons were conveyed to the Tower, under the charge of their uncle, with the professed intent of secluding them from the bustle of the court, whilst preparations were to be made for the eldest's coronation. Is it then to be supposed, whatever might have been the protector's design as to the ultimate fate of his nephews, that the princes were not lodged in the royal apartments, and paid all the respect due to their rank? Is it likely that Richard should have had them shut up in the dark and wretched dwelling of one of the porters of the gates? If he had wanted in humanity, would policy have dictated such a course? No; it must at once have betrayed some foul design, without adding a jot to the facility of its perpetration. But a stronger proof we need not have, that the name of the building did not originate in the circumstance in question, is its not having assumed the appellation till upwards of a century after the supposed act. It has already been shown, that in the early part of the reign of King Henry the Eighth, it was known by a different title, and it was not before the latter end of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, that we find it marked out as the scene of some horrid deed.

It is not a little remarkable that preparations were actually made for Prince Edward to have attended the coronation of his uncle, Richard the Third, as appears from the wardrobe account for the year 1483, which is here quoted. Mr. Bayley, after examining the account given by Sir Thomas More and others, of the murder of the young princes, proves how little reliance can be placed upon them, and shows, that whether they were murdered at all or not, still remains an 'historic doubt.'

In the reign of Henry the Eighth, the Tower was peopled with many distinguished tenants, including more than one of his wives; and, among the memorabilia of this reign, Stowe relates that,— 'In the year 1546, the 27th of April, being the Tuesday in Easter week, William Foxley, pot-maker for the Mint, in the Tower of London, fell a-sleep, and so continued sleeping, and could not be awakened with pricking, cramming, or otherwise burning whatsoever, till the first day of term, which was fourteen days and fifteen nights. The cause of his thus sleeping could not be known, though the same were diligently searched after by the king's physician and other learned men; yea, the king himself examined the same William Foxley, who was in all points found at his waking, to be as if he had slept but one night; and he lived more than forty years after in the said Tower.'

King Edward the Sixth held his first court at the Tower, where he resided for some time; and, during his reign, it became the prison of the protector, the Duke of Somerset, who was afterwards executed on the adjoining hill. Lady Jane Grey and her husband were also confined in the Tower, where they remained till the period of their execution; that of Lady Jane on the green walk, in the Tower, and her husband on Tower Hill.

The sanguinary reign of Mary was not likely to leave the Tower unpeopled, and therefore we find her sending her sister, afterwards Queen Elizabeth, among others, to its safe keeping. When this princess first entered the fortress, at the traitor's gate, she said, with her usual dignity, 'here landed as true a subject, being a prisoner, as ever landed at these stairs, and before thee, O God, I speak it.'

Queen Elizabeth kept her court at the Tower until her coronation, but not afterwards, nor did any thing interesting occur respecting it in her reign, except as a state prison.

James the First, after holding his court a short time at the Tower, went as prisoners to it, Sir Walter Raleigh, Lady Arabella Stuart, who died there, the Earl of Northumberland, who was confined in it upwards of fourteen years, and other celebrated characters.

In the reign of Charles the First, several members of the House of Commons were committed to the Tower; and when the troubles of that reign commenced, the parliamentary faction took possession of it. From this period the history of the Tower possesses little interest, except as a state prison, and therefore Mr. Bayley does not continue his chronological account later than the reign of James the Second.

We now pass on to the local description, from which, however, our extracts shall be brief. The Beauchamp Tower, from its having been one of the principal state prisons, and the place wherein many illustrious and unfortunate persons have been confined, excites a degree of interest, which is heightened by the numerous inscriptions, coats of arms, and other devices, left on its dreary walls by those unhappy sufferers. These memorials were discovered so recently as 1796, on making some alterations, for the purpose of converting the building into a mess-house for the officers of the garrison. They have, most of them, been printed, though not very correctly, in the thirteenth volume of the Archæologia, and we shall, therefore, only notice one or two of them. A young Fleming or Brabantier, of the name of Charles Bailly, who was an adherent of Mary, Queen of Scots, has left some curious inscriptions, of which Mr. Bayley has given a fac-simile engraving. In a panel, ornamented with lozenges, are the following reflections, which have not lost their value in their antiquity:—

‘J. H. S.

1751, die 10^a Aprilis.

Wise men ought circumspectly to see what they do; to examine before they speak; to prove before they take in hand; to beware whose company they use; and, above all things, to whom they trust. Charles Bailly.’

In another place, there is the following inscription:—

‘Principium sapientie timor Domini. J. H. S. X. P. S. Be friend to one, be enemy to none. Anno D. 1571, 10 Sept. The most unhappy man in the world is he that is not patient in adversities; for men are not killed with the adversities they have; but with ye impacience which they suffer.’

‘Tout vient apoint, qui peult attendre
Celi qui ne son testament veill angos-cia’ shia. Charles Bailly.’

A prisoner, of the name of Clarke, has left the following words, curiously inscribed:—

‘T. C. I leve in hope and I gave credit to mi frinde in time did stande ine most in handle, so would I never do againe, except I had him suer in handle; and to al man wishe I so, unles ye sustaine the leke lose as I do.

Unhappy is that manne whose acts doth procure The misere of this house in prison to induer.
1576, Thomas Clarke.’

In another part, there is a repetition of the above prisoner’s name, and, in a third place,—

‘Hit is the poynt of a wyse man to try, and then truste,
For happy is he who fyndeth one that is juste,
T. C.’

The sincerity of the following inscription will scarcely be doubted:—

‘Thomas Miagh, which lieth here alone,
That fayne wold from hems begone,
By torture strange, my troth was Tried, yet of my libertie denied.

1581, Thomas Miagh.’

In the same part of the room are other inscriptions:—

‘The uppermost is a rude piece of sculpture, by “Thomas Wyllyngar.” It is without date, and consists of a bleeding heart, with the letters T. W., the initials of his own name on one side, and P. A., most likely those of his mistress, on the other; there is also a figure of death, holding a dart in the left hand, and an hour glass in the right; and, on the opposite side of the bleeding heart, are the words—Thomas Wyllyngar, goldsmithe.—My hart is your’s tel de the. No account has been preserved of this person; but it may be conjectured from his profession, that his offence was that of clipping or counterfeiting the coin of the realm.’

In the uppermost story of the Beauchamp tower there are also several inscriptions. One prisoner, whose name is unknown, has thus recorded the tedious period of his confinement:— ‘Close prisoner 8 months, 32 weekes, 924 dayes, 5376 houres.’ On the wall at the Beauchamp tower, there lately existed two epitaphs on a cat and a goldfinch, supposed to have been written by John Augustus Bonney, who was a prisoner there for high treason, along with Horne Tooke and others, in 1794. Although they are neither valuable by their antiquity, nor by any particular merit which they possess, yet we shall quote the latter, and then close this ‘huge memorial of misfortune’:—

‘Epitaph on a Goldfinch.

Where Raleigh pin’d within a prison’s gloom,
I cheerful sung, nor murmur’d at my doom;
When heroes bold and patriots firm could dwell,

A goldfinch in content his note might swell;

But death, more gentle than the law’s decree,
Hath paid my ransom from captivity.

Buried, June 23, 1794, by a fellow-prisoner in the Tower of London.’

The description of the jewels and regalia is less minute than we should have expected; but there is an interesting, though rather coarse account of the notorious attempt of Blood to steal the crown on the 9th of May, 1673. The care of the regalia was at that time entrusted to Talbot Edwards, an old confidential servant of the Talbot family, and from whom is derived the relation of the transaction:—

‘About three weeks before this audacious villain made his attempt upon the crown, he came to the Tower in the habit of a parson, with a long black cassock, and canonical girdle, accompanied by a woman, whom he called his wife. They desired to see the regalia, and, just as their wishes had been gratified, the lady feigned sudden indisposition; this called forth the kind offices of Mrs. Edwards, the keeper’s wife, who, having courteously invited her into their house to repose herself, she soon recovered; and, on their departure, pressed themselves thankful for this civility.

‘A few days after, Blood came again, bringing a present to Mr. Edwards, of four pairs of white gloves, from his pretended wife; and having thus begun the acquaintance, they made frequent visits to improve it. After a short respite of their compliments, the disguised ruffian returned again; and, in conversation with Mr. Edwards, said, that his wife could discourse of nothing but the kindness of those good people in the Tower; that she had long studied, and at length brought herself of a handsome way of requital. You have, quoth he, a pretty young gentlewoman for your daughter, and I have a young nephew, who has two or three hundred a year in land, and is at my disposal. If your daughter be free, and you approve it, I’ll bring him here to see her, and we will endeavour to make it a match. This was easily assented to by old Mr. Edwards, who invited the parson to dine with him on that day; he readily accepted the invitation; and, taking upon him to say grace, performed it with great seeming devotion, and, casting up his eyes, concluded it with a prayer for the king, queen, and royal family. After dinner, he went up to see the rooms, and observing a handsome case of pistols hang there, expressed a great desire to buy them, to present to a young lord, who was his neighbour; a pretence, by which he thought of disarming the house against the period intended for the execution of his design. At his departure, “which was a canonical benediction of the good company, he appointed a day and hour to bring his young nephew to see his mistress; which was the very day that he made his daring attempt.”

‘The good old gentleman had got up ready to receive his guest, and the daughter was in her best dress to entertain her expected lover; when, behold, Parson Blood, with three more, came to the jewel house, all armed with rapier blades in their canes, and every one a dagger and a brace of pocket-pistols. Two of his companions entered in with him, on pretence of seeing the crown, and the third stayed at the door, as if to look after the young lady, a jewel of a more charming description, but in reality as a watch. The daughter, who thought it not modest to come down till she was called, sent the maid to take a view of the company, and bring a description of her gallant; and the servant conceiving that he was the intended bridegroom who stayed at the door, being the youngest of the party, returned to soothe the anxiety of her young mistress with the idea she had formed of his person.

'Blood told Mr. Edwards, that they would not go up stairs till his wife came, and desired him to shew his friends the crown to pass the time till then; and they had no sooner entered the room, and the door as usual shut, than a cloak was thrown over the old man's head, and a gag put into his mouth.

'Thus secured, they told him, that their resolution was to have the crown, globe, and sceptre; and if he would quietly submit to it, they would spare his life; otherwise he was to expect no mercy. He thereupon endeavoured to make all the noise he possibly could, to be heard above; they then knocked him down with a wooden mallet, and told him, that if yet he would lie quietly, they would spare his life; but, if not, upon his next attempt to discover them, they would kill him. Mr. Edwards, however, according to his own account, was not intimidated by this threat, but strained himself to make the greater noise, and in consequence received several more blows on the head with the mallet, and was stabbed in the belly; this again brought the poor old man to the ground, where he lay for some time in so senseless a state, that one of the villains pronounced him dead. Edwards had come a little to himself, and hearing this, lay quietly, conceiving it best to be thought so. The booty was now to be disposed of, and one of them named Parrot*, put the orb in his breeches. Blood held the crown under his cloak; and the third was about to file the sceptre in two, in order that it might be placed in a bag brought for that purpose; but, fortunately, the son of Mr. Edwards, who had been in Flanders with Sir John Talbot, and, on his landing in England, had obtained leave to come away post to visit his father, happened to arrive while the scene was acting; and, on coming to the door, the person that stood sentinel asked, with whom he would speak? to which he answered, that he belonged to the house; and, perceiving the person to be a stranger, told him, that if he had any business with his father, that he would acquaint him with it, and so hastened up stairs to salute his friends. This unexpected accident spread confusion among the party, and they instantly decamped with the crown and orb, leaving the sceptre yet unfiled.

'The aged keeper now raised himself upon his legs, forced the gag from his mouth, and cried treason! murder! which being heard by his daughter, who was, perhaps, anxiously expecting far other sounds, ran out and reiterated the cry. The alarm now became general, and young Edwards and his brother-in-law, Captain Beckman, ran after the conspirators; whom a warder put himself in a position to stop, but Blood discharged a pistol at him, and he fell although unhurt, and the thieves proceeded safely to the next post, where one Sill, who had been a soldier under Cromwell, stood sentinel; but he offered no opposition, and they accordingly passed the draw-bridge. Horses were waiting for them at St. Catherine's gate, and as they ran that way, along the Tower wharf, they themselves cried out, stop the rogues! by which they passed on unsuspected, till Captain Beckman overtook them. At his head Blood fired another pistol, but missed him, and was seized. Under the cloak of this daring villain was found the crown, and although he saw himself a prisoner, he had yet the impudence to struggle for his prey; and when it was finally wrested from him, said, "It was a gallant attempt, however unsuccessful; it was for a crown!"

'Parrot was also taken; but Hunt, Blood's son-in-law, reached his horse, and rode off, as did two other of the thieves; but he was soon afterwards stopped, and likewise committed to custody.

Blood and his accomplices, after being a short time in prison, were pardoned. He represented to the king that he was connected with a formidable band, who would revenge the punishment inflicted on any one of its members.

The description of the several apartments in the Tower loses much of its interest from not containing an account of the prisoners, and we think this division of the work rather injudicious. Mr. Bayley is not an elegant writer, but his style is plain and intelligible, and, from the anxiety he discovers to ascertain the truth, we believe him to be a very faithful historian. The embellishments of the work consist of twenty-seven plates, representing various parts of the Tower, and are well engraved by Pye, from drawings by Nash.

Travels of Cosmo the Third, through England, during the Reign of King Charles the Second.

From the Cock-pit, where we last left the Grand Duke, his highness passed to 'the principal dancing schools of the metropolis, frequented both by married and unmarried ladies; and thence to the gladiators or fencing-masters. The Earl of Arlington, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Earl of Devonshire all received visits from Cosmo, who also went as far as Vauxhall to see an hydraulic machine, by the celebrated Marquis of Worcester, which 'raises water more than forty geometrical feet, by the power of one man only, and, in a very short space of time, will draw up four vessels of water, through a tube or channel not more than a span in width.' Hampton Court was also visited, of which we have a rather curious account:—

'The numerous towers and cupolas, judiciously disposed at irregular distances all over the vast pile of building, form a most striking ornament to it, whether viewed near or at a distance. The ground-floor is divided into twelve courts, two of which, being much superior to the others in size, as well as beauty, contain the gardens, which are admirably laid out. They are divided into very large, level, and well-kept walks, which, separating the ground into different compartments, form artificial parterres of grass, being themselves formed by espalier trees, partly such as bear fruit, and partly ornamental ones, but all adding to the beauty of the appearance. This beauty is further augmented by fountains, made of slate, after the Italian style, and distributed in different parts of the gardens, whose jets d'eau throw up the water in various playful and fanciful ways. There are also in the gardens some soup places of retirement in certain towers, formerly intended as places of accommodation for the king's mistresses. The chapel, by the elegance of its structure, contributes much to the splendour of this great edifice, in which they pretend that the number of rooms exceeds four hundred; those which constitute the royal apartments are most worthy of observation, the ceilings being composed of cedar and timber from Ireland, which has the property of keeping off every thing poisonous, so that spiders do not even spin their webs or make their nests upon it; consequently, the gold retains so much the greater lustre upon the furniture with which the rooms are enriched, and the valuable paintings with which they are decorated; and on this account, one of them is called Paradise. Corresponding with the apartments, two very long galleries, which, after the death of King Charles I., were deprived by the Protector Cromwell, of such decorations as displayed the magnificence of royalty. This usurper caused the pictures to be removed, which, besides adding to the beauty of their interior, afforded an opportunity of admiring and appreciating the style of the most celebrated masters in that art; so that all that is now worth seeing consists of a few pieces of painting by a good hand, placed there by the king. Besides the sumptuousness of this building, and the pleasantness of the gardens, the amusements of hunting and fishing are not wanting, those diversions being at hand in the park, which is of considerable size, both in length and breadth, inclosing large meadows, where the preserved deer feed. To vary the delights of these beautiful premises, several canals or ponds are distributed in different parts of the park, in whose transparent waters quantities of fish are seen sporting, which are reserved for the diversion of anglers.

The courts of law and the two houses of parliament next occupied the attention of the Grand Duke, and he is very particular in describing the proceedings in both, and giving a list of all the members. Among the noblemen with whom the Grand Duke dined, was the Duke of Buckingham, the King and the Duke of York being present:—

The table was served in a splendid style, suitable to the rank of the guests and the munificence of the host. Toasts were not forgotten, being considered an indispensable appendage to English entertainments. His highness began by proposing the king and the royal family, which was three times followed up with loud cheers by all present. His highness, to do honour to the toast, would have given it standing; but this his majesty would not allow, absolutely compelling him to keep his seat. In return for the triple compliment, the king pledged his highness and the Serene House of Tuscany in an equal number of rounds, and at the same time accompanied this act of kindness by taking hold of his highness's hand, which he would have kissed; but the prince anticipating him, with the greatest promptitude and address kissed that of his majesty. The king, repeating his toast, wished to shew the same courtesy to his highness; but he, withdrawing his hand with the most delicate respect, would not permit it, which his majesty perceiving, immediately kissed him on the face. The toasts given by his majesty and his highness having been thus mutually acknowledged and replied to, a concluding one was proposed, and drank with unbounded applause by the guests—to the intimate union and alliance of the Royal House of England and the Most Serene House of Tuscany.

The tables being now removed, his majesty arose, and, attended by the duke and his highness, and followed by the rest of the company, adjourned into the first apartment, where he chatted for a time with his accustomed affability, and then returned to the palace incognito, as he had come.

On the king's birth-day, in order to celebrate it with some especial tokens of joy,—

His highness, caused to be constructed, in the open place before the Earl of St. Alban's house, in which his highness lodged, a machine, with different fanciful artificial fire-works and squibs, which, as far as the shortness of the time and the skill of the artist permitted, were well contrived, and, during a great part of the night, served to amuse the populace, who flocked thither in great numbers to see them, and to participate in the liberality of the prince, who, for their greater gratification, distributed among them several casks of Italian wine and beer, which called forth increased applause, seconded by discharges of harquebuses and carabines, which were let off by the individuals of his highness's court.

On the evening before the Grand Duke's departure, the king did him the honour to sup with him, at the house of his highness, when a curious scene took place:—

The entertainment was most superb, both as to the quantity and quality of the dishes, and as to the rarity and exquisiteness of the best Italian wines, and those of other countries. The supper was served up in eighty magnificent dishes; many of which were decorated with other smaller ones, filled with various delicious meats. To the service of fruit, succeeded a most excellent course of confectionery, both those of Portugal and other countries, famous for the choiceness of their sweetmeats, which was in all respects on a par with the supper that preceded it. But scarcely was it set upon the table, when the whole was carried off and plundered by the people who came to see the spectacle of the entertainment; nor was the presence of the king sufficient to restrain them from the pillage of these very delicate viands; much less his majesty's soldiers armed with carabines, who guarded the entrance of the saloon, to prevent all ingress into the inside, lest the confinement and too great heat should prove annoying; so that his Majesty, to avoid the crowd, was obliged to rise from table, and retire to his highness's apartment. In addition to the other festivities of the table, there was no want of toasts, proposed by his highness, to the welfare of his majesty and the royal family, and returned by his majesty to his highness's fortunate voyage, and to the prosperity of his serene house. These were successively repeated to the same effect by the rest of the guests, so that, by this conviviality, the entertainment was protracted to a great length, and finally concluded with a most kind wish tender ed to his highness by his Majesty, and seconded by all present, for the continuation of a sincere friendship, and a confirmation of the alliance between the royal family and the most Serene House of Tuscany. After supper, his Majesty passed nearly an hour in conversation in the prince's apartments, till he was informed that the carriages were ready for his return to the palace. The king then went down stairs with the duke, and with the whole of his retinue, in the same form that he had observed in coming, and was accompanied by his highness to the door of the house, and as far as the carriage. Having stepped into the carriage with the duke, his Majesty renewed his expressions of courtesy and gratitude to his highness; and when the carriage was about to drive off, the king's majesty intreated the prince to retire to rest as soon as possible, on account of the fatigue which he would have to undergo on the following day, which was fixed for his departure; but his highness, keeping his hand upon the door of the carriage, to prevent it from being closed, instead of taking leave, with great address stepped himself into the carriage, to wait on his Majesty to the palace, in spite of the opposition of the latter.

The space we have already devoted to this work, precludes us from quoting the grand duke's description of the court, of the metropolis, or of the various religious sects, which are distinctly noticed; and we shall, therefore, conclude with his highness's character of the English in general, and particularly of the inhabitants of London:—

The common people of London, giving way to their natural inclination, are proud, arrogant, and uncivil to foreigners, against whom, and especially the French, they entertain a great prejudice, and cherish a profound hatred, treating such as come among them with contempt and insult. The nobility, though also proud, have not so usually the defects of the lower orders, displaying a certain degree of politeness and courtesy towards strangers; and this is still more the case with those gentlemen who have been out of the kingdom, and travelled, they having taken a lesson in politeness from the manners of other nations. Almost all of them speak French and Italian, and readily apply themselves to learn the latter language, from the good will which they entertain towards our nation; and, although by their civil treatment of foreign gentlemen, whom they endeavour to imitate, they moderate a little that stiffness or uncouthness which is peculiar to them, yet they fail in acquiring such good manners as to put them on a level with the easy gentility of the Italians, not being able to get the better of a certain natural melancholy, which has the appearance of eternally clouding their minds with unpleasant thoughts.

The English in general are, by nature, proud, phlegmatic in execution, and patient in their behaviour, so that they never hurry those who work for them by an indiscreet impatience, but suffer them to go on at their own pleasure and according to their ability; this proceeds from their melancholy temperament, for which those who live in the north of England are more remarkable than those in the south; the former being saturnine, and the latter somewhat more lively. They consider a long time before they come to a determination; but having once decided, their resolution is irrevocable, and they maintain their opinion with the greatest obstinacy. It is a common custom with the lower order of people, however, rather than with the nobility, who are less given to it, after dinner or at public houses, when they are transacting business of any kind, to take tobacco, and smoke, so that there does not pass a day in which the artificers do not indulge themselves in going to the public-houses, which are exceedingly numerous, neglecting their work, however urgent it may be; hence it is that the French make fortunes in London, for, being more attentive to their business, they sell their manufactures at a lower price than the English, who would fain derive the same profit as other artificers, however little they work.

‘The English are men of a handsome countenance and shape, and of an agreeable complexion, which is attributable to the temperature of the climate, to the nature of their food, and to the use of beer rather than wine, and, above all, to the salubrity of the air, which is almost always clear; that thick atmosphere which is seen from a distance hovering over London, not being caused by corrupt vapours, but arising casually from the smoke of the mineral coal from Scotland, which issues from the chimneys, and which the coal, being an oleaginous substance, produces in great quantities.

‘The women of London are not inferior to the men, either in stature or in beauty, for they are all of them handsome, and for the most part tall, with black eyes, abundance of light-coloured hair, and a neatness which is extreme; their only personal defect being their teeth, which are not, generally speaking, very white. They live with all the liberty that the custom of the country authorizes. This custom dispenses with that rigorous constraint and reservedness which are practised by the women in other countries, and they go whithersoever they please, either alone or in company; and those of the lower order frequently go so far as to play at ball publicly in the streets. They are very fond of paying respect to foreigners, and in society shew them a vast deal of courtesy and attention. The slightest possible introduction is sufficient to be admitted to their conversation, on the same terms as their countrymen and relations, who, on their parts, behave to them with the greatest modesty, holding female honour in the highest respect and veneration. They do not easily fall in love, nor throw themselves into the arms of men; but if they are smitten by the amorous passion, they become infatuated, and sacrifice all their substance for the sake of the beloved object, and if he deserts them, they are sunk into great despair and affliction. Their style of dressing is very elegant, entirely after the French fashion, and they take more pride in rich clothes (which are worn of value even by women of the lowest rank) than in precious jewels, all their expense in the latter article being confined to pearls, of which they wear necklaces of very great price; consequently, pearls are in great esteem and request in England. They are remarkably well informed in the dogmas of the religion they profess; and when they attend at the discourses of their ministers or preachers, they write down an abridgment of what they say, having in their letters, abbreviations, which facilitate to them and to the men also, (thanks to their natural quickness and the acuteness of their genius,) the power of doing this with rapidity; and this they do that they may afterward avail themselves of it in the controversies and disputes which they hold on religious matters. Such and so great is the respect which the English entertain for their women, that in their houses the latter govern every thing despotically, making themselves feared by the men, courageous as they are on other occasions, and of a most manly spirit, and valiant in war, both by land and sea, to a degree that amounts almost to rashness. The truth of this remark may be seen by recurring to the history of the times when they have been governed by queens, who have reigned over them with an authority that was absolute, and more decided than that of kings themselves.’

Whatever may have been the talents of Cosmo himself, it will be seen from the preceding narrative, that he was attended by men of considerable abilities, who not only directed him to every thing worth seeing in this country, but who described what they saw with great spirit and fidelity. The work exhibits a curious picture of England at an interesting period, and, as such, is a valuable contribution to the literature of the country.

Poems. By Chauncey Hare Townsend. 12mo. pp. 360. London, 1821. THERE is, perhaps, no class of works with which an editor's library is so abundantly furnished, as with those productions yeitled ‘Poems.’ Our table actually groans under the accumulated and accumulating load; and, with all our love of poetry, it required no ordinary effort of courage to attack the formidable pile; and we were rather seduced to commence with the present volume, on account of its smooth pages and engraved title. We must not, however, class Mr. Townsend with the mere ‘mob of gentlemen who write with ease,’ for he does more; he writes with elegance, and, in the work before us, which is a formidable one for so young a debutant, displays considerable and varied talents. The poems include Odes, Songs, Sonnets, &c., many of which were written between the ages of fourteen and sixteen, and would do no discredit to an author of maturer age. Among the larger pieces, we have been most pleased with the Weaver Boy, a pathetic tale, in which sound morality flows in pleasing numbers, and a Dramatic Ode on the Passions, in which there is a good deal of genius. We quote, as an extract, Despair:—

‘Last of the Gorgon train, and worst, I come,
And lay my icy fingers on his heart;
Joy withers at the touch, and Grief is dumb,
Feeling is numb, yet will not all depart.
Unfit to live, yet unprepared to die,
At war with earth, yet not at peace with heaven;
From all he loathes, endeavouring still to fly,
Yet back, for ever back, by furies driven;
How shall he gaze around, with madman's frantic,
While pang on pang comes gripping with his soul,
And pray but for one hour's suspended thought,
But no! still on the waves of misery roll.
Till, sunk in sullen apathy profound,
Worse than extremity of keenest ill,
My winding-sheet shall wrap his soul around,
Not in repose, but winter's deadly chill.
Such peace is mine, such peace will I bestow,
But other peace he cannot, shall not know.’

The miscellaneous poems preclude us with a pretty piece, intitled—

‘THE EXILE.

A fresh gale the tops of the white billows cut'd,
The anchor was lifted, the sails were unfurl'd;
And the ship, as the waves she triumphantly pratt,
Left a long track of light on the ocean's green
breast.
His arms sadly cross'd o'er a bosom of woe,
A time-wither'd exile stood high on the prow;
His thoughts might be traced on his forehead
of care;
But no tear dimm'd his eye,—it was glazed by despair.
Farewell, my own country! he mournfully
cried,
For thee have I lived, and for thee could have died;
Oh, would I had fallen with the high-soul'd,
the brave,
O'er whose tombs the bright laurels they reap'd proudly wave.
Yet happier far is my lot, than of those,
Who to thee, their sire's land, have poured traitors and foes;
For, next to the glory of dying, must be
The pride of thus having been called for thee.

Since, had they not known there was fire in my soul,
 And might in my arm, which they could not control,
 Had they sent me afar from thy valleys to stony—
 Let the sparrow remain, chase the eagle away!
 Ye mean mighty tyrants, who tremble and kill,
 Ye slaves, who can crouch to the tyrant's proud will,
 Ye wret to your level my soul can subdue,
 In my chains—in my chains, I am freer than you!

O my country! the pang that I feel, as I part
 From thy shores, is like tearing the life from my heart.
 Yet, is it not better this anguish to taste,
 Than the worse, to remain, and behold thee disgraced?

Your halls are no longer the homes of the free,
 And, therefore, no more a meet shelter for me;
 Your songs breathe no longer sweet liberty's cheer,
 And, therefore, are music no more to mine ear.

I look on the waves, and behold there the cure
 Of the woe I have past, of the ill I endure;
 Death wounds me; but, no! it is prouder to live:
 Revenge!—but 'tis nobler by far to forgive.

They that have subdued me, oh, let them not boast!

I have conquer'd myself, who have conquer'd a host:

This, this my revenge; and my triumph shall be
 My last dying prayer for thy tyrants and thee!

To show the diversified talents of the author, we quote two more poems; the first is very Miltonic:—

“SOLITUDE, SOMETIMES, IS BEST SOCIETY.”—MILTON.

Alone—at length alone! and nothing now
 With me but God and nature!—Far behind
 Lies the tumultuous city. There rude Mirth
 Is dissonant—the drunkenness of Woe—
 The laugh of Madness. There sits squalid Want,

Mock'd at by o'er-fed Plenty. There the eye
 Wanders from face to face, and reads in most
 The man degraded into brute—the grin
 Of idiot vacancy—the darken'd mien,
 Tablet to many crimes, or scar'd by them
 Into a blank, a horrible erasure

Of mind and feeling. Hatred's sullen swell,
 The apathy of listless Indolence,
 The storm of Passion, or the sculk of Fear.
 Behind are these. Forget them, O my soul!
 Before me—what? Oh, now all language fails,
 Yet give me words, or my full heart will burst!
 A thousand—thousand struggling thoughts contend

For utterance. Yonder sinks the glorious Sun,
 Dilated into more magnificence,
 Than when he triumphs on the tower of noon.
 Robed in a purple zone, regal, he sinks,
 Like Cæsar, proud and matchless in his fall.
 From the bright west streams one continuous cloud,

Ev'n to the furthest east; of rainbow form,
 Yet borrowing but one hue—the rayed eye—
 From yonder orb. Behold, it spans the Lea- seas,

A bridge uniting the opposing poles,
 As if for Scraphim thenceon to lead
 Their chariots and bright cohorts. The white Moon
 Or, glided on beside it, enters now;
 And veils her face behind the blushing shade.

And this is Solitude: oh, how misnamed!
 A thousand airy voices are around me,
 And hold more true communion with my soul
 Than the unmingling intercourse of speech.

O Solitude, thou art most dear to him,
 Who, loathing the vile tumult of the world,
 And all its beardless, cold, dull, nothingness,
 Yet never found, among the sons of men,
 A heart—a spirit like unto his own.

He loves thee better than the best of life;
 Thy blending shadows fill the dreary void,
 Which to his soul the world's broad glare betrays,

 As even rocks, wild heaths, and barren plains,
 Look scarcely sterile in the moon's soft light.

When, glad escaping from the multitude,
 The last faint murmur of its noisy stir
 Dies on his ear, he hails thee with such joy,
 As lovers the beloved: to thee he tells
 What to no other ear he dares impart, Thoughts, feelings, wishes, he can understand,

 Nor few have ever felt! Now unconstrain'd
 His bosom seems unshackled from the chain
 It ever wears among the formal crowd:

He lives, he breathes, and Fancy plumes her wing,
 Which late hung drooping, like the captive dove's.

Sweet nurse of thought—parent of virtue pure,
 He fondly calls thee, and, with grateful real,
 Sings pensive ditties in thy gentle praise.
 He thinks upon thee, 'till thy form appears
 Distinct, self-shadow'd to his vision's eye,
 And then assum'st substantial life and being,
 No more the courage of a feverish brain.

Within the twilight of the chequer'd grove,
 Where meeting trees a fitting temple form,
 He views the goddess, at whose shrine he bends.

Contemplative she stands; her eyes half-raised,

 Nor fix'd on earth, nor wholly lost in heav'n;
 Tho', as a vestal, white her spotless robe,
 A tender shadow dwells along its folds.
 Tho' calm her brow, upon it merrily sits
 Such chasteen'd woe, as if, subdued by time,
 It gently sank to resignation there.

There are a large number of sonnets in this volume, some of which are pretty, but we shall conclude with a very charming song:—

‘CONSTANCY.’

Let love burn with fiercest flame,

If to more than one it fly,

'Tis not worthy of the name:

The crown of love is constancy!

Let love still adore the same,

If it fade with cheek or eye,

'Tis not worthy of the name:

The crown of love is constancy!

Let it be love, no force can tame,

If absent, it burn less than high,

'Tis not worthy of the name:

The crown of love is constancy!

Give me the love, whose faithful aim

Can absence, change, and time, defy;

This is worthy of the name—

This is crown'd with constancy!

If we cannot, at present, assign Mr. Townshend a high rank as a poet, we may safely say he gives great promise to attain it, and we recommend his volume to every lover of poetry.

Collections relative to Claims at the Coronations of several of the Kings of England, beginning with King Richard II. 8vo. pp. 95. London, 1820.

This little work, which is intended as a supplement to the more extended labours of Mr. Arthur Taylor and Mr. Thomson, exhibits in its official form, and from authentic sources, the claims made at various coronations during a long period, with the answers of the court, and their reasons for allowing or rejecting the claims. We shall not enter into any analysis of the work, or inquire why one person claims to furnish ‘a mess called dillegant,’ and another to ‘hold the towel when the King washes his hands,’ but shall quote the claim of the King's Champion, which has been hereditary in the family of Dymoke for some centuries, in right of the manor of Scrivelsby, in the county of Lincoln. The claim in the coronation of Charles the Second, was—

‘To be the King's Champion on his Coronation day. And as such, to have on the coronation day, one of the King's great coursers, with a saddle, harness, and trappings of cloth of gold, and one of the best suits of armour, with cases of cloth of gold, and all such other things appertaining to the King's body as entirely as the King ought to have them if he was going into mortal battle. And on the coronation day to be mounted on the said courser, trapped and furnished as aforesaid, being accompanied by the high constable and marshal of England, and the king's herald, with a trumpet sounding before him, to come riding into the hall to the place where the King sits at dinner with the crown on his head; and there, in the presence of the said King, and in the hearing of all the people, after the trumpet hath made three solemn proclamations, one of the king's heralds to proclaim with an audible voice, these words following, or others of such-like effect:—“That if any person, of whatsoever degree he be, either high or low, will deny or gainsay that Charles the Second, King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, son and next heir of our late sovereign lord, Charles the First, deceased, defender of the faith, being lineally and lawfully descended from the body of Margaret, daughter to the high and renowned Prince Henry the Second, King of England, France, and Ireland, and which Margaret was lawfully begotten of King Edward the Fourth, who was rightful King of the realm of England, ought not to enjoy the crown thereof, here is his champion ready by his body to assert and maintain that he lies like a false traitor, and in that quarrel to adventure his life on any day that shall be assigned him.” And thereupon the said champion throws down his gauntlet; and in case no man shall say that he is ready in that quarrel to combat, then, as hath been usually done at all former coronations of kings and queens of this realm, after the before-mentioned words, if any one will deny or gainsay that the King ought not to be crowned, are proclaimed, the Sovereign drinks to the said Champion, in a gold cup with a cover.

It is remarkable, that the challenge to any person to deny the King's right to be crowned, is not made until after the coronation has been concluded. It is made at dinner, between the first and second course. Most of the claimants demand fees; these are frequently either disallowed or curtailed. The following are generally granted:—

‘An account of what quantity of plate is given at the time of the coronation, according to the claims delivered in to the Lord High Chamberlain of England for that day:—

1. The Lord High Almoner for the day, according to claim, two large gilt basons 305 oz.

2. To the Duke of Norfolk, as Earl of Arundel, claiming, as Chief Butler of England, a gold cup, of a wine quart 52 oz.

3. To the Lord Mayor of London, as assistant to the chief butler, and to serve the King with wine after dinner, a gold cup 30 oz.

4. To the Mayor of Oxford, as assistant to the Lord Mayor of London, a gilt cup or potole, weighing about 110 oz.

5. To the Lord of the Manor of Great Wimondley, in Hertfordshire, as Chief Cupbearer, a silver-gilt cup, weighing about 32 oz.

6. To the Champion of England, as Lord of the Manor of Scrivelsby, in Lincolnshire, now in the Dymock family, a gold cup of Winchester pint 30 oz.

7. To the barons of the cinque ports, for their claim of supporting the King and Queen's canopies, each by twelve silver staffs of eight feet in height, with bells to each staff weighing 40 oz. The 24 staffs and bells weigh in all 960 oz.

8. The staff of the Lord High Constable of England is of silver, the ends gold enamelled with the King's arms and his own, weighing about 12 oz.

9. The staff of the Earl Marshal of England is of gold, enamelled black at each end, and engraved with the King's arms and his own, in length 28 inches, and weighs about 15 oz.

10. The gold coronet for Garter King of Arms, weighing about 24 oz.

11. The sceptre or rod for Garter, part silver and part gold 8 oz. 19 dwts.

12. The gold chain and badge for Garter 8 oz.

13. The gilt collar of S. S. with badges for Garter 30 oz.

14. The same for Lord Lyon, King of Arms for Scotland;—in all 70 oz. 19 dwts.

15. The same for Bath King of Arms;—in all 70 oz. 19 dwts.

16. The silver-gilt coronet for Clarenceux King of Arms, about 18 oz.

17. The silver-gilt collar of S. S. for the badges of portcullis only 20 oz.

18. The gold chain and badge, about 7 oz. 1 dwt. 17 gr.

19. The same for Norroy King of Arms;—in all about 46 oz.

20. The collar of S. S. partly gilt and partly white, for the six heralds 120 oz.

21. The collar of S. S. all plain silver, for the four pursuivants 30 oz.

22. The Usher of the Black Rod for England, whose gariture is of gold lace, upon a fine black ebony stick or rod, weight about 5 oz. 6 dwts.

23. The Usher of the Green Rod for Scotland, whose gariture is of silver, part gilt upon a green . . . , weighing about 20 oz. 15 dwts.

24. The wedges of gold which the King and Queen offer at the altar, each two wedges, at 20 oz. each,—in all gold 40 oz.

The Pamphleteer. Nos. XXXV. and XXXVI.

THE last two numbers of this very useful work, present a variety of interesting articles, many of which are original, on politics, jurisprudence, commerce, literature, &c. In the thirty-fifth number we find, under the head of politics, ‘The Declaration of England against the Acts and Projects of the Holy Alliance,’—‘Reflections on the conduct of the Allies,’—Constant's celebrated Pamphlet on ‘The Dissolution of the Chamber of Deputies,’—and ‘Phocion in Reply to Cato, in Defence of the People of England, and in Vindication of the Public Press.’ In jurisprudence, we have an ‘Essay on Criminal Jurisprudence, with the Draft of a New Penal Code,’ by Mr. Barber Beaumont, which is also continued in No. 36. We shall notice the code of this modern Solon in a week or two. There is another pamphlet on the same subject, by Mr. Holford, intitled ‘Thoughts on the Criminal Prisons of this country,’ and the ‘Exclusion of the Queen from the Liturgy,’ historically and legally considered, by a Barrister; a concise well-written tract, proving that the mention of the Queen's name in the Liturgy, has formed a part of our church service ever since the time of Henry the Eighth, and that the King has no power in himself to alter or dispense with it, any more than with any other existing law, without the consent of the legislature.

Under the head of commerce, there is the ‘Sketch of a Plan for a Reformation in the System of Provincial Banking,’ which the author proposes to effect by obliging country bankers to give security to the amount of the notes they may issue, by lodging adequate property in the hands of public functionaries, such as the Court of Chancery, &c. authorized for the purpose. Also a ‘Statement of the Present Timber and Deal Trade, as regards Europe and the British American Colonies,’ which is an original article, and appears to contain much useful information. The author is an enemy to any further encouragement of the timber trade from Canada, on the grounds of the noted defectiveness of the produce itself; and also from the ill effects which the encouragement given already to the Canadian trade has had upon the trade between the European nations and this country. The author is what our friend Baillie Nicol Jarvie would call ‘a man of figures, a man of calculation,’ and his statement is evidently the fruit of much patient investigation and personal experience, and is on that account well deserving attention.

In the literary department of this number, we may notice ‘Two Pairs of Historical Portraits,’ by Mr. Meadley, author of the ‘Memoirs of Dr. Pater,’ and of ‘Algernon Sidney.’ In the article before us, he gives ingenious parallels between the characters of Octavius Caesar and William Pitt, and Nicolo Rienzi and Bonaparte; the latter pair is new to the public, and is the most interesting of the two, particularly at the present moment. Another article considered as of a literary character, is Mr. Bowles's ‘Observations on the Poetical Character of Pope,’ being a further elucidation of ‘The Invariable Principles of Poetry,’ with a sequel, in reply to Mr. Gilchrist, a subject unworthy of the lengthened discussion it has undergone.

The thirty-sixth number contains a large proportion of articles entirely original. The first of them is on that ever-fruitlest subject, the national debt, and is entitled, ‘On the Expediency and Necessity of STRIKING OFF A PART OF THE NATIONAL DEBT; with Observations on its Practicability, with the least possible Injury.’ The author first examines into the distress of the country, and then into its expensiveness and revenue, of which he gives a table fully and accurately made out; he then proceeds to consider retrenchment, taxation, and loans: showing that the first is not sufficient, the cond not practicable; the third, an increase of an evil already nearly insupportable in its effects. He then considers the proportion of the taxes which goes merely to pay the interest of the national debt, and the sacrifices already made by the land-holder, merchant, and mechanic, which brings him to his main argument,—as to the propriety of the fundholder making a sacrifice in return; and he with much ingenuity and ability endeavours to show, that this sacrifice, after all, would be attended with so many beneficial results, and make his remaining property so much the more valuable, that it would be rather a nominal than a real one, though the advantages of it would be really and actually felt in every part and throughout every class of the united kingdom, by the diffusion of occupation, the consequent improvement of the moral character and happiness of the people, and the increase of the national prosperity.

The second article is 'Two Letters to the Right Hon. Lord Byron, in answer to his lordship's letter to Mr. Murray, by the Rev. W. L. Bowles, which we reviewed in our 104th number.

The third article is a continuation of Mr. Barber Beaumont's pamphlet.

The fourth article is an original 'Letter to G. Webb Hall, Esq. Secretary to the Board of Agriculture, &c. &c. in reply to his letter to the President of the Board of Trade, &c. and to the Views and Demands of the Agricultural Associations of the united kingdom. By Captain Robert E. Broughton.' This gentleman; a little whimsically, sets all our constitutional maladies in the most alarming point of view, and then says, that to propose a remedy would be foreign to his purpose. Indeed, he leaves off so abruptly in remarking, that now-a-days 'the moon comes nearer to the earth,' that, unless he himself is more under its influence than from the soundness of his remarks respecting the importation of corn, we should be willing to imagine, we may reasonably hope that he means to resume his subject in some future number of this interesting miscellany.

The same arguments respecting the importation of foreign corn, which the writer maintains is no way inimical to the agricultural interests, as are advanced in the letter we have just mentioned, are also urged in the 'Letter to the Rt. Hon. P. J. Robinson, President of the Board of Trade, on the present depressed State of Agriculture,' which forms the fifth article in this number. The sixth is a new translation of Corrado's celebrated pamphlet, intitled 'Sure Methods of attaining a Long and Healthful Life, with the Means of correcting a Bad Constitution,' being the thirty-third edition. The seventh article is an original Letter to the Bishop of Norwich, on a subject of the first importance to literature in general; and we, therefore, rejoice to see it so ably treated in these 'BRIEF OBSERVATIONS ON THE COPY-RIGHT BILL; attempting to prove its injustice towards authors, and its tendency to injure the cause of literature.' We confess, however, that we by no means think the copy-right law so great an evil as the author represents it. The eighth article is the continuation of an original one, commenced in the thirty-fourth number of this work, under the title of 'Protection to Agriculture, or Universal Ruin.' The ninth, which is likewise original, presents us with 'Further Remarks on some Passages in SCRIPTURE, relating to MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE,' with reference to the pamphlet under that title, in No. thirty-four. And the tenth and concluding one is—'A Letter to the Right Hon. Lord Byron, protesting against the Immolation of Gray, Cooper, and Campbell, at the Shrine of Poep.'

We are happy to see the Pamphleteer keep up its character, confident that, while so well conducted, it will form a very valuable record, for the use of future historians, of those floating materials which it is the province of history to arrange and to condense.

Picturesque Tour of the Seine. Part VI.

THE concluding part of this elegant work is just published, and as we have frequently noticed it in its progress, we shall now only observe, that it has fully justified the promise it gave at the commencement, and that it ought to have a favourite niche in every good library. From the description of Havre de Grace, we quote a brief notice of St. Pierre:—

'Havre has to boast of having given birth to J. H. Bernardin de St. Pierre, the celebrated author of "The Studies of Nature" and the exquisite tale of "Paul and Virginia." Qualified by his mathematical studies for the profession of a military engineer, he endeavoured to obtain a suitable appointment in his native country, but without success; on which he went to Russia, and offered his services to the Empress Catherine, by whom they were accepted. Disgusted by the conduct of that princess, in regard to the partition of Poland, but being unable to obtain an employment suitable to his wishes, he returned to France, and devoted the remainder of his days to the cultivation of literature. In his "Studies of Nature," he embodied with some fanciful theories the observations of his whole life, in language glowing with eloquence; and fraught with sentiments of the warmest philanthropy and unaffected tenderness. The same quality pervades his "Paul and Virginia," which, as we learn from the recent work of Mr. Aimé Martin, would probably never have been given to the world but for Mr. Vernet, the eminent marine painter. St. Pierre had, one evening, read this tale at Mr. Neckers's, to a company, among whom were Buffon, Thomas, and the Abbé Galiani, and from the manner in which those eminent writers listened to his production, St. Pierre was convinced that it was unworthy to see the light; and even formed the idea of committing the manuscript to the flames. Soon afterwards he received a visit from Vernet, who dissuaded him from his intention, and by his warm commendation of the performance, prevailed upon him to publish it. The extraordinary success of the work confirmed the opinion of his friend, increased the popularity, and greatly improved the pecuniary resources of the author. St. Pierre died in 1813, leaving an unfinished work, since published under the title of "Harmories of Nature," resembling, in its general character, his earlier productions.'

Waltz; an Apostrophic Hymn. By Horace Hornem, Esq. 8vo. pp. 40. London, 1821.

Most gladly would we 'give to every man his proper title, lest he be offended,' yet we are compelled to withhold from Horace Hornem, Esq. the addition of the title-page, that he is 'the noble author of Don Juan.' We do not profess to be either so deeply skilled in the poetry of Lord Byron, or so much in the secret with his friends, as to pronounce on every poem that has been attributed to him, that it has or has not proceeded from his pen; but, with all due deference to the publisher of the 'Waltz,' who declares his lordship to be its author, we disbelieve it, and positively deny that the 'style in which it is written, clearly evinces the pen of its noble author.' In support of this assertion, we might appeal to the whole poem and the notes, not a single passage of which breathes the genius or spirit of Byron. A single couplet will be sufficient to show how unlike it is to any thing written by his lordship:—

'Tenshore forgive! at every ball
My wife now waltzes and my daughters shall.'

Although we have denied this poem to be by Lord Byron, yet we do not deny that it possesses some merit. It is introduced by a letter to the publisher, from Horace Horneum, who has married a middle-aged maid of honour, with whom he lived happily for fourteen years, until the 'Waltz' was introduced into this country, when Mrs. Horneum caught the mania, which annoyed him excessively, and he wrote a hymn ironically in its praise. We quote one passage as a specimen:—

'Imperial Waltz! imported from the Rhine, (Famed for the growth of pedigrees and wine),
Long be thine import from all duty free,
And hock itself be less esteemed than thee;
In some few qualities alike—for hock
Improves our cellar—show our living stock.
The head to hock belongs; thy subtler art
Intoxicates alone the heedless heart;
Through the full veins thy gentler poison
swims,
And wakes to wantonness the willing limbs.

Oh, Germany! how much to thee we owe,
As heaven-born Pitt can testify below;
Ere curs'd Confederation made these France's,
And only left us thy—d debts and dances;
Of subsidies and Hanover bereft,
We bless thee still—for George the Third is left!
Of kings the best—and last, not least in worth,
For graciously begetting George the Fourth.
To Germany and highnesses serene,
Who owe us millions—don't we owe thee
Queen?

To Germany, what owe we not besides?
So oft bestowing Brunswicks and brides;
Who paid for vulgar, with her Royal blood,
Drawn from the stream of each Teutonic stud;
Who sent us—so be pardoned all her faults,
A dozen dukess—some kings—a queen—and
"Waltz."

Travels in Georgia, Persia, &c. &c.
By Sir Robert Ker Porter.

[We have only room this week for a short extract which is an account of the Assassins, &c.]

THE mountains of Elborz are noted in Persia, by numerous legends, respecting a malignant race of demons fabled to possess their extremest heights; and it was amongst the wildest recesses of Elborz, that the fiend-like sect, so horribly famous in the histories of the crusades under the name of Assassins, spread themselves from those remote eastern regions to the hills of Syria. Of this sect our traveller gives an interesting account:—

'The faith of these people was a wild aberration from the Mahomedan creed, mingling with its laws and fatalities the transigratory doctrines of the Hindoos; and, in consequence, they believed that their prince or imam was a successive incarnation of the Great Prophet, and that every behest of his to good or evil, must be obeyed as implicitly as the word of God himself. The first of this tribe who arrogated these divine pretensions, was Hassan Saheb; a man whose domineering passions, consummate subtlety, and persevering spirit of enterprise, perfectly fitted for his plan of imposture. He appeared about the year 1090; and by various intrigues, and singular mysterious deportment, as well as so invincible a courage that few dared to resist that approached it, he inspired the ignorant barbarians around him with a firm belief in his mission, and an enthusiastic devotion to himself. His despotic authority followed of course. Once secure of his empire over these mountain hordes, he secured every pass with fastnesses; and holding himself totally independent of the surrounding states, he spread his colonies over Elborz, and along the whole range of hills to beyond Tabreez; whence they issued forth, singly or in bands, at the command of their imam, or his deputed emissaries, to destroy by open assault, ambuscade, or private murder, all people or persons that were obnoxious either to his ambition or his avarice. Christians, Jews, Mahomedans of Omar or of Ali, all were alike the subjects of his excommunication; and he sold his dagger, or rather that of his followers, to whatever party were vile enough to buy the blood of their enemies. There was a mystical obscurity about his person, and in the views of his widely extending government, with a dauntless determination of proceeding, which held the princes of that dark age in a kind of superstitious awe. Jealous of his sway, and abhorring his tenets; contemning his divine pretensions, yet doubting whether he did not possess some superhuman means of mischief; they dreaded a power, which seemed to hang over themselves and people with constant threatening, though never showing when nor where it would strike. He soon acquired from these appalled sovereigns, the vague but supreme title of Sheik-ul-Jebal, or lord of the mountains; while in the minds of the most superstitious people, he might well be considered one of the dreadful Deces, or Demons of the waste.

'It so happened, that for more than two centuries, in short, from their accession to their extinction, every successor of the first Imam inherited the same disposition to turn the blind zeal of their followers to the worst purposes. A colony of these fanatics, under the leading of one of Hassan Saheb's most odious representatives, settled themselves among the heights of Lebanon, and have been variously called Ismaelians, Bathenians, or Assassins. That colony is the best known to European historians, from the horrible enormities which its people committed in the towns and villages of the Holy Land; and not less so on the persons and lives of some of our most gallant crusaders. It is woeful to read who were the victims of these savages; but often much more horrible to turn the page and find who were their employers. Their universal violence, however, at last, armed every hand against them; and, much about the same time, towards the end of the thirteenth century, they were rooted out of Syria and Egypt, (whither they had extended themselves) and from their original seats in Persia; leaving nothing but their appropriate appellation of assassins behind them; no longer to be considered what it had originally imported, the mere distinguishing name of a sect, but to have severally affixed from age to age hereafter, as a peculiar brand of infamy, on every treacherous, secret, or hired murderer.

'Halukoo, the mogul conqueror of Persia and of the family of the famous Zingis Khan, was the prince whose victorious arms almost repaid to his new dominions, the devastations of his conquest, by the entire extirpation of the lawless race, which had so long preyed on the vitals of the country.' ANECDOTE OF

NAPOLEON BONAPARTE.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

'Ever renowned blows a note of fame,
And a note of terror when his chronicle his name.'
GIOVANNI SPOGLIO.

MR. EDITOR,—Under the feeling that now, when—

'A mighty spirit is eclipsed, a power Hath pass'd from day to darkness,' every thing that is connected with him will be interesting to the reader, I send you the following anecdote.

When the late Emperor of the French was in Egypt, he had a Mameluke attendant, who was particularly attached to him, seldom leaving his side. One evening, Napoleon, after the fatigues of a scorching day, retired to his tent, and was for some time employed in writing; sleep at length overcame him, and, while sleeping, the plume which he wore in his hat nodded over the light which was on the table, and was instantly in a blaze; the faithful but unfortunate Mameluke, who stood sentinel at the entrance, rushed in to extinguish the fire; the Emperor, suddenly awakened by the noise, and unable in the confusion to distinguish between friend and foe, snatched his pistol from the table, and that heart which so faithfully beat received the fatal contents; he fell, and Napoleon never forgot nor forgave the rashness which cost the life of one so true.

S. R. J.

P. S. I do not remember seeing the above in print, and I am confident it has never been printed, at least not in England.

WELSH POETRY.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—I hope your correspondent CAMERO will excuse me, if I request to be favoured, through the medium of your publication, with the original of the 'free translation from the Welsh,' which appeared in your last number. From one cause or other, it has fallen to my lot to pay considerable attention to Welsh literature, both ancient and modern; but in all my experience, I must be allowed to say, I never met with any passage in the least degree resembling the one you have inserted. The 'Sketch,' I take it for granted, is designed by your correspondent for a poetical one; yet it is in every respect at variance with the acknowledged characteristics of the Welsh muse. In the first place; the strict and formal laws of Welsh prosody would never admit, even in a free translation, of the diffuse style which distinguishes this 'Sketch.' And again, the poetry of Wales is marked by those abrupt transitions of thought, which it is extremely difficult to represent to advantage in any other language: it is often forcible and sublime, but very rarely like the specimen furnished by CAMERO,—tender and sentimental. The following translation of a passage describing the day of judgment, selected from the works of Casiodyn, a poet of the thirteenth century, will exemplify what I have now stated. The original may be found in the first volume of the Welsh Archaeology:—

* When God shall manifest his presence,
The house of earth shall uplift itself over us,
The terror of the tumultuous sound of legions
in conflict,
Will be taking its course,—a loudly shouting wind will be howling,
The wave of varied hue will bespraying itself
about the shore,
The sulphureous element will be taking to itself high wrath,
The fervency of the heat of fire will be hastening out.

I might adduce many similar examples, and some, perhaps, even more to the point than this; but at present I deem it unnecessary. I will, therefore, in conclusion only repeat my request, that your correspondent would oblige me by stating where I might find the original of his 'free translation,' provided it be in print. And, if it be not, perhaps he will have the goodness to transmit a copy to you, or even a part of it, which would be sufficient to remove the doubts I cannot help now entertaining respecting the genuineness of this Welsh sketch.

And I would also observe, that 'Marian' is a name which has no connexion with Wales.

ORDOVEX.

THE CORONATION*.

It would be a very curious inquiry to trace the various modes that have been adopted in different ages for the election and elevation of kings, from the rude customs of the Gothic nations to the present splendid ceremonial of an English coronation. The right of choosing their kings was exercised by all the tribes of ancient Germany; and the way in which these princes received the regal dignity was equally expressive of the tenure by which it was held, and of the qualities for which it was conferred. The king or commander, who was chosen by the people in a public assembly, was placed on a shield or target, and carried about on the shoulders of his men, while the multitude saluted him with shouts and loud applause. It was the custom in Navarre, that both the King and Queen, after being anointed, should set their feet on a shield emblazoned with the arms of the kingdom, and supported on six staves, each end of which was held by a nobleman. In this manner they were thrice lifted up before the high altar of the cathedral church. Imperial Rome was likewise an imitator of the barbarous North in the forms of conferring royalty; and in the Greek empire the same customs were adopted and long retained.

In an ancient law of Don Pelayo, one of the Gothic kings of Spain, are the following directions for the creation of their kings. 'Let the king be chosen and admitted in the metropolitan city of this kingdom, or, at least, in some cathedral church; and, the night before he is exalted, let him watch all night in the church; and the next day, when they come to lift him up, let him step upon a buckler or target, and the chief and principal men there present hold the target, and so lifting him up, let the people cry with a loud voice, Real! real! real!'

The Anglo-Saxon form of coronation directs that the King shall be carried from the ground, and having been chosen by the bishops and people, promise that he will observe the rules which are enjoined by his coronation oath.

* In this article we have availed ourselves largely of Mr. Taylor's Glory of Regality, and Thomson's Coronation Ceremonies, works full of interesting details on the subject.

It was the custom of the Scandinavian nations, the Norwegians, Swedes, and Danes, to form a circle of large stones, commonly twelve in number, in the middle of which one was set up much larger than the rest; this was the royal seat, and the nobles occupied those surrounding it, which served also as a barrier to keep off the people who stood without. Here the leading men of the kingdom delivered their suffrages, and placed the elected king on his seat of dignity. Of this kind was the morasten near Upsal, in Sweden, described by Olaus Magnus. In Denmark there are monuments of this kind, and the custom is said to have existed in Germany until the year 1356.

A similar rude enthronement to that of the northern nations is to be found among the Celtic tribes; and that the kings both of Scotland and Ireland, were placed on a stone at the time of their election, we have the testimony of the antiquaries of those nations.

The following singular customs are said to have been used at the inauguration of the ancient Dukes of Carinthia. Near the city of Saint Veit is a plain where the vestiges of a former town are still to be seen, and in a meadow just by, a large stone raised about two cubits from the ground. On this stone was placed a peasant who enjoyed by descent the right of presiding at the inauguration of the dukes, having near him, on his right hand, a black cow with a calf, and on his left a lean and hungry mare; the people of St. Veit, and a crowd of peasants, being assembled around him. The duke, in a countryman's bonnet and shoes, with a shepherd's crook in his hand, drew near to the assembly, accompanied by the senators clad in scarlet, and the great officers bearing their insignia. The man upon the stone seeing the train come nigh, cried out—Who is this that comes in such magnificence? The people answered, it is the prince of the country. Is he a just judge? replied the peasant: doth he seek the welfare of the state? is he of free condition, worthy of honour, obedient to the laws, and a defender of the Christian religion? They cried, he is and he will be such. The peasant then demanded by what right he would remove him from his seat; to which the master of the duke's court answered, this place is bought for 60 deniers; these beasts are thine (pointing to the cow and the mare) thou shalt be clothed in the garments which the duke will take off; and thy house shall be free, and exempt from tribute. The peasant then came down from the stone, gave the duke a gentle slap on the cheek, and exhorting him to be a good judge, went away with his cattle. The prince then took his place on the stone, brandished his naked sword, turning to every side, and promised to judge the people with equity. A peasant's cap was then presented, filled with water, from which he was obliged to drink as a mark of his future sobriety. He was then conducted to the church, where he assisted at divine service and changed the peasant's dress for the ducal habit. After the feast which followed, he returned to the meadow, in which a throne had been set up, and here he gave judgment and conferred fiefs.

The point in our English ceremony which is most analogous to the Gothic and German elevations is that of our Kings being anciently placed upon a seat in Westminster Hall, which was thence denominated THE KING'S BENCH. This seat is by our old writers described as a marble seat and that there stood before it a marble table; and here our Kings were used to sit before their progress to coronation. Stowe describes it as a long marble stone of twelve feet in length and three feet in breadth,* and he says there was also, 'a marble chair where the Kings of England formerly sate at their coronation dinners.' Richard II. Richard III. and Henry VII. are all instances of King's setting in this marble chair.*

As Christianity began to make progress in Europe, the rude customs which we have described were superseded by more refined and awful ceremonies. The nations of the North and West learned to encircle the brow of their king with the diadem, to place the sceptre in his hand, to sanctify his person with the consecrated unction, and to confirm his authority with the benediction of the clergy; hence the new forms of inauguration may be sufficiently accounted for.

The ceremonies of unction and coronation were both derived from the Israelites as the sacred writings shew; the former is said to have been first introduced among European nations, at Constantinople, about the time of Justinian or Justin; and, in the western empire, it began with Charlemagne, whence it extended to other nations.

The royal crown or diadem is first mentioned in the book of Samuel, when the Amalekites brought Saul's crown to David; its use is as ancient in the empire as the time of Constantine. The sceptre, another ensign of royalty, is much antiequater than either the crown or diadem. Homer mentions kings with sceptres, but none with crowns. The use of sceptres, which, with that of crowns, hath long been common to the European nations, is very ancient in our own.

Of the ceremonies now used at the coronation of our kings it is not our intention to speak. As the newspapers are daily filled with the most ample details respecting them, we shall only observe, that the preparations made for the approaching coronation are on a more splendid scale than on any similar occasion that has preceded it. The arrangements making, to enable countless thousands to witness some portion of it, are on a scale quite unprecedented; and we understand that many will be accommodated on terms comparatively moderate.

A writer in the London Magazine for the year 1761, who had inquired into the subject of former prices for seats at coronations, states, that on consulting Stowe, Speed, and other antiquaries, with regard to the sums anciently given, it appears that the amount of a good place at the coronation of the Conqueror, was a blank, and probably the same at that of his son, William Rufus. 'At Henry the First's it was a crocad; and at Stephen's and Henry the Second's, a pollard. At Richard's and King John's, who was crowned frequently, it was a suskin; and rose at Henry the Third's to a dodkin. In the reign of Edward, the coins begin to be more intelligible, and we find, that for seeing his coronation a Q. was given, or the half a ferling or farthing; which was the fourth part of a sterling or penny. At Edward II. it was a farthing; and at his son's, Edward III. a halfpenny, which was very well given. In Richard the Second's thoughtless reign it was a penny, and continued the same at that of Henry IV. At Henry V. it was two penies, or the half of a grossus or groat; and the same at that of Henry VI. though, during his time, coronations were so frequent, that the price was brought back to the penny or halfpenny, and sometimes they were seen for nothing. At Edward IV. it was again the halfgroat; nor do we find it raised at those of Richard III. or Henry VII. At that of Henry VIII. it was the whole groat, or grossus; nor was it altered at those of Edward VI. and Queen Mary; but at Queen Elizabeth's it was a testour, or tester. At those of James I. and Charles I. a shilling was given; which was advanced to half-a-crown at those of Charles II. and James II. At King William's and Queen Anne's it was a crown; and at George I. it was seven by many for the same price. At George II. some gave half-a-guinea.*

To our readers as may be fortunate enough to see any part of the splendid ceremonial, the following information respecting the dresses of the peers, may be of some service:—

The Barons of England, who constitute the lowest part of the peerage, had formerly neither coronets nor velvet robes, but only a cap of scarlet edged with fur, and a habit of cloth of the same colour. In the thirteenth year of the reign of King Charles the Second, he issued a grant, permitting them to use the coronet which they now wear; and which consists of a plain circle of gold, having six pearls set upon the upper rim, the lower part of the circle edged with ermine, and the whole surmounted by a cap of crimson velvet, with a tuft and tassel of gold. At the coronation of King James the Second, in 1684, the barons petitioned for robes conformable to their coronets, and accordingly a grant was issued, stating that, for the future, their robes should be of crimson velvet, with capes and edgings of white miniver, and two rows of ermine as a distinction.

A viscount, which is the next degree upwards, has for his coronet a circle of gold, richly chased, edged with ermine, and sixteen pearls, placed on the rim, with a cap and tassel similar to a baron's. His robes are also of crimson velvet, lined with white sarcenet, with white fur capes, and two doublings and a half of spotted ermine.

The coronet of an earl is a circle as before, richly chased, having eight pearls raised upon high points of gold, which spring out of the upper rim, with an equal number of strawberry leaves, formed of the same metal, standing upon lower points between them. It has also a doubling of ermine, cap, and tassel, as already described. An earl's mantle is similar to the former, except that it has three guards of ermine.

* For a description of the coronation chair at present used. See The Literary Chronicle, No. 48.

* For an account of the prices at the last coronation, see Literary Chronicle, No. 38.

A marquise's coronet differs from an earl's in the number of pearls and strawberry leaves, and in the manner of placing them. It consists of four of each ornament placed alternately, on short equal points, with the same doubling, cap, and tassel. The robes have three guards and a-half of ermine.

A duke's coronet is formed of eight golden strawberry leaves only, raised on short points of the same height above the rim; the fur, cap, and tassel are the same as before. The robes belonging to this degree have four rows of ermine.

It is necessary, however, to observe, that robes, as well as coronets, are regulated by the Earl Marshal's orders at every coronation.

THE WAY TO BE HAPPY.

* Wisely every hour employ,
Happiness is present joy.—PRISON.

THE world—it is a scene of busy action: a monarch struggles on his throne and glitters in a golden shew, to justify his claims and smile beneath a precious crown;—his advocates surround him with temporal honours, and shed the lustre of their ancestry and glory at his royal feet.—A poor man whistles in his native fields and wears the ardour of the sun—quickness is his shadow and peace his daily guest—civility and grace accompany the courtier to his palace—anxiety draws lines on every aspiring and ambitious brow—the housewife hastes to complete her destined task—the child is hurried forward into learning and tutored for advantage in life—the sailor trims his sails to hasten his passage home—the attorney to prepare his client's briefs—the coachman to arrive at the inn, where many an expectant countenance is formed to shake hands at meeting, and laugh at pleasant tidings of distant friends being well—and the widow, too, is hurrying pensively from the grave which has just received her only hope and stay, into its cold and senseless shell—the bride and bridegroom, gay as the flowers appear in a sunny hour after a rainbow-morning, speed to the feast and entertain their jocund friends—the beauty of the fields is swept before the mowers' persevering toil—the pride of the gardens is destroyed with the destructive armies of ravenous insects—the skies are overspread with the velocity of airy substances—a flock of sheep lies at the mercy of a storm, and the cattle are seeking shelter from electric explosions—birds are bringing forth their young, and instructing them in the unerring feats of instinct for future preservation: in short,—the whole creation is alive to some pursuit, occupied in some duty, striving to accomplish some end, and all the species of animal and intelligent beings are looking for HAPPINESS. Why are tens of thousands thus employed? Is Happiness so far away? Is there not present Happiness? Must mortals look so far beyond their knowledge of existence to the future to secure Happiness? Why live upon the breath of hope which dies, and is renewed with expectation? Why toil so long, and venture so far to obtain Happiness?—It resides in a cottage, it dwells in a mansion: that cottage and this mansion are in the human breast; it is the constant satisfaction of good actions being done first towards self, and afterwards towards all mankind,—keeping contentment in the heart—benevolence in the mind—duty in the practice—fortitude in the warfare—omnipotence in the eye—his rewards in the prospect:—uprightness of conduct will justify the conscience, humane exertions improve the capacity, cheerful and suitable conversation refine the animal spirits and make salutary the innumerable incidents which fall into the scale of rational creatures. Such are a few of the accepted and acceptable sentiments of the writer; that they may be taken in the spirit of harmony and kindness by the reader, is the secret but sincere wish of

LINES TO A FRIEND,
On his Departure for Scotland.

COULD temperance have kept thee strong,
Or could our prayers thy health restore,
Thou woud'st not have been weak thus long,
Nor need'st at thou now seek Scotia's shore.

But, since disease comes not alone
To those who madly tempt its ire,
But makes the purest bosom groan,
And fills the calmest heart with fire;

Since even thou must know the cold,
And languid listless suffering,
Which thy whom sickness doth enfold
Must still endure un murmuring;

Since such, dear friend, must be thy fate,
Go, seek the land of cakes and song,
And may its breezes re-instate
The health of him we love, ere long!

THE EXILE'S WISH.

Art! what avails the secret sigh
Or solitary tear,
When neither will the wish supply
Which both in union share?

What, while in distant realms I roam,
Averts the festive scene?
I sigh to seek my native home,
Thou ocean rolls between.
As I survey the curling wave
That waltzes at my feet,
It hies, a distant shore to lave,
A distant realm to greet.

The truant breeze that idly blows,
Oh claims the passing sigh;
And stealing, tells me that it knows
The sweets of liberty.
Each has its charm, while both provide
A solace for the mind;
The destination of the tide—
The current of the wind.

The wave on ocean's bosom borne,
Thou' it return no more,
May, giddy, to the blench of morn,
Salute my native shore.

The balmy breeze that wanders by,
May know a happier lot;
And, borne on swifter pinions, fly
Around my humble cot.

Should they return the exile sigh
May each a token bear;
The breeze be loaded with a sigh,
The billow with a tear. H. G. B.

SONG.

Aldvalloch, imitated from the Gaelic.

Tune, 'Roy's Wife.'

Will ye go to Aldvalloch?

Will ye go to Aldvalloch?

Sweet the mellow notes sing,
Among the brakes of Aldvalloch.

There, beneath the spreading boughs,
Among the woods of green Glenfallach,
Softly murmuring as it flows,
Winds the pure stream of Aldvalloch.

Will ye go to Aldvalloch, &c.
The first golden smile of morn,
And the last beam that evening sheds,
Bath that echoing vale adorn—
That brightly glows, this mildly fades.

Will ye go, &c.

* The lady who favoured the public with the well-known song called 'Roy's Wife' forgot to mention the obligation she lay under to the original, of which the above is a close imitation, and, in some instances, a literal translation. This beautiful air is at least a hundred and twenty years old, for I learnt it twenty-eight years ago, from a Mrs. McHardy, who was then in the hundred and sixth year of her age, and who said that, when a little girl, she had learnt it of her mother; whereas, the Scotch words to the same tune have not been known half that time. Indeed, the greater part of the old Scotch melodies may be traced to the Gaelic bards: 'The Ewie wi' the cooked horn,' 'The rock and the wee pickle toot,' &c., are of Gaelic original, and have been known in the Highlands from time immemorial.—As I am upon this subject, I cannot help mentioning, that the last stanza of 'Roy's Wife' has been rendered downright nonsense, by the creation of the uncouth term Aldvalloch, in order to rhyme with the proper name, Aldvalloch. New words are daily invented, to designate things not already adequately described, but no such dance as 'The Highland Walloch' ever did exist, though any one but a Highlander, on reading the stanzas in question, would be led to suppose the reverse.

Short is there hour winter's stay,
 When spring returns like flave blooming—
 Hand in hand with rosy May,
 With balmy breath the air perfuming.—
 Will ye go, &c.

Brushing o'er the diamond dew,
 While Phœbus casts a lengthened shadow,
 There the fairest maiden's foot,
 The fairest flowers that deck the meadow.
 Will ye go, &c.

But there's a flower, a fairer flower
 Than ever grew in green Glenfallich,
 The Mithome maiden I adore,
 Young blooming May of Aldavallich.
 Will ye go, &c.

Let me but pu' this opening rose,
 And fondly press it to my bosom—
 I ask no other flower that blows,
 Be mine this modest little blossom.
 Will ye go, &c.

ROYAL ACADEMY.

As the exhibition of the Royal Academy closes this day, the few remaining observations which we shall make, must rather be of a general than a particular description. We should, however, be wanting in justice to an artist of considerable promise, Mr. S. Taylor, were we to pass unnoticed his four very charming pictures, Nos. 175, 178, 220, and 415. They are 'Woodcock and Teal,' 'Wild Ducks,' 'Horned Owl from the life,' and 'a Brace of Partridges.' They are all very spirited and well executed paintings, distinguished by correct drawing and chaste colouring.

In taking our leave of the exhibition, we cannot but regret that there are so few historical pictures, a branch of the fine arts which is said not to be sufficiently encouraged in this country; but this we can scarcely admit, for although individual patronage may be somewhat limited, yet we believe that no really good historical picture has ever remained long without a liberal purchaser; and, as to public patronage, let those painters who have exhibited single historical pictures, deny that it has invariably been extensive: not to mention the munificent encouragement extended to this branch of the arts by the British Institution. It is true that, in a country like this, where riches are so much diffused and often so rapidly acquired, when it is seldom unaccompanied by vanity, encouragement will be principally given to portrait painting; and hence the great attention that is devoted to it, of which the walls of the Royal Academy every year give abundant evidence. The exhibition this year contained some hundreds of portraits, from the full-length as-large-as-life to the humble miniature; but of these how very few were interesting either as to the personages represented or the merits of the paintings; and certainly, without one of these recommendations, they can be interesting only to the feelings of the exhibitor or to the vanity of those who are thus exhibited at second hand.

In landscape painting this country is certainly making rapid advances; and, as England is sufficiently rich in scenery, our artists need not go to Italy for admirable subjects on which to exercise their pencil.

The architectural drawings in the exhibition this year are very poor, if we except two sketches by Mr. Soane. It is lamentable to think, that while millions are expending on public buildings, we have scarcely a single erection in the metropolis worthy of the age or country.

Of the sculpture we have already spoken; but there is another department on which we would offer a few words—the medals. The few that have been sent to the Academy this year exhibit proofs of considerable talent in our native artists; and we feel persuaded, that if this branch of art were only a little more encouraged, we need not send to Italy for artists to execute our coins, unless, indeed, they could give better proof of their talents than the one who has now the direction in the British Mint.

We are sensible that, in our notice of the Royal Academy, we have omitted several good pictures and neglected many deserving artists; but it was only possible, within the limits of this journal, to notice a few of the 1165 articles in the Academy, especially as the metropolis now teems with exhibitions, each of which presents a distinct claim on our attention.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE THEATRE.—Mr. Mackay, having entered into an engagement for a few nights at this theatre, has frequently repeated the character of the Bailie Nicol Jarvie, and with increased effect. In noticing this gentleman's performance, it would be unjust not to take into consideration the disadvantageous circumstances under which he appears. If, as is generally allowed, it is unfortunate to follow a favourite, it is still more so to appear in competition with one. The characters of Bailie Nicol Jarvie and Dominie Sampson have so exclusively become the property of Liston, that we can scarcely tolerate them in any other hands, much less judge of them with that strict impartiality which is due to an actor who undertakes them. The face of Liston (and what a face it is!) is his natural simplicity and comic humour; and the satisfaction which he feels in himself, in every thing he says and does, fairly seduces into applause, though it should sometimes be against our better judgment. Mr. Mackay also has his merits, and he represents the Glasgow weaver with singular fidelity to nature. In the scene in the toll-booth, where he encounters Rob Roy, and where the dignity of the magistrate is made to yield to his fears of the freebooter, and the eagerness with which he agrees to accompany Francis Osbaldistone to Aberfoil, when assured of receiving the 200l. he was very fine. In the rencontre with Major Galbraith, at the inn, he was equally successful, and the confidence with which he offered bail for the 'Dougall creature,' and his surprise that it should be refused, were extremely comic, as well as the excellent use he made of the red-hot poker. His interview with Helen Macgregor, and his reproaches to his companion, for leaving him dangling in the air like Mahomet's coffin, were admirable, and we hesitate not to pronounce the whole character as extremely well acted. Mr. Cooper played Rob Roy with great spirit, and in some of the scenes we were much pleased with him. Mrs. Egerton proved herself, in Helen Macgregor, a fit wife for so daring a chieftain. Her exclamation, 'I stand on my native heath,—I am a Macgregor,' was really astounding, and did not require the violent stamp of the foot by which it was accompanied. Mr. Barnard played Rushleigh Osbaldistone as ill as it was possible to play it. This gentleman ought to be called the syllabic actor, for he carefully divides every word into syllables, which he pronounces very distinctly. He also, as Mathews has it, 'exasperates the aitch,' where he ought not to do so.

On Tuesday night, the Queen honoured this theatre with her presence, and was received with the accustomed testimonies of applause, and the honours of the national anthem sung two or three times. The play was the opera of Guy Rannering, a very unfortunate one for the Drury Lane company to attempt at present, since there is scarcely a single character in it that they can play well. The principal acvelty of the evening, was Mr. Mackay's Dominie Sampson; though in the sentimental scenes he was very effective, yet he failed to mantle the character with that rich humour in which we have hitherto seen it clothed. He, however, played it very respectably. One praise we must give Mr. Mackay,—his continual attention to the business of the scene, and his by-play, which is excellent. He is also a very chaste performer, who only seeks applause by legitimate means, and not by artificial attempts at effect. The Spectre Bridegroom is quite successful, and has been played every evening.

NEW THEATRE ROYAL HAYMARKET.—Since our last we have had the pleasure of hearing comfortably some of our best dramatic pieces, and seeing the countenances of the performers without any extraordinary ocular exertions: one defect in the theatre, however, cannot pass unnoticed—the seats in the side boxes are too far from the front; to sit trimly the view of the stage is obstructed, and in leaning forward the distance is too great to be comfortable. The School for Scandal, The Provoked Husband, The Green Man, and a succession of good after-pieces make good promise of the taste which directs the management; and on Thursday Rule a Wife and have a Wife with a Roland for an Oliver were played with much spirit. Mr. Conway as Leon gave great effect to the character, and Mr. Decamp bustled through the Copper Captain extremely well. Mrs. Johnson's delineation of the wily jilt, Estifania, deserves particular commendation. In a Roland for an Oliver we were pleased with Mrs. Baker's Maria Darlington; and Mr. Williams's Sir Mark Clare, Mr. Hammond's Fixture, and Mr. Decamp's Highflyer, were good performances.

ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.—The clever little operatic piece, Love's Dream, continues to be played every night with deserved applause. A young lady has appeared once or twice in a vocal character, but we have not yet had the opportunity to hear her. The stock pieces at this house, which are numerous and well played, have drawn tolerable houses, but novelty is still much wanted.

SORREY THEATRE.—Mr. Dibdin's Heart of Mid Lothian, on which all the terms of praise have long been exhausted, had a new compliment paid to it on Saturday, when it was performed by command of her Majesty, who honoured the theatre with her company. The characters were the same as they have usually been represented, and the piece appeared to give much pleasure to the royal visitor. The Fate of Calas and Harlequin Hoax have drawn good houses during the week, and two new pieces are to be produced on Monday, for the benefit of the worthy proprietor, Mr. Dibdin, whose talents and industry entitle him to the highest patronage.

SADLER'S WELLS.—Her Majesty, on Thursday, honoured this little theatre with a visit, and the house was crowded beyond precedent. The evening's amusements were The Mountain Hut or The Tinker and his Son, a burletta, and Harlequin at Home. The audience applauded every sentiment they could construe as applicable to her Majesty's circumstances, in the most favourable way, and the whole performance went off in the best manner possible.

MR. KEAN IN AMERICA.

THE career of Mr. Kean in America, has met with a slight interruption at Boston, which, it is said, he quitted in disgust, on account of the want of patronage. The transatlantic journals are quite indignant at his conduct, as will appear by the following extracts from Boston papers, dated May 28:—

'Mr. Kean, the great tragedian, was to have personated the character of Richard the Third, last evening, at the Federal-street Theatre. At the usual time of raising the curtain, a very respectable, though not a crowded auditory, had assembled. After waiting till nearly 8 o'clock, considerable uneasiness was displayed by the audience, and loud calls for the manager were heard from several parts of the house. Mr. Duff immediately came forward, and stated that "it was with extreme regret he was obliged to say, that Mr. Kean had positively refused to appear again on the Boston boards!" This information was certainly very disagreeable, and an awful silence pervaded the house for the space of two minutes. Mr. Duff requested the indulgence of the audience, and the play was accordingly permitted to proceed, Mr. Brown performing the part of Richard. Mr. Kean has been treated in Boston as well as he could have reasonably expected to have been, and if he had checked his passion "one little week longer," he would not only have fulfilled his private contract, and made one or two thousand dollars, but retired from our stage beloved and respected, but now he is universally despised. He left town this forenoon, privately, for New-York, as we suppose, where we hope he will receive such treatment as his imprudence entitles him to.'—Commercial Advertiser.

'After a very respectable audience, and more numerous than some of those which the truly great Cooke played before, had assembled at the theatre, to see Richard the Third, Mr. Kean took it in his head that the audience was unworthy his merit, bolted from the theatre, announced to the manager that he should play no more, and that he was preparing to leave town. The audience received this specimen of rude superciliousness with marked contempt, and many called out for the substitution of the eccentric Kemble (who was in the pit) for the fugitive Kean. The play proceeded without interruption, Mr. Brown amply supplying the place of the runaway.'—Gazette.

'The Theatre.—A few minutes before eight o'clock last evening, Mr. Duff appeared on the stage, and announced to the audience that Mr. Kean had refused to take the part cast him, (Richard III.) without assigning any reason for so doing, and that he was then preparing to leave town. On the rising of the curtain, there being some slight disturbance and a call for the manager, Mr. Duff again appeared and stated, that Mr. Kean had been, during the day, repeatedly importuned by the managers and his friends, to appear in the part, but that he absolutely declined. Mr. D. on being questioned, said he believed the reason of Mr. K.'s conduct was want of patronage.'—Patriot.

Mr. Kean has published a very temperate letter in the New York National Advocate, in which he says that the offence with which he is charged, was committed with the concurrence of the Boston managers, and with the approbation of friends with whom he spent the evening. It appears that, in Boston, the theatres are only visited in certain months of the year, and that when curiosity subsides, dramatic talent is no longer patronized. Mr. Kean, who three months before had drawn large houses at Boston, on his second visit acted twice without profit, and on the third night, when the curtain was about to rise, there were only twenty persons in front of the house. He declares his intention to revisit Boston before he returns to England, and says if he has committed an error he is willing to apologize for it. Google

GOVERNNESS.—A YOUNG LADY, who has just completed her Education, and is fully competent to teach French and English grammatically, Geography, Writing, History, &c. is desirous of becoming an inmate in a respectable family, in or near London, where the Education of two or three Children would be considered an equivalent for her Board and Lodging. A comfortable home being the Advertiser's chief consideration, Salary will be no object. Further particulars, with unexceptionable references, will be given in reply to letters addressed, post paid, to E. T., Office of the Literary Chronicle and Weekly Review, 355, Strand.

ITALY. BY LADY MORGAN.—Lady Morgan's Italy has now been open to the public for several days, and already we observe that the warm and benevolent enthusiasm in the cause of civil and religious liberty, which animates her pages, has put all the race of intolerant critics into a state of fury. Strange that the men who are the loudest and most vehement in their denial of all relief from the restraints which still oppress the Roman Catholics of the united kingdom, (on the pretext of the hostility of the dogmas of that religion to British freedom) should also be the most inveterate in their denunciations of all attempts to expose its superstitions. Lady Morgan has kindled all their indignations. She has, in the pure and benign spirit of Christianity, exposed to open day the horrors inflicted on this most beautiful portion of earth, by the despotism of Church and State; and though every statement she has made is justified by history, her ladyship will obtain no mitigation of assault on account of her veracity. The liberal part of every sect, however, will duly appreciate her reasonable Work, at a time when the united sovereigns of Europe are so indefatigable in their efforts to perpetuate the barbarism and debasement of the Italian people. Lady Morgan's view of Italy combines the high tone of philosophy with the most gay and familiar descriptions of the life and manners of the very mixed societies to which she had access—and her opportunities were highly favourable to the task she had in view. Her narrative abounds with striking anecdotes, traits of character, incidents, fates, and fancies, which will highly interest the public.

Review of New Books.

The Personal Narrative of a Private Soldier, who served in the Forty-second Highlanders, for Twelve Years, during the late War. 12mo. pp. 364. London, 1821.

This narrative is a 'round unvarnished tale' of a soldier's whole course of life, while serving in one of the most distinguished regiments in the army, engaged in the most active duties, during a period of twelve of the most busy years of the most eventful war in which Europe was ever engaged. It details the author's adventures from his first enlisting as a recruit, in 1803, to his discharge, in October, 1814. The author's service, it will be seen, was one of almost continued engagement. He was in the retreat of Sir John Moore, and was one of those who fought so gloriously at Corunna. He survived the pestilential air of Walcheren, so fatal to our army, and being sent into Spain, was at the siege of Burgos, and the battles of Salamanca, Vittoria, the Pyrenees, and Toulouse, where he was wounded, and, after being some time in the hospital at Bourdeaux, he was, on his recovering, sent home and discharged. The Narrative was written in a series of letters to a friend of the author, in town, who undertook the office of editor; but rarely ventured to alter the original composition of the writer, either by curtailing or adding to the text. The style is that of a man of very slender education, but every allowance should be made, when we consider the author's rank in life—that of an humble artisan—that he entered the army at the age of sixteen, and that, in the marching and counter-marching, sieges and battles, of the Peninsula, a literary taste was neither to be cultivated nor acquired. Our author gives a melancholy picture of the disastrous retreat to Corunna, in which his regiment suffered so severely, that out of one thousand men that entered Spain, only one hundred and fifty reached Britanizas, and not an officer among them to carry the colours; but he adds, with characteristic pride, 'while a man was left, the Forty-second's colours would be where they were safe.' The remainder of the regiment had fallen behind, been taken prisoners, or had perished. A few detached extracts, respecting this retreat, will not be deemed uninteresting. Our author says,—

'On new-year's-day morning our provisions were all eaten up. Never shall I forget that new-year's morning. It was a Sunday too. Men, who on that day had been wont to bless God, imprecated their Maker. Nor did the authors of their calamities lack the widow's curse. Our provisions were done, and how to get more we knew not. My messmates that remained were famishing, and I proposed another foraging party. Great as the risk was, there was no alternative between it and death by starvation. "I will go for one," said I; "will anyone go with me?" "I will," said one man; and "I," said another. We soon got ourselves ready, with our bayonets fixed on sticks; we were not an hour out when we fell in with ten pounds weight of bread, and a pig's skin full of good wine. In this part of the country the wine is all kept in pigs' skins. We came home to our comrades; and we did not want for the first day of the year 1809; but those that won't fight for their virtials won't fight for their king.'

After a skirmish with the French, who had come upon them unawares, at Lugo, when dressing the first provision that had been served out regularly for five days, the army took up their position in close column for the night.—

'Our officers,' he says, 'poor fellows, sat by us, roasting potatoes all night; folks say, "like master like man;" it was like man like officer here. Hunger, like death, is a ruthless leveller. Some of our good Highlanders went out to forage; no men in the army were their match on this midnight duty; they are perfect catanans: if they came to a farm-house, and wanted a hen or two, they would merely apply a brimstone match to its beak; the poor hen gave one sneeze, and dropped down lifeless! no roost was safe, if there was no dog to give the alarm; but I was going to tell you of our foragers. They belonged to my mess; they did not like to see their officers eating potatoes. "By the cross, they'll have potatoes and point, if there be aught in the land," said a trusty Argyleshire man; and he was as good as his word. The foragers returned with a sheep and a kid, and their plaids full of Irish fruit. There was nothing done that night but cooking, as we did not know but we would be off before day.'

The battle of Corunna terminated this fatal march, and rescued those that had not sunk under it from further peril for that time. Speaking of this engagement, which is described with a good deal of spirit, our soldier says,—

'The French army did not advance very rapidly, on account of the badness of the ground. Our colonel gave orders for us to lie on the ground, at the back of the height our position was on; and whenever the French were within a few yards of us, we were to start up and fire our muskets, and then give them the bayonet.'

'They came up the hill cheering, as if there were none to oppose them, we being out of their sight; when they came up to the top of the hill, all the word of command that was given was,—"Forty-second, charge." In one moment every man was up with a cheer, and the sound of his musket, and every shot did execution. They were so close upon us, that we gave them the bayonet the instant we fired. The confusion that now ensued baffles all my powers even of memory and imagination—pell-mell, ding-dong—ilka man gat his birdie, and many of us skivered pairs, front and rear rank; to the right about they went, and we after them, I think I see the grizzly fellows now running and jumping, as the Highlanders, laughing and swearing, and foaming, stuck the pointed steel into their loins. We followed them down to the valley, and stopped not for general or commanding officer; but still on, in the rage and wrath of the Highlanders. When we had driven them in upon their other columns, we ourselves retreated, but not pursued, and took the advantage of a ditch that was in the valley, from which we kept up a constant fire on the enemy till dark.'

'As we pursued them down the hill, there was a poor Frenchman sorely wounded, and on his knees, his hands up-lifted, and pleading for quarter. My next man, a robust Highlander, in his rage, exclaimed, "You Bonaparte man! she'll run her through." With a sudden jerk of my musket I threw his on his shoulder, and the poor fellow's life was saved; if he still lives, and could hear this, he would know that his preserver lives also. We were in full speed then of his comrades, and far past him, before my countryman brought his piece to the charge again. The Highlander thanked me many a time afterwards; and used to add, "The deed would have been done but for you, John—I was in such a rage at the time."

Our author embarked with the rest of the army, and describes, with much feeling, the wretched condition in which the soldiers were, and the humanity of the people of Plymouth, where they landed, in giving them money and clothes, of which so many of them were almost destitute. After remaining a short time in England, he accompanied the Walcheren expedition, again returned home, and a second time was sent to Spain, and was at the battle of Salamanca and the siege of Burgos, which, he says, 'was as foolish a piece of work as ever he saw Wellington encounter.' It had well nigh been a fatal piece of work to our military censor, as appears by the following accident. The horn-work had been carried, and works were constructing in the trenches:—

'There were,' says he, 'a few of the company I belonged to collected together in one spot in the trench, as it is usual for men of the same corps and companies to gather into a knot when time permits to chat. We were all sitting on the ground; there was an officer of the company and a sergeant too. I was corporal. There were the matter of four or six privates, I think. Ashell felt right in the midst of us; we all got up and ran except one stupid booby, who sat still, and the shell I may say between his feet; he took handfuls of earth, and tried to smother the fusee, not knowing what a fusee was; but in an instant he was blown to pieces. I threw myself flat down on the earth where I was, about four yards from the active shell; the rest of the men were eager to get as far from it as possible, before it would explode; they were desirous to lay down as far off as they could; but fight was unavailing. The officer was struck with two pieces of the shell, when it burst, on the head and the arm; the sergeant was struck with one piece on the head, which caused his death soon after; my musket was wrested out of my hand by another splinter, and broken into a hundred pieces.'

After the retreat from Burgos, an affair of an unfortunate nature occurred; a corporal, of the name of M'Morran, having formed an attachment to a young girl, who had also smitten the heart of his officer, Dickenson, he became very obnoxious to him. On some occasion, M'Morran staid longer than he should from his duty, and was severely reprimanded, and threatened to be flogged by Dickenson:—

'As soon as M'Morran went into his quarters, he loaded his musket and put a new flint in her, before he began to dress himself; the company in the mean time had been dismissed. Dickenson, however, traversed the parade-ground, waiting for M'Morran; out came M'Morran to him. When a soldier goes to speak to an officer, with a musket in his hand, he comes to the recover, the next motion to the present to fire. Dickenson and M'Morran stood together for about ten minutes, but no one of us knew what passed between them. M'Morran stood about two yards from Dickenson, and he was heard to say, (by the men who were at a little distance loitering on the ground,) "You shall never have it in your power to do that," and in an instant brought his musket to the present to fire, and the shot went through Dickenson's left breast; he fell on the spot, and never spoke! M'Morran then threw away his musket, and called out, "Take me prisoner, I am willing to die for what I have done." The whole village was in an uproar in a minute; the inhabitants crying and wringing their hands, and making doleful lamentation.'

'M'Morran was taken prisoner to the guard-house. I was acting corporal of the guard; we mounted a corporal and three men. As soon as he got himself undressed, the sergeant of the company and my guard went down to head-quarters with him. We were met by the surgeon and adjutant; the adjutant began to abuse M'Morran, who told the other not to use abusive language to him, for he was now a prisoner; and he was happy for what he had done, and willing he was to die for the same.'

He was tried by a general court-martial, at Ceia, condemned, and executed, ten days after. We shall not accompany our soldier through the rest of the campaign, but shall conclude with an extract from his account of the battle of Toulouse, which, though the last, was one of the most glorious in the war, so far as the military talents and bravery of our army was concerned:—

'As soon as the wing was about formed, the colonel [Maccara] went off at the charge with us, cheering all the way, and the left wing followed in the same gallant style. All the troops who saw us start cheered us, and "Bravo, forty-second," could be heard above all the noise of guns. "Hurra!—hurra!—hurra!" sounded on all sides of us, from the division, Portuguese and Spaniards: all saw the work of death we were going on; all saw our men fall like the fruit of an apple-tree, when shook by the boisterous blast of the sky. I had escaped hitherto in all the actions I had been in, but I had no hope of leaving the field alive. The shot was whizzing past us like hail; most of the right wing that were killed and wounded, received two, three, and some several shots at once. The man on my right hand received six grape shots in his body, and fell like a log; and his brother, on his other side, was wounded at the same time. When about fifty yards from the redoubt, I received a shot through my right arm, and was obliged to halt; but I was almost sure of receiving another before I could get under cover. I went to the rear a few yards, (my arm hung motionless by my side) and lay down in the furrow of two rigs, thinking this might afford me some cover. I had hardly stretched myself on the wet ground when a round shot from a cannon covered me almost wholly over with earth; then I started to my feet again, and made for the road we had marched from, knowing that I would have good cover there. My wound bled very much. I could not get it bound up. I had about half a mile to walk to the ground the surgeons were on; but I was obliged to halt by the way, I became so weak from the stream of blood flowing down my arm. I was several times so dizzy I could with difficulty stand and look round me; then I would become sick and languid. I was parched up with thirst, but no water could I get.

'At this moment our artillery were passing me, making for the position we had taken up: one of them dismounted from his horse, seeing the state I was in, and gave me a draught of wine out of his canteen. I bade God bless him. "You deserve it," said he, "if it was gold you could drink, for you have fought hard: away with you to the doctors; there are crowds of the 42d about them." Again I thanked this brave artillery-man: he clapped spurs to his horse, and was off after the guns.

'I revived very much after I had swallowed the wine, and made the best of my way for the houses he pointed to. It was full two hours before the surgeon could look at my arm; they were amputating legs and arms so fast, and so many; it was very lamentable to be two hours the spectator of this sight.'

Here we close this Narrative, and we shall be happy to learn that its able compensates its author, in some degree, for his share in the sufferings he has detailed.

Personal Narrative of Travels to the Equinoctial Regions of the New Continent, during the Years 1799—1804. By Alexander de Humboldt and Aimé Bonpland. Translated by Helen Maria Williams. 2 vols. 8vo. pp. 864. London, 1821.

We are always glad to see a new volume from Humboldt, who is one of

he most interesting and engaging of all modern travellers; and, although the preceding volumes of his 'Personal Narrative' have not come before us, yet they are so well known either in the original or through the spirited translation of Miss Williams, that we shall not deem it necessary to advert to them, but only to notice the volumes just published, which, in interest and importance, are equal to those that have preceded them.

Mr. Humboldt's Narrative is a most agreeable mixture of scientific description, amusing anecdote, and moral reflection, and there is scarcely a page in the whole work that does not present something interesting under one of these classes.

While steering among the cataracts of the Oronoko, Mr. Humboldt first heard of the hairy man of the woods, called Salvaje, that is said to carry off women, construct huts, and sometimes eat human flesh. Though the natives and the missionaries have no doubt of the existence of this much dreaded monkey, yet our author disbelieves it, and thinks that the man of the woods was one of those large bears, the footsteps of which resemble those of a man, and which is believed, in every country, to attack women. Of the insects in this quarter of the globe, the Moschetoes are the most numerous and the most annoying: Mr. H. says,—

'Persons who have not navigated the great rivers of equinoctial America, for instance, the Oronoko and the Rio Magdalena, can scarcely conceive, how without interruption, at every instant of life, you may be tormented by insects flying in the air, and how the multitude of these little animals may render vast regions wholly uninhabitable. However accustomed you may be to endure pain without complaint, however lively an interest you may take in the objects of your researches, it is impossible not to be constantly disturbed by the moschetoes, zancudos, jijenas, and tempaneros, that cover the face and hands, pierce the clothes with their long sucker in the form of a needle, and, getting into the mouth and nostrils, set you coughing and sneezing whenever you attempt to speak in the open air. In the mission of the Oronoko, in the villages placed on the banks of the river, surrounded by immense forests, the plaga de las moscas, the plague of the flies, affords an inexhaustible subject of conversation. When two persons meet in the morning, the first questions they address to each other are, "how did you find the zancudos during the night? How are we to-day for the moschetoes?" These questions remind us of a Chinese omen of politeness, which indicates the ancient state of the country where it took birth. Salutations were made heretofore in the celestial empire, in the following words, you-tou-hou, "have you been incommoded in the night by the serpents?" We shall soon see, that on the banks of the Tuamini, in the river Magdalena, and still more at Choco, the country of gold and platinum, the Chinese compliment on the serpents might be added to that of the moschetoes.'

'At Mandavaca we found an old missionary, who told us with an air of sadness, that he had spent his twenty years of moschetoes in America. He desired us to look well at his legs, that we might be able to tell one day, "poor alla (beyond sea), what the poor monks suffer in the forests of Cassiquiare." Every sting leaving a small darkish brown point, his legs were so speckled, that it was difficult to recognize the whiteness of his skin through the spots of coagulated blood. If the insects of the simulum genus abound in the Cassiquiare, which has white waters, the culices, or zancudos, are so much the more rare; you scarcely find any there, while on the rivers of black waters, in the Atabapo and the Rio Negro, there are generally some zancudos and no moschetoes.'

It is a very remarkable fact, that the geographical distribution of insects varies in this labyrinth of rivers, with white and black waters. The different species do not associate together, and at different hours of the day you are stung by a distinct species. Every time that the scene changes, and other insects 'mount guard,' as the missionaries call it, there are a few minutes of repose. Of these insects, M. H. gives very curious details; he says,—

'The whites born in the torrid zone walk barefoot with impunity in the same apartment where a European recently landed is exposed to the attack of the niguis or cheques (pulex penetrans). These animals, almost invisible to the eye, get under the nails of the feet, and there acquire the size of a small pea by the quick increase of its eggs, which are placed in a bag under the belly of the insect. The niguis, therefore, distinguishes, what the most delicate chemical analysis could not distinguish, the cellular membrane and blood of an European from those of a Creole white. It is not so with the moschetoes.

'In the day, even when labouring at the oar, the natives, in order to chase the insects, are continually giving one another smart slaps with the palm of the hand. Rude in all their movements, they strike themselves and their comrades mechanically during their sleep. The violence of their blows reminds us of the Persian tale of the bear, that tried to kill with his paw the insects on the forehead of his sleeping master.' Near Maypures we saw some young Indians seated in a circle and rubbing cruelly each other's backs with the bark of trees dried at the fire. Indian women were occupied with a degree of patience, of which the copper-coloured race alone are capable, in extirpating by means of a sharp bone the little mass of coagulated blood, that forms the centre of every sting, and gives the skin a speckled appearance. One of the most barbarous nations of the Oronoko, that of the Otomacs, is acquainted with the use of moschetto curtains (mosquiteros) formed of a tissue of fibres of the palm-tree, murichi. We had lately seen, that at Higuerote, on the coast of Caracas, the people of a copper colour sleep buried in the sand. In the villages of the Rio Magdalena, the Indians often invited us to stretch ourselves with them on oxskins, near the church, in the middle of the plaza grande, where they had assembled all the cows in the neighbourhood. The proximity of cattle gives some repose to man. The Indians of the Upper Oronoko and the Cassiquiare, seeing that Mr. Bonpland could not prepare his herbal, on account of the continual torment of the moschetoes, invited him to enter their ovens (hornitos). Thus they call little chambers, without doors or windows, into which they creep horizontally through a very small opening. When they have driven away the insects by means of a fire of wet brush-wood, which emits a great deal of smoke, they close the opening of the oven. The absence of moschetoes is purchased dearly enough by the excessive heat of stagnant air, and the smoke of a torch of copal, which lights the oven during your stay in it. Mr. Bonpland, with courage and patience well worthy of praise, dried hundreds of plants, shut up in these hornitos of the Indians.

'It is difficult not to smile at hearing the missionaries dispute on the size and voracity of the moschetoes at different parts of the same river. In the centre of a country ignorant of what is passing in the rest of the world, this is the favourite subject of conversation. "How I pity your situation!" said the missionary of the Raudales to the missionary of Cassiquiare, at our departure; "you are alone, like me, in this country of tigers and monkeys; with you fish is still more rare, and the heat more violent; but as for my flies (mia moscas), I can boast, that with one of mine I would beat three of yours."'

Escaping from the moschetoes with more ease than our author, we shall pass on to the following affecting anecdote, which has its local habitation in the junction of the Atabapo and the Rio Temi:—

'Before we reached its confluence, a granitic hummock, that rises on the western bank, near the mouth of the Guasacavi, fixed our attention; it is called the Rock of the Guahiba woman, or the Rock of the Mother, Piedra de la Madre. We inquired the cause of so singular a denomination. Father Zea could not satisfy our curiosity; but, some weeks after, an other missionary, one of the predecessors of this ecclesiastic, whom we found settled at San Fernando as president of the missions, related to us an event, which I recorded in my journal, and which excited in our minds the most painful feelings. If, in these solitary scenes, man scarcely leaves behind him any trace of his existence, it is doubly humiliating for a European to see perpetuated by the name of a rock, by one of those imperishable monuments of nature, the remembrance of the moral degradation of our species, and the contrast between the virtue of a savage, and the barbarism of civilized man!

In 1797, the missionary of San Fernando had led his Indians to the banks of the Rio Guaviare, on one of those hostile incursions, which are prohibited alike by religion and the Spanish laws. They found in an Italian but, a Guahibi mother with three children, two of whom were still infants. They were occupied in preparing the flour of Castava. Resistance was impossible; the father was gone to fish, and the mother tried in vain to flee with her children. Scarcely had she reached the savannah, when she was seized by the Indians of the mission, who go to hunt men, like the whites and the negroes in Africa. The mother and her children were bound, and dragged to the bank of the river. The monk, seated in his boat, waited the issue of an expedition, of which he partook not the danger. Had the mother made too violent a resistance, the Indians would have killed her, for every thing is permitted when they go to the conquest of souls (a la conquista espiritual), and it is children in particular they seek to capture, in order to treat them, in the mission, as poitos, or slaves of the Christians. The prisoners were carried to San Fernando, in the hope that the mother would be unable to find her way back to her home, by land. Far from those children who had accompanied their father on the day in which she had been carried off, this unhappy woman showed signs of the deepest despair. She attempted to take back to her family the children who had been snatched away by the missionary, and fled with them repeatedly from the village of San Fernando, but the Indians never failed to seize her anew; and the missionary, after having caused her to be mercilessly beaten, took the cruel resolution of separating the mother from the two children, who had been carried off with her. She was conveyed alone toward the missions of the Rio Negro, going up the Atabapo. Slightly bound, she was seated at the bow of the boat; ignorant of the fate that awaited her, but she judged, by the direction of the sun, that she was removed farther and farther from her hut and her native country. She succeeded in breaking her bonds, threw herself into the water, and swam to the left bank of the Atabapo. The current carried her to a shelf of rock, which bears her name to this day. She landed, and took shelter in the woods, but the president of the missions ordered the Indians to row to the shore, and follow the traces of the Guahibi. In the evening she was brought back. Stretched upon the rocks (la Piedra de la Madre), a cruel punishment was inflicted on her with those straps of manatee leather, which serve for whips in that country, and with which the alcaides are always furnished. This unhappy woman, her hands tied behind her back with strong stalks of mavacure, was then dragged to the mission of Javita.

She was there thrown into one of the caravanseras, that are called Casa del Rey. It was the rainy season, and night was profoundly dark. Forests, till then believed to be impenetrable, separated the mission of Javita from that of San Fernando, which was twenty-five leagues distant in a straight line. No other part is known than that of the rivers; no man ever attempted to go by land from one village to another, were they only a few leagues apart. But such difficulties do not stop a mother, who is separated from her children. Her children are at San Fernando de Atabapo; she must find them again, she must execute her project of delivering them from the hands of Christians, of bringing them back to their father on the banks of the Guaviare. The Guahibi was carefully guarded in the caravansera. Her arms being wounded, the Indians of Javita had loosened her bonds, unknown to the missionary and the alcaides. She succeeded, by the help of her teeth, in breaking them entirely, disappeared during the night, and at the fourth rising sun was seen at the mission of San Fernando, hovering around the hut where her children were confined. "What that woman performed," added the missionary who gave us this sad narrative, "the most robust Indian would not have ventured to undertake. She traversed the woods at a season when the sky is constantly covered with clouds, and the sun, during whole days, appears but for a few minutes. Did the course of the waters direct her way? The inundations of the rivers forced her to go far from the banks of the main stream, through the midst of woods where the movement of the waters is almost imperceptible. How often must she have been stopped by the thorny lianas, that form a network around the trunks they entwine! How often must she have swam across the rivulets, that run into the Atabapo! This unfortunate woman was asked how she had sustained herself during the four days! She said, that, exhausted with fatigue, she could find no other nourishment than those great black ants called vachacos, which climb the trees in long bands, to suspend on them their resinous nests." We pressed the missionary to tell us, whether the Guahibi had peacefully enjoyed the happiness of remaining with her children; and if any repentance had followed this excess of cruelty. He would not satisfy our curiosity; but at our return from the Rio Negro, we learnt, that the Indian mother was not allowed time to cure her wounds, but was again separated from her children, and sent to one of the missions of the Upper Oronoko. There she died, refusing all kind of nourishment, as the savages do in great calamities.

Such is the remembrance annexed to this fatal rock, to Piedra de la Madre!

Our author gives a curious account of the caoutchouc, which he observed at the mission of San Balthazar, on the Atabapo. He says,—

'Here we saw, for the first time, that white and fungous substance, which I have made known by the names of dapicho and sapiti. We immediately perceived that it was analogous to the elastic resin; but, as the Indians made us understand by signs, that it was found underground, we were inclined to think, till we arrived at the mission of Javita, that the dapicho was a fossil caoutchouc, though different from the elastic bitumen of Derbyshire. A Pomisana Indian, seated by the fire in the hut of the missionary, was employed in reducing the dapicho into black caoutchouc. He had spitted several bits on a slender stick, and was roasting them like meat. The dapicho blackens in proportion as it grows softer, and gains in elasticity. The resinous and aromatic smell which filled the hut, seemed to indicate, that this coloration is the effect of the decomposition of carburetted hydrogen, and that the carbon appears in proportion as the hydrogen burns at a low heat. The Indians beat the softened and blackened mass with a piece of Brazil wood, ending in form of a club; he then kneaded the dapicho into balls three or four inches in diameter, and let it cool. These balls exactly resemble the caoutchouc of the shops, but their surface remains in general slightly visuous. They are used at San Balthazar, in the Indian game of Tennis, which is so celebrated among the inhabitants of Urama and Encaramada; they are cut into cylinders to be used as corks, and are far preferable to those made of the bark of the cork tree.'

Mr. Humboldt afterwards found, that the dapicho is the result of an extravasation of the sap from the roots, which takes place when the trees have attained a great age, and the interior of the trunk begins to decay; and he was shown some of it at the depth of two or three feet between the roots of two trees, known by the name of juco and the currena. The first is the tree of Aublet, or siphonia of the modern botanists, known to furnish the caoutchouc of commerce in Cayenne and the Grand Para; the seconde has juvante leaves, and its juice is milky, but very thin and almost destitute of viscosity.

Tobias, a Dramatic Poem: with other Pieces. By James Jacobson, Esq. 12mo. pp. 137.

THIS little volume is the production of a scholar and a gentleman; and it is well for national taste, that amongst the highly seasoned dishes which are daily prepared to pamper our literary appetites, we may now and then meet with some more homely and not less wholesome viands.

In common with the many, we cannot but admire the energetic verse of Lord Byron, the luxuriance of Thomas Moore, and the fecundity of Walter Scott; but we can also duly appreciate the amusement which an author of less pretension, but of much good sense, has, in the volume before us, offered to our acceptance.

The piece which the author has thought most worthy of being placed at the head of his volume, does not appear to us either the most poetical or the most attractive of his effusions; nor is the subject the most calculated to urge successfully its claims to general perusal, for it is a drama founded upon the sacred writings.

* Tobias is written upon the model of the Greek drama, in which the chorus forms a prominent feature.—

'The fable,' for so the argument states, is taken from the book of Tobit, which, as it stands in our English Apocrypha, is a translation from a Greek version, supposed to have been made by some Hellenistic Jew, at an uncertain period, from the original Hebrew or Chaldee. Whether the persons were real characters, and the events founded on fact, and ornamented by the imagination of the writer, or the whole a poetic fiction, is uncertain. Tobit is represented to have lived in the city of Thibis, and to have been carried captive with his wife and his son Tobias, to Nineveh, by Enemasser, or Shalmanezar, about A. M. 3283.'

The poem opens with Sarah's description of the melancholy feelings of her mind, from the recollection of her early happiness and the sad reverse she had experienced. In her former hours of bliss,—

'To be, was to be blest,—life knew no change, But soft vicissitude of rest and joy; Then heavenly guards kept watch about my couch,

Prompting bright dreams and blessing my repose,

This morning waked me to some new delight.'

'But now, she exclaims,—

'Good spirits have forsaken me, And a dark demon scouped the troubled flood, Or from the abyss let loose for mortal's bane, By mystic charm, by prayer, or muttered spell, Still, uncontrol'd, pursues me to destruction. Seven times have I been claimed a bride—seven times,

Soon as the nuptial pomp was celebrated, And guest and paragon retired—the dead Vision came, and, at his withering look, All in the blooming pride of manhood's prime, The joyous bridegroom fell a lifeless cove.'

A band of Median virgins form the chorus, and, with their friendly zeal, interpose their ineffectual condolences.

Lighter griefs may admit of consolation, but Sarah's affliction was too deep even for a momentary pause from grief.

The first ode is rather too mystical to be generally understood. It is founded upon the Chaldaic philosophy respecting evil demons, of which six kinds are enumerated: the fiery—the aerial—the terrestrial—the marine—the subterraneous—and the Lucifugous. Of these demons, the aerial and terrestrial are described 'as circumventing men by art and subtlety, and deceiving the minds of men, and drawing them to absurd and illegal phantasies.'

Surely these demons, if indigenous in Persia, have of late years migrated many degrees to the north-west, and are now very prevalent in our own country.

The chorus reminds her,—

'To the seaman tempest-tost,
To the nightly wanderer lost,
When not a star is seen on high,
And death at every step is nigh,
O'er the wave or mountain slope,
Not so sweetly breaks the morn,
As the cheering ray of hope,
To the wretched and forlorn.'

The reply of the sufferer to the virgins is written with great spirit:—

'Yonder see your flaming god!
Now his sultry path is trod;
Now he sinks beneath the hill,
All will soon be dark and still—
All that lived his beam beneath,
Seem as wrapt in sleep or death.
Tho' darken'd nature seem to expire,
To-morrow, when his shafts of fire
He hurls through kindling air,
Darkness shall flee—the flower revive.—
The streamlet shine—all nature live.

My darkness is despair.
Nature growing loads of care,
Learns, by slow degrees, to bear
Age, as comforts drop away,
Scarcely feels the slow decay,
And at length to sorrows dart
Turns an indurated heart.
Not one by one my pleasures fled,
When Hope was cold and Passion dead,
Unfelt affliction's stroke;
But, all at once, the vengeful power
In youth's gay, fearless, feeling hour
My living heart-strings broke.'

The argument of the drama is so exactly the apocryphal account of Tobias, that it is only necessary to refer the reader to the sacred volume for its ground work. But as this forms but a portion of the book, we have no room for further extracts.

A few minor pieces are introduced between Tobias and the Evening Walk, and, although we do not call the latter an extraordinary poem in the present age of poetry, still it is one which no poet need hesitate to avow; and we confess having received from it a considerable share of entertainment and instruction. It breathes a pure strain of morality, and rests not its claim to our favour upon that meretricious style of ornament so frequently, in modern verse, substituted for something better. We rise from its perusal, more satisfied with ourselves, and more in charity with our fellow creatures, than we have done from half the ephemeral publications at this day of book-making.

We close our remarks upon this unassuming volume, with a paraphrase of an apothegm of Cicero, from which many of us would certainly dissent:—
'Si quis deus mihi largiatur, at ex hac ætate repuerascom—valde recusam:—
Spirit! that loosened from thy clay,
Art nerved and winged for parting—say,
If some descending angel's care
Thy tottering mansion would repair;
On that cold withered form bestow
Youth's bounding pulse and rosy glow,—
The open brow of joy, the face
Of smiles, the limbs of strength and grace,—
Those silvery temples clothe again
With shining locks of raven grain,—
Would warm the cheek and light the eye
With all the fire of sympathy:
Would'st thou on earth consent to stay?
I hear a voice that seems to say,—
"Again, for all that earth can give,
A mortal's life I would not live;
I would not tread, for seventy years,
Again this scene of guilt and tears;
For good, where specious ills are dealt,
And pleasure's stings unceasing felt—
Where Reason is too slow to stay
Impetuous Error's headlong way;
And only comes, with lagging course,
To brighten pain and point remorse.
What boots it, that experience age
Would be the light of early age—
Save that I then at once, should see,
Life's sum of joy and misery—
That Hope's a cheat; and double woe,
From suffering and from foretaste, know."

An Autumn near the Rhine; or, Sketches of Courts, Society, and Scenery in Germany.

In the residence towns of the German princes, all that is handsome or striking is modern. The buildings generally bespeak the increased and growing splendour of the prince and his state; and you may trace pretty accurately in the date and appearance of the architecture and embellishments, their gradation from the old-fashioned regime of Margraves, Landgraves, and Counts of the Empire to the glittering independence of Grand Dukes and Kings. The Dowager Queen of Wirtemberg, formerly Princess Royal of England, lives retired at Ludwigsburg, where she is much esteemed for her benevolence. Some interesting traits in the character of her husband, the late king, are related, particularly a monument of royal attachment, which he raised to the memory of his favourite minister, Count Zeppelin. Speaking of that monarch, our author says,—

‘You must not set the late king down for a mere despot of the common-place kind. Napoleon, no mean judge of talents, once said to him, “Je ne voudrais pas voir votre Altesse à la tête de cent mille hommes!”—(the king (then duke) replied with spirit and brevity,—“Sire, cinquante mille me suffiroit.”—He was a man of strong intellect and cultivated taste, but yet a tyrant, and confessedly wanting in personal courage.—His person and manners were imposing, and he possessed that ascendancy over those around him, which violent temper alone, without some masculine traits of character, is insufficient to produce. He often made reparation to those he had injured. A lady, who used to be much in the circles and card-parties at Ludwigsburg, told me she never met with a man “qui possédât mieux l’art de parler.” The queen was as much in awe of him; as attached to him.’ His reign was severe and despotic; but, with the exception of the havoc of hunting, and some other arbitrary follies, its severity fell principally where, in spite of its unpardonable injustice, it did least harm—on the noblesse. He cut down many of their undue privileges, made many serve as common soldiers in his army, and vexed them by tyrannical seizures and oppressions. His more feeble neighbours, on the other hand, purchased their flattery and support at the expense of their meaner subjects. There was, in short, something like grandeur, mixed with much littleness, in his pride; and some nobleness of nature mollified his intemperance of disposition.’

After an account of Danecker, the sculptor, which we quoted in a preceding number, we have the following particulars of the early life of Schiller:—

‘His father was a major in the Wirtemberg service; and Schiller, who was intended for a regimental physician, pursued his studies here for nine or ten years, during which I think he was cotemporary with Danecker.—At this school he composed “The Robbers.” The seminary was governed by strict military regulations, which naturally irritated and oppressed the proud and daring spirit of Schiller.—

All books not within the routine of school-study were strictly proscribed. Schiller meditated and attempted escapes, in which he failed—and read and ruminated at night over the works of Plutarch, Ossian, Young, Goethe, and, above all, Shakespeare, till his favourite authors fell one by one, into the hands of the inspectors. The histories of Greece and Rome still remained to him, and his ardent imagination constantly dwelt among their patriots and heroes. He now composed the dialogue between the Shades of Brutus and Cæsar, which Charles Moor used to sing in The Robbers; while employed on the play, he used to recite scenes and speeches, to the great delight of his school-fellows. One day, as he was declaiming, with great energy, the scene (now omitted) in which Francis Moor, tortured by suspicion, says to Moses, “Ha! what know’st thou none?”—reflect—death, heaven, eternity, damnation, hang on the words of thy mouth!” the Inspector opened the door, inquiring, in an angry tone, what boy was in such a passion and swearing so dreadfully.—The youthful audience all laughed; and when the Inspector departed, Schiller bawled out the next words of the part with double emphasis—“Ein confusierter kerk!”—“a conficated fellow!”—He wrote an able probation essay “on the connection between the physical and intellectual nature of Man,” which procured him a licence as a regimental physician on quitting the academy.—In this essay, he quoted a passage from The Robbers, then in manuscript, calling it, “A popular English Drama, called The Robbers.” The play was soon after acted at Mannheim, with great applause; and Schiller commenced other dramatic works, and very soon left Stuttgart and his profession.—He repaired to Mannheim, and devoted himself entirely to literature and the drama.’

In an account of the German Universities, we meet with the following, not very creditable, details respecting the students:—

‘Their language and costume are as unlike those of the rest of the world as their boisterous manners and extraordinary privileges. A glossary of about three or four hundred words is published at Göttingen, for the benefit of the young freshmen, or die fuchsen (the foxes), as they are called, who come uninitiated in their barbarous slang. A drinking party is called a commerschick; and the quails which follow it the next morning, for which a noble bard recommends the specific of “Hock and Soda-water,” are expressively termed a Katzenjammer (cat’s misery.) Young ladies, not arrived at that age, which the students consider interesting, go by the elegant appellation of Backsack; and the fair sex in general are called by the more poetical one, Flor (Flower): ready money is called Baria; but credit (being, I presume, a commodity more in use) has three various titles—pimp, pump, and puff, from which come the compounds, Haus-pimp, Haus-pump, Haus-puff, (house-credit)—the credit which a student receives from his landlord. The costume of the students, meant for a revival of the alt Deutsche kleidung (old German dress), is as motley and as barbarous as their dialect. The long hair flowing on their shoulders, frock-coats without shirts, thick coarse woollen trousers, small red caps, a pipe in the mouth, and a zeigenhalm (thick sort of bludgeon) in the hand, give them much more the air of troops of banditti or travelling mechanics, than of scholastic youths who hear lectures on the pure æsthetic, and who are to be the future statesmen, pastors, and judges of their country. Their wild and irregular lives generally unite in a strange manner a sort of coarse dissipation—smoking at taverns, waltzing at public gardens, hazard playing, and rambling about to bathing places and beer-houses, with romantic notions of honour, and an inordinate enthusiasm on all political and moral subjects.—Kant’s mystics, Kotzebue’s sentiment, and Goethe’s fanciful originalities share their admiration along with the less refined enjoyments of tobacco and nine-pins. In their grand carousals they sing a song, called “the Sovereign” (der Landesherr), in praise of their country and their prince, during which they stick their hats upon the points of their hiebers (swords), and swear to remain brave Burschen to all eternity. Their funeral processions are conducted with great pomp and ceremony—they often hire a string of carriages for the occasion—officers with appropriate dresses and titles regulate the ceremony—and a long and elaborate eulogium is pronounced over the grave. When they wish to pay particular honour to a brother Bursch, they give him a few rounds of formal riots, and then deputate an officer, called a Chapeau d’honneur, in full dress, to acquaint him in a set speech of the honour conferred on him.’

‘A friend of mine received a note from a lady of her acquaintance, proposing to come and pass the evening; but happening to expect, among other visitors, the two former husbands of this lady, who had been twice divorced, out of regard for her feelings, she wrote a feigned excuse, begging her to postpone her visit. The divorced lady, however, immediately returned for answer, that she suspected the real ground of the excuse, and was grateful for my friend’s considerate kindness; but she begged also to assure her it was quite unnecessary, and that there would be no one in her party that she should not have pleasure in meeting. She accordingly came, and brought her present and third husband, to make a trio with her two former ones; and all parties spent the evening with perfect content and cordiality.

The mountain of Rolanddeck, one of the most picturesque scenes on the Rhine, takes its name from Roland, the nephew of Charlemagne, who, according to the tradition of the country, lived here in melancholy seclusion. The history of his love and constancy form the subject of a very pretty ballad, by Schiller, of which our author gives the following translation:—

ROLAND AND HILDEGONDA.

A BALLAD.

"Sir Knight, a sister's truest love
For thee this heart doth know;
Then ask, I pray, no other love,
It only wakes my woe.

Unmov'd I look upon thee, knight,
And lo! I see thee fly,
I wis not why that gentle tear
Is glist'ning in thine eye—"

Her speech be heard with silent grief,
And sore his heart did bleed;
Then quick he press'd her in his arms,
Then bounded on his steed—
Then summon'd he his brave men all
That dwelt about the Rhine;
The cross upon each valiant breast,
They sped to Palestine.

There, deeds of high renown were wrought
By every warrior's sword;
Their banners' crests in battle gleam'd
Asidest the pagan lord;
And most at Roland's dread name,
Quail'd each Moslem chief;
But Roland's heart was fastly bound
Within its chains of grief.

A long long year his pain he bore,
Till all his joy was lost;
And refuge finding none from woe,
He left the armed host.
A ship well dight with ready sail
By Joppa's strand there lay,
And he for that dear land embark'd
In which she breathed the day.

And at her castle gate anon
Low the pilgrim knock'd,
Ah! with a thunder's sound
Was that gate unlock'd—
"She whom thou seek'st now wears the veil,
And is bright Heaven's bride;
For yesternorn, with holy rites,
Was she to God allied."

And then for ever he forsook
His father's castle door—
His armour never more he plied,
He strode his steed no more.
Down from the Donjon rock he roam'd,
A stranger everywhere;
For now his noble limbs were hid
In cloth of coarsest hair.

And now a lonely he be built,
Amid that lov'd countree;
Whence looking through the linden shade
The convent he might see;
And station'd there from morning dawn,
Till evening purple shone,
With hope upon his pensive eye,
Still he sat alone.

Still look'd he on the convent walls,
Still hopeful did he look Upon the casement of his love,
Until the casement shook;

Until her lovely form appear'd,
Until that face so dear,
With angel look, so still and mild,
Bent o'er the valley near.

And then he laid him joyful down,
And slept with solace sweet,
Rejoicing when the morning beam
Again his eye should greet;
And thus full many a day he sat,
He sat through many a spring,
Still hating, without plaint or pain,
To hear the casement kiling.

Until that lovely form appear'd,
Until that face so dear,
With angel look, so still and mild,
Bent o'er the valley near;
And there one morning fix'd he sat,
A pallid corpse upright;
But to the casement turn'd he still
His dim and clouded sight."

The following traditionary story, on the banks of the Rhine, we recommend as a good subject for our melo-dramatic writers to work upon:—

Near the little village of Hirtzenach, between St. Goar and Boppard, the ruins of the two old castles of Liebenstein and Sternfels stand close together, on a fine mountain covered with vines on the right bank of the river. Their grey mouldering towers nod at each other with a sort of rival dignity; and they go by the name of the Two Brothers.—Tradition says they were formerly inhabited by an old knight, who had two sons equally dear to him; and a rich and beautiful young orphan was also brought up under his protection. Her charms increased with her years; and, as was very natural, the young knights both fell in love with their fair play-fellow. When she arrived at a marriageable age, the father proposed to her to choose between his two sons; but she, knowing the sentiments of both, was unwilling to grieve either by preferring his rival. The elder son, however, believing that her heart a little inclined to his brother, resigned his pretensions, and besought her to declare in his rival's favour. The old knight gave the young couple his blessing, but their union was delayed.—The elder brother saw without envy, but not without melancholy, the happiness of his rival. The charms of this beloved object increased in his eyes every day, and to fly from her presence he joined the prince, residing at Rhense, and was admitted into his suite.

Just at this time, St. Bernard was preaching the cross on the banks of the Rhine. There was not a chateau near the river that did not send a knight to Frankfort, where the Emperor Conrad presented the saint to the people, who all took the cross. Almost every castle along the river, from Basle to Cologne, mounted a streaming flag with the holy symbol of our Saviour's sufferings; and the river and roads in the country were thronged with joyous companies flocking towards Palestine. The young intended bridegroom caught the general flame, and resolved to visit the Holy Land before leading his bride to the altar. In spite of his father's displeasure, and the ill-concealed tears of his mistress, he assembled his little troop, and joined the Emperor's army at Frankfort.

The old knight, dying soon after, the elder brother returned from Rhense to take possession of his ancestor's castle. Love was now ready to revive more strongly than ever in his breast; but he overcame himself, and scrupulously treated the young lady with the kind protection of a brother. Two years had elapsed, when the news arrived that the younger brother was returning from Palestine, accompanied by a beautiful Grecian dame, to whom he was betrothed. This intelligence pierced his deserted mistress to the heart; and, according to the custom of the age in such disappointments, she resolved to take the veil. The elder son was indignant at this conduct of his brother; and, when a courier arrived at the castle to announce his approach, he threw down his glove, bidding him take that for answer.

The crusader arrived with his fair Grecian at the castle of Sternfels, his paternal inheritance, and a bloody war took place between the brothers, which they were on the point of concluding by single combat, when the young lady interposed and pacified them. She afterwards quitted the abode of her infancy, and took the veil.

Sadness and mourning now reigned in the castle of Liebenstein—while joy and dissipation occupied the inhabitants of Sternfels. The beauties of the Grecian dame, and the graces of her conversation, attracted around her all the gay knights of the neighbourhood; and she was by no means scrupulous in receiving their homage. The elder brother saw the disgrace of his brother before he himself was aware of it, and soon found an opportunity to convince him of his wife's infidelity. The young knight would have sacrificed her to his vengeance, but she found means to escape. His elder brother pressed him in his arms as he was abandoning himself to his despair, saying, "Let us live henceforth together without wives, to do honour to the grief of our first love, who is now passing the brightest days of youth in a convent." The younger brother agreed, and they remained bachelors and inseparable friends for the rest of their days. Their race expired with them—and their old ruined castles, which still retain the name of "The Brothers," remind the traveller of their history.

One extract more, and we have done; it is an anecdote related by a Lyonsese merchant, with whom our author travelled to Aix-la-Chapelle:—

Sometimes the old gentleman gave us some amusing particulars of the famous siege of Lyons, in the defence of which he had taken a part, and had narrowly escaped the guillotine. He was also at Lyons when the Duke of Tarentum and

Monsieur repaired there to attempt to stop Bonaparte's progress from Elba to Paris. He saw the troops drawn up in the Grande Place, and reviewed by the Duke and Monsieur. The men had had three francs each given to them; and it was hoped the exhortations of the marshal would excite universal devotion to the cause. His royal highness and the duke rode through the ranks again and again; and the marshal, after repeated addresses, and exhausting every topic calculated to rally loyalty, called to the men to give a token of their attachment by saluting the prince with vive le roi! Scarcely three voices broke the dismal silence. The marshal turned away in despair, the tears streaming from his eyes—and the Count d'Antois and he shortly afterwards left Lyons. The gay Frenchman assured me that he, and almost all present, were moved to tears by this cruel scene. A colonel of cavalry of half pay, a friend of our companion's, resided near Lyons, with his wife, to whom he was much attached. On hearing of Napoleon's approach, he let fall some hints of an intention of joining him, on which his wife indignantly broke forth, "A ton âge, mon ami,—et tu ne conçois pas le chemin d'honneur? Penses-y bien. Si tu le quittes, tu ne me verras plus de ta vie." The colonel, persuaded by his wife, fully resolved to serve his King, and left her with a vow never to forget her injunctions; but, on arriving at Lyons, the cries of vive l'Empereur! and the sight of the tri-colour cockade, were too much for his firmness; and neither his spouse, his vow, nor his honour, had influence enough to prevent his flocking with his comrades to the standard of his old leader. This is a curious illustration of that invariable resignation to momentary impulses which forms the consistent inconsistency of the French character. Military glory, that vainest and most delusive of feelings, appears to be the only one to which they have ever been true."

We now quit, reluctantly we confess, one of the most pleasing volumes of its kind, that we have met with in the course of our critical labours, and we shall be much surprised if its circulation be limited even to a second edition.

Sketches of the Domestic Manners and Institutions of the Romans. 12mo. pp. 347. London, 1821.

ALTHOUGH every well-educated person is acquainted with Roman history, and many are well versed in Roman antiquities, yet few have an accurate idea of Roman manners; nor, until the appearance of the volume before us, was it to be obtained, but by ransacking the ponderous tomes of Kennet, Adams, Potter, and the elaborate commentaries on Pliny, Juvénal, and Persius,

&c. The labour that was required for such a task, was considerably aggravated, to ladies in particular, by the classical allusions and the learned quotations in which the subject has been usually enveloped, and which deterred them from the study.

Having said so much of the necessity of a work like the present, it only remains for us to notice the manner in which it has been executed. The object of the author has been to give a concise account of the state of society in ancient Rome, clothed in plain language, divested as far as possible of Latin terms, and pruned of all subjects which offend against delicacy; and he modestly claims no other merit than that of having attentively compared various authorities, and of having recorded such facts only as are either incontestably established or generally received. That he has succeeded in the task we hesitate not to say; and his work presents a popular view of the manners of the Romans, which will not only be of the greatest service to persons completing their education, but will be found extremely useful in refreshing the memories of those who may long ago have quitted the study of Roman history for other pursuits. We shall now make a few extracts, which will not only confirm our observations on the work, but will, we trust, form an interesting page in our journal. Much has been said, and with great truth, of the rapacity of lawyers, but if antiquity could justify them, they might refer us to the Romans for a precedent. The bar was so distinguished a profession, that many Romans of the highest rank acted as pleaders, and consecrated their talents to the gratuitous service of their fellow citizens; but this apparent liberality was not altogether disinterested: it was in fact the instrument of their ambition:—

'At length, when the emperors deprived the people of the right of electing their own magistrates, the chief motive which actuated patrons in the gratuitous exertion of their abilities ceased; and their former clients being thus deprived of legal advice, the practice of the law necessarily became mercenary, and was thenceforward followed as a profession for profit. The mere lawyers, however, placed so high a value on their assistance, that it became necessary to fix bounds to their rapacity; and they were not allowed to accept of more than certain specified fees, under penalty of being considered guilty of extortion, which subjected them to a forfeiture of four times the amount. The maximum of these fees was at first fixed at ten thousand sesterces, about $60, sterling. But this wholesome regulation was evaded: a swarm of venal pettifoggers,—the pests of society, fomented law-suits for their private advantage, and carried their depredations on the public so far, that they attracted the notice of the senate; and in the reign of Trajan, a decree was passed obliging the parties in every cause to make oath, before it was tried, that they had neither given nor promised any gratification to their advocates; permitting them, however, to remunerate them after judgment was obtained. This edict was not intended to deprive the lawyers of the just fruits of their labours, but was a necessary check on the mercenary cupidity of knaves, whose exactions brought disgrace on an otherwise honourable profession. It did not prevent baristers of eminence from accumulating very large fortunes; the younger Pliny mentions one Regulus, who, notwithstanding he lived in great splendour, and was not, it would seem, much indebted to the goodness of his character, realized a sum equivalent to 400,000*l.* of our money. Nor, if the accusation of Persius be not unfounded, were they very delicate in the mode of acquisition:—

'Envy not the sordid gains,
Which recompense the well-tongued lawyer's pains;
Though Umbrian rustics, for his sage advice,
Pour in their jars of fish, and oil, and spice,
So thick and fast, that, ere the first be o'er,
A second and a third are at the door."

Of course, the same illustration of the Romans, we quote an account of their boxing matches and chariot-races:—

'Boxing, wrestling, and throwing the discus, or quoit, held a prominent share in their amusements; but chariot-driving took the lead before all others.

'When boxing took a more serious turn, it became a contest of much greater danger than the modern pugilistic battles. The combatants wore gloves loaded with metal, and the issue of "the fight" was often fatal to one or both of them.—

'He threw
Two ponderous gauntlets down in open view—
Gauntlets which Eryx won in fight to wield,
'And sleuth his hands with, in the listed field.
With fear and wonder seised, the crowd beholds
The gloves of death, with seven distinguishing folds

Of tough bull-hides: the space within is spread
With iron, or with heavy loads of lead."

Dryden's Virgil, &c.
Whether they were as expert as the pugilists of the present day, we have no means of ascertaining; but it is certain that professors of the art were trained with equal regularity; and there can be little doubt of their prowess, as we are told of one of them having had his whole set of teeth knocked down his throat at a single blow!

'Both horse and chariot-races, but especially the latter, were favourite diversions of the people in general; and, in order to enjoy them at their ease, there was an inclosed course immediately adjoining the city, called the Circus, although, in point of fact, its form was oval. It was rather more than a mile in circumference; was surrounded with seats in the form of an amphitheatre, and three tiers of galleries; and was calculated to contain at least one hundred and fifty thousand, or, as some suppose, more than two hundred and fifty thousand spectators. In the centre, there was a wall twelve feet in breadth, and four in height, round which the race was performed; and at one end there stood a triumphal arch, through which the successful charioteer drove amid the plaudits of the assembly. The horses ran to the left, and were restrained by a chain across the goal, until the signal was given for starting. The race was generally decided in one heat of five, or sometimes seven times round the course, which, in the latter instance, was a distance of about four English miles. Four chariots usually started together, the drivers of which were distinguished by dresses of different colours, each of which had its partizans, who, betted largely on their favourite; for it was neither the charioteer nor his horses that interested them, but the colour which they adopted; and so far was this carried, that the people were actually divided into parties, who espoused the pretensions of the different liveries with such warmth, that all Rome was at one time agitated with the disputes of the green and red factions. The chariots, as they are usually called, were nothing more than uncovered two-wheeled cars, high and circular in front, and open behind. They were usually drawn by three or four horses abreast, which the driver guided in a standing position, with the reins fastened round his body; a custom which occasioned many serious accidents; for, the course being narrow, the turnings sharp and frequent, and both crossing and jostling permitted, the carriages were often overturned.

The amusements of literary men among the Romans, had an advantage over our modern conversations, if we except the recitation of the poets, which, if brought into fashion now, would certainly soon put the most polite company in the world hors de combat :—

Cicero constructed galleries at his villa at Tusculum, in imitation of the schools of Athens; they were ornamented with the finest statues and paintings of Greece; and were appropriated to philosophical discussions, and familiar discourse with his friends. Of those conversations he has left an account, which shows the degree of refinement in manners as well as morals, at which the Romans had then arrived. "They generally turn," says he, "on our private affairs, or those of the state, or else on some literary subject, without carrying the discussion of any one topic so far as to tire those whose taste it may not suit. Attention is paid to treat each subject with the proper degree of seriousness or levity, which its importance may require, or its trifling nature permit; but, above all, care is taken never to make an observation which may betray a defect in the moral character; of which there is not a greater mark than the too common habit of ridiculing, or speaking to the disadvantage of the absent. Our language, indeed, should ever be free from heat, as our observations from prejudice, malevolence, or frivolity; it should always be accompanied by affability of manner, and respect for those to whom it is addressed; and we should studiously avoid speaking of ourselves, but more especially in our own commendation." These maxims were carefully observed by all well-bred persons; and particular regard appears to have been had to preserve the decorum and respect due to age, and to the fair sex, and the circumspection necessary in the presence of youth. Not but that they were sometimes infringed upon; gross and immoral persons will occasionally be found in every society; but then, as now, though they might be tolerated, they were not respected.

The galleries were chiefly devoted to sedentary amusements, among which the game of chess, or one nearly resembling it, appears to have had a principal share. Neither were they without the resource of a daily newspaper, which recorded the chief occurrences of public note and general interest, with the more private intelligence of births, deaths, marriages, and fashionable arrivals, in much the same manner as those of more modern date. It was not, indeed, issued for circulation, being merely hung up in some place of usual resort, and published under the sanction of the government, for general information; but we may presume that it was copied for the private accommodation of the wealthy. Poets not unfrequently took advantage of the indolent leisure that reigned in these places, to recite the efforts of their muse, and sometimes, it would appear, to tire the patience of their auditors :—

"While sweetly floats the voice in echoes round,
The coxcombs never think at whose expense
They thus indulge the dear imperipience."

Francis's Hor. b. 1, sat. 4.

Literary men, indeed, read aloud for exercise; the younger Pliny gravely tells us, that it assisted his digestion; and the celebrated physician, Celsus, recommends it for the same purpose.

Our author gives a very circumstantial account of the feasts of the Romans, from which we shall only make one short extract :—

"Grace being ended, the king of the feast was appointed. He was generally elected by lot, but sometimes by acclamation. His functions much resembled those of the president of a convivial club; he alone regulated the festivities of the table; called upon whom he pleased to sing, to tell his story, or to amuse the company by any other talent he might possess; announced the quantity of wine to be drank to each health or toast; decreed the forfeitures of non-compliance; and enforced his authority under penalty of additional bumpers. Plutarch has a long dissertation on the qualities which this arbitrary sovereign ought to possess: even Cato, the censor, acknowledged that, old as he was, he was delighted at being of those convivial parties, where the king of the feast animated each of the company to contribute his share to the general hilarity; and the importance attached by some of the gravest personages to the exercise of his jovial duties, very forcibly depicts the attachment of the Romans to social enjoyment."

We shall conclude where gallantry would have made us begin; namely, with the ladies :—

"The Roman ladies were extremely careful of their teeth; they used small brushes, and tooth-picks; the latter sometimes of silver; but those most esteemed were made of the wood of the mastich tree. Of what, besides water, they employed to cleanse them, we only know, that there was a favourite lotion, which they received from Spain, the chief ingredient in which was a liquid that undoubtedly would not recommend it to modern notice. False teeth are mentioned both by Horace and Martial, as being common in their time."

"Art had not, indeed, then arrived at the perfection of supplying the absolute deficiency of an eye: but means were not wanting to increase their lustre, and to make those which were small, or sunk, appear larger and more prominent than they really were. This was effected by burning the powder of antimony, the vapour of which being allowed to ascend to the eyes, had the effect of distending the eyelids; or the powder, and sometimes, indeed, common soot, was gently spread with a bodkin underneath the lid, and the tint which it imparted was supposed to give an expression of liquid softness to the eye." Penciling the eye-brows was a constant practice; nor was there any ignorance of the effect produced by a skillfully disposed patch; or of any other of the numerous artifice by which the charms of the person are heightened and displayed.

Having carefully examined this little volume, we give it our most hearty commendation.

"A skillfully disposed patch." It has been doubted whether the Roman ladies did actually employ the "artillery of patches." But not only are they repeatedly mentioned in Martial's Epigrams, but the younger Pliny tells us, that even a grave lawyer had recourse to their aid, and that, according as he was to plead for plaintiff or defendant, he used to wear a white or a black patch, over the right or the left eye: Plin. Epist. l. vi. ep. 2.

A Series of Tables, exhibiting the Gain and Loss to the Fundholder, arising from the Fluctuations in the Value of the Currency, from 1800 to 1821.
By Robert Mushet, Esq. 8vo. London, 1821.

MANY attempts have recently been made to induce government to break faith with the fundholder, by fallaciously representing his situation as highly advantageous, arising from the circumstance of his now receiving in a current of standard value, the interest of the capital which he lent to Government, in a currency considerably depreciated. This, too, has been done in the absence of any proof, that the fundholders, as a body, have derived any gain whatever, in consequence of the depreciation which has existed upon the currency since 1800. In the tables which Mr. Mushet has ingeniously constructed, shews clearly, that so far from the fundholder having gained, that he has actually lost by the depreciation. Burns says, 'facts are chieft that winna ding and munn be disputed,' and it is to facts that Mr. Mushet appeals in support of his argument, which we recommend not only to every fundholder, but to those who, possessing no funds, so eagerly denounce their more fortunate countrymen.

ESSAY ON RHYME.

(FOR THE LITERARY CHRONICLE.)

LITERATURE, with respect to its language, may be considered as rhythmical, metrical, and prosaical; or, more distinctly, as rhyme, blank verse, measured prose, and mere prose. I would not, however, be understood as intending by this enumeration, to offer a perfect division of literary language to the eye of the logician, but merely as assuming these different species of phraseology to be contained under it. I am aware that, in the philosophical treatment of a subject, the analyst is supposed to be as careful of transgressing the two great props of argument, definition and division, as of walking over his father's tomb-stone, and that these two remaining idols of Aristotle's supremacy are yet worshipped, even by those who deny its infallibility in every other particular. Mr. Locke himself, who was at such pains to overturn the supposed efficacy of syllogism, that he has made several disgraceful mistakes in it, through precipitation, leaves these two logical instruments as absolute as ever; nay, asserts that there can be no exact reasoning without definition. But, notwithstanding my unfeigned reverence for the opinions of that great man, I cannot help dissenting from him on this point, inasmuch as I think, were definition requisite to exact reasoning, we should have no exact reasoning at all.

The examination of this point, however, would be irrelevant to our present subject. I may endeavour to prove the truth of my opinion on some future occasion; having premised so much, merely to prevent any cavils which might arise as to the accuracy of the divisions above-mentioned, definition and division being so intimately connected in their natures, as to be nearly identical.

To resume; the order of the invention of these four species of phraseology, in point of time, was evidently the inverse of that in which I have enumerated them; for the order of the artifice in their composition, by which the time of their invention is naturally measured, is according to that inverted succession; namely, prose, metrical prose, blank verse, and rhyme. I stay not to examine whether prose be properly denominated an invention of mankind or no, (though, by parenthesis, I may observe, that if human reason were superadded to the vocal capacity of many animals, quadrupeds, and birds, in whom we often see most wonderful exertions, to expression and modulation of sounds, so as to convey their desires, might not this addition produce something very near the human faculty of speech?) but of this we are pretty certain, that it must have preceded every other species of language. Metrical or measured prose was evidently the next; impassioned language breaking into cadences, as the natural effect of a raised imagination, but as yet unrestricted by the artificial similitudes in the final words of these cadences. The like evidence is in the priority of blank verse to rhyme, the latter containing all the artifices of the former, with the additional one of rhyme superadded.

As to the comparative merit of these different species of composition, I mean in their language solely, considering them abstractedly and metaphysically, I have no hesitation in declaring for the superlative excellence of rhyme; so that, it is little doubtful to me, but that, if superior intelligences, angels, spirits, nay the Deity himself, convey their sentiments by verbal signs, it is and cannot be otherwise than in rhyme.

This opinion may, perhaps, startle the unpoetical, by attributing that phraseology which is pretty much considered as the peculiar vocabulary of madmen, fools, and the weak in intellect, to the majesty of divine wisdom, as the language in which its sublime and serious ordinances are proclaimed; but let the reader observe, I speak of rhyme in the abstract, i. e. not of rhyme as it is, but as it might be. The difficulties in works of rhyme, and which depend on its multifarious artificialness, render it, in the hands of us finite and imbecile agents, for the most part the vehicle of nonsense, insipidities, or mere prettinesses at best; we never see a work on the abstruse sciences in rhyme, and rarely one of any sublimity in polite literature; rhyme is, in fact, considered as the attribute of sentiment alone, not of reasoning, and hence has come into disrepute with the scientific; nay, has incurred the contempt of poets themselves. Milton, in his preface to his Paradise Lost, I think, censures it, as puerile and unworthy of a true genius, citing the examples of the celebrated Greek and Roman poets, who wrote in blank, and of the latter and inferior authors who composed in rhyme; beside, his derogatory opinion of rhyme may be collected from his sarcastic misprophecy upon Dryden's capabilities, 'that he was a good rhymer, but no poet,' though I allow this might be; the faculty of rhyming by no means involving poetical qualifications.

But if these unfriendly opinions be examined, they will be found to depend on a false and partial consideration of rhyme; upon arguing merely from its actualities, (so to speak,) and neglecting to consider its capabilities; in fact, upon considering it practically, instead of as we ought, abstractedly; for in investigating philosophically the nature of any thing, we are not to bind it down to the measure of what we finite beings are able to make of it, but to consider what its own absolute and unrelated capabilities admit of; we should no more judge of the powers of rhyme from our application of it to language, than of those of reason from our application of it to ideas; they both partake of the narrowness and imbecility of our faculties.

Let me ask; why are not the sciences composed in rhyme? Why did not Milton write his Paradise in rhyme? plainly for this reason; not because these works could not be so written, and would not be improved by it—no; but because the authors were unable.

It may be said, in the former, rhyme, or any species of poetry, would detract the reader's thoughts; and, in the latter, would have been beneath the dignity of the subject. To which I reply: that is not the fault of rhyme, but the fault of the reader in the former case, and of the writer in the latter. Why does the reader suffer his thoughts to be distracted? and why does the writer suffer his dignity to droop? no one will deny, but that if the reader were able to preserve his thoughts, and the writer his dignity, the science and the blank poem would be both improved; or, if there be any one who is so hardy as to deny this, I would beg of him to examine whether the reason of it be not to be found in himself, and not in the rhyme. That metre is an improvement upon mere prose, and rhyme upon metre, is evident, in that it is the addition of a new though inferior cause of pleasure; viz. that of sound to that of reasoning. Prose is considered the vehicle of reasoning; but the same unalloyed reasoning into metre, and you add that pleasure which arises from a musical cadence or tone, to that which you before received from the argument, a sensibility to an intellectual pleasure; now superadd rhyme, and you increase the sensible pleasure to the ear; and there is but this difference in these two sensible pleasures afforded by metre and rhyme, that metre gives you that species of pleasure which arises from melody,—rhyme, that which proceeds from harmony; metre is a bar, rhyme is a chord or double-note of music, where the notes are words; and the pleasure in both music and poetical language, arises from the same proximate cause; viz. the succession of sounds in melody and metre, the accordance of them in harmony and rhyme.

Hence, I think, it must be granted me, that even a mathematician would be better pleased were his works in sweet rhyme than in sour prose; unless he be deficient in the faculty of receiving auricular pleasures; on which, though he may plume himself, it is nothing else than an imperfection, the marring of God's perfect work; for it is an absurd argument, that because the faculties of sensation are often prostituted to low and ignoble purposes, the pleasures derivable from them, pure and legitimate, are unworthy of any one capable of enjoying those of a higher description, such as intellectual pleasures certainly are: either sensate acts are pleasurable or not, and if they are, I can only commiserate those who are deprived of this source of enjoyment. It is ridiculous for any one who will allow that a pleasure of sense may be innocent, to congratulate himself upon being deficient in that sense, or to found any argument against the excellence of rhyme, or the inferior species of pleasure it affords; if it be possible to receive pleasure from reason and from rhyme separately, why not add them, though they be gratifications of a different species and a different degree?

Hence also, I think, the inference made above, about superior intelligences, may be concluded, and that not only contingently, but necessarily. For if it be allowed that rhyme is an additional good quality to prose, I mean where this addition does not act as an injury, as frequently in mortal works, where sense is sacrificed to or injured by sound; I say if this be allowed, as from what I have proved I believe it must be, then it is impossible that the Deity and his angels, if they communicate their ideas as we do, should speak in a less eloquent and pleasurable style when they may speak without more difficulty in a better. Hence, I think it demonstrative, that the Supreme and other high intelligences speak in rhyme.

The above reference of the pleasure we receive from rhythmical poetry to its euphony, is, I believe, the true account of it; and if it should be asked of me, how does this theory explain the pleasure which one reading merely in his mind perceives? I answer, by memory. He collects from the words which he sees what sound they would have might he hear them, and is thus pleased, not with their actual euphony, but with that which they would have if pronounced aloud, and which the reader is enabled to assign them by his recollection of the usual sounds of words, disposed as in the piece he is reading, i. e. by his memory. Those who may be inclined to place the gratification which we receive from the language of poetry, in our admiration of the difficulty of so combining our words, will, perhaps, be of another opinion, when they consider, that those pieces which please us most in their phraseology, have usually the least appearance of difficulty; though, indeed, this is not conclusive, as their apparent ease is the more admirable, if their real difficulty be acknowledged. Perhaps our gratification proceeds from both these causes, but more largely from the first.

REDLAY.

WHAT IS THIS?

JUNO was pleased to send cards of invitation to the goddesses, and, at the time appointed, the divinities arrived at her celestial palace.

By command of the queen of heaven, Elysium assu'd its brightest aspect: light azure and blue clouds, studded with golden stars, and interwoven with wreaths of myrtles and roses, formed a canopy over the heads of the goddess and her guests. The soft zephyrs yielded their refreshing breezes, while enchanting syrens swelled each note, producing the most exquisite harmony: Juno looked divine; a celestial feast was provided, of which the goddesses partook, and Elysium re-echoed with laughter and merriment.

At length their mirth began to abate; the wise and prudent goddesses retired; but Juno, perceiving that some of her guests still remained, and being too polite to appear fatigued, proposed a plan to dissipate an idle hour:—

'Look,' said she, 'what Jupiter has left,' and she presented to the view of all present a human form; 'Let each of you endow him with some property, and I will adjudge to whom the prize shall be given.' Her visitors seemed quite delighted, and Folly, forgetting all decorum, rushed forward to gain precedence. 'The wishes of the queen are mine,' answered she, 'provided a proper share of praise be allotted for my services.' 'And I,' said Vanity, pompously advancing, 'am willing enough to lend you my abilities, queen of heaven, concluding that their worth and consequence will be sufficiently estimated.' Conceit laughed at their pretended abilities without her assistance, and, therefore, with due solemnity and conscious superiority, condescended to vouchsafe her aid. 'I shall endeavour to please you all,' said the queen, while a gracious smile of approbation encircled her celestial countenance. Folly, Vanity, and Conceit began their incantations, and soon displayed their work to view, at sight of which the queen of heaven and all her train, who sat by, burst into an immoderate fit of laughter. Folly and Vanity had implanted an expression of vacancy on the countenance of this mortal, which, aided by the ridiculous decorations of Conceit, produced a novel and whimsical appearance, unknown before even to the celestials themselves. Juno, at length, commanding silence, thus spoke.

 'However great and unparalleled have hitherto been the combined powers of Folly, Vanity, and Conceit, in these your operations you have succeeded beyond what I could have expected; and such is the appearance of this mortal, that I dread the ridicule of Jupiter too much to allow of his continuance in Elysium; therefore, as you have created him at my desire, I must further claim your assistance, to enable me to expel him from heaven.' Thus saying, the goddesses joined their efforts to effect what the prudence of Juno suggested, and tumbled him down from heaven upon earth. Alas! he there meets no better fate; terrestrial mortals gaze with wonder to see this non-de-script, and, while he continues harmless, think, 'tis a creature fit only to amuse; but when, as soon as in his pride, he is desirous of shewing the materials of which he is framed, he becomes insupportable, and every rational creature shuns—THE DANDY.

Original Poetry.

TO AN OLD FIGURE HEAD.

The following lines were written in consequence of seeing, lying in decay at a certain dock-yard of the banks of the Thames, a figure, which the writer remembers when a boy, admiring the head of the ship Diana. It may be deemed a singular subject for poetry; but, as poets, like sailors, are not very particular in the choice of their goddesses, and as some have written in praise of stone ones, I see no reason against my choosing one of wood. Were I sup-plicating her, I might have the best chance of success, as her heart would, probably, of the two, be the most tender.

Oft, thou that liest there, alone,
 And valueless as yonder stone;
 To every change of season bare;
 Thou, that wert once so bright, so fair,
 Where is thy glittering beauty flown?
 Thou, that did'st, like an empress, ride
 Majestic o'er the vassal tide;
 Love's image, wanting but the tone
 Of voice, to call thee Nature's own:
 What art thou now? who once wert seen
 Array'd in beauty, as a queen,
 Smiling above the wave serene,
 Calm 'mid the demented jar,
 And in the thunder of the war;
 The crescent on thy forehead beaming,
 Thy bright locks o'er thy shoulders streaming,
 With pointed dart, and bukin'd feet,
 Thou seem'st as the billow fleet,
 Eying, as 'twere, with lofty glance,
 Thy victims from their dens advance.
 There was a time when valour's eyes
 Would gaze intently on thy face,
 And sighs from iron hearts arise—
 As love would come fond image trace
 Of maiden left 'neath kinder skies—
 The sailor bending o'er the bow,
 Saw, in thy smooth and open brow,
 Some sweet resemblance of the fair,
 His bosom vainly pined for there;

Till with the fond idea warm,
 He almost clasp'd thy silent form;
 But bumbled in the dust art thou,
 And who, alas! will clasp thee now.
 The flame will clasp thee! hotly bright,
 To feed its fiery appetite,
 Like as the lustful spoiler woos
 The wretch that dares not to refuse;
 And having won her to his arms,
 Riots in, and destroys her charms.
 And thou, like those that gave thee form,
 At last may mingle with the worm.
 I saw thee once, with aspect bland,
 Fresh from thy skillful maker's hand,
 Ere youth's fair reign with me began;
 And now that years have mark'd me man,
 I see thee, and with deep regret,
 In ruin laid, but comely yet.
 So looks, perchance, some earthly maid,
 To whom the world has homage paid,
 The victim of her love or pride,
 In beauty's autumn cast aside.

Yet, thou art better far than those Inheritors of earthly woes,
 Whose semblance unto thee is given;
 What, tho' thou had'st not light from heaven,
 Thou never hast with sickness striven;
 Neither has want nor sorrow been
 To blight the calmness of thy mein;
 A faithless friend thou hast not met,
 Thou had'st no false love to forget;
 Stern age alone has brought thy doom,
 And winds and waves have stol'n thy bloom;
 And if (like mortal maidens), thou
 Hast the neglect of mankind now,
 It is not felt, thou tranquil art,
 Thou know'st not sickness of the heart.

Oh! well can I recall the time
 When the gay bark that bore thy name
 Left Albion's cool and pleasant clime,
 For western India's realms of flame.
 'Twas summer; brightly shone the sun,
 As (quarterly the wind) she run
 A steady free-top-gallant breeze;
 She dash'd aside the clapping seas,
 A sight that every eye might please;
 And every sail, so white and full,
 Look'd, in the sun light, beautiful.
 O'er many a wave thou sincest hast been,
 And eke by many a gallant scene
 Renown'd, and sacred held in story—
 But thou could'st know not of their glory,
 Thou could'st not feel the soul expand,
 As some do when they pass the land
 That once was glorious, once was great
 And lovely,—lone and desolate.
 Thou could'st not know of freedom, thou
 Before it stood 'st with unmur'd brow.

Oh! what can bring sweet liberty
 To man a just idea of thee;
 I've seen the her'd, with pinion wide,
 Thro' the blue realms of ether ride,
 Cleaving the wind in freedom's pride—
 And watch'd him sailing on, alone,
 Till in the distance he was gone,
 Farther than eye its glance could send,—
 And yet his journey found no end.
 And thought that sight description true—
 But he who sails the waters blue,
 All clear above and fair below,
 And ought to stay his daring prow—
 No spot whereon to fix his eye,
 Save the blue wave and blue sky,
 Will feel thee most, sweet Liberty.
 But, oh, not all the hearts that ride
 Upon the breast of ocean's tide;

Can feel as wand'ring o'er to feel.
 Unmark'd by them, the waves may glide
 In beauteous silence past her side,
 Or round her stern in eddies steal;
 Unfelt by them, the freshening breeze
 Plays in the sail and wakes the seas;
 They have not minds for things like these—Unheeded rides the moon on high,
 And night, her stary canopy
 Spreads o'er the waters and the sky.
 There are too many*, who, like thee,
 Old Dian, wander on the sea;
 Their voyage, but a tale sleep
 Awak'd, but when on shore they creep.
 There let them run their useless race,
 So Ocean be my dwelling place;
 Mine be the life, the varied life,
 The careless sun of Ocean lead,
 To-day in peace, the next in strife,
 Free as the wind that gives them speed;
 Where the soul dancer meets and dares it,
 Wild as the element that bears it.

Farwell, farewell! thy day has past,
 And mine has come, but may not last;
 The few bright hours of youth are gone,
 And manhood's years roll darkly on,
 Behind me. Ills I've had to bear,
 Authors of thoughts that painful are,
 Before me a long vale of care—
 A troubled sky, a stormy sea
 Betwixt me and eternity;
 And when the painful struggle's o'er,
 Tost a lone wreck, on death's pale shore,
 My form at length shall be like these.

SAM SPIRITALE.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—Mr. Dibdin's celebrated drama, The Heart of Mid Lothian, has been produced at this theatre; and we congratulate the manager on his ingenuity in rendering one of the most popular of modern dramas as dull and insipid as it was possible to make it. We will not so far libel the good taste of our readers as to suppose that any one of them is unacquainted with this drama, and to most the dramatis personæ of this house can scarcely be strangers; we need, therefore, only mention by whom, not how, the characters were sustained, as that will easily be guessed. Reuben Butler,
 Mr. Barnard; Effie Deans, Madame
 Vestris; Jeannie Deans, Mrs. Orger; Staunton, alias Robertson, Mr. Thompson! Madge Wildfire, Mrs. Vining, who had come to the theatre as a visitor, but promptly undertook the character, when Mrs. Egerton, who attempted it, was unable, through hoarseness, to proceed in it. There were, however,
 three good characters in the piece:
 Dumbdies, by Mr. Mackay; Meg Murdochison, by Mrs. Brooker; and Saddletree, by Mr. Smith; the two

* Many travellers may be well compared with the figure at the head of a ship; they go a great way and see nothing.

last one from the Surrey Theatre, Mr. Mackay's Dumbdies was an admirable piece of acting; the gait and manner, the mixture of avarice and benevolence, and the doating attachment of the Laird, were finely portrayed; and wretched as the piece was generally performed, yet its intrinsic merits, in spite of all disadvantages, procured it abundant applause.

COVENT GARDEN.—Shakespear's King Henry the Fourth, or rather the Coronation, attracts crowded audiences every evening. Those who cannot witness the splendid pageant at Westminster Hall or the Abbey, may form as good an idea of it from this exhibition as the limits of a theatre will permit. The dresses are splendid, the procession numerous and well-arranged, and the ceremonial altogether very imposing.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—The Belle's Stratagem was performed here on Monday to a numerous and genteel audience. Mr. Conway played Doricourt for the first time, and sustained the part in a very respectable manner; but there is a stiffness in his demeanor, that disqualifies him for the pretensions of a perfect gentleman. Mrs. Johnson, in Letitia Hardy, wanted the delicacy that should heighten the interest of the character with the audience. Mrs. Charterley's personification of the lively widow, Racket, was admirable; she seemed pleased with the part she was acting, and every one seemed pleased with her. Mr. Lucy, as Flutter, was just the gay, flippant, busy, insignificant thing the author must have intended; he played with great ease, and was really very amusing. Mr. Terry's character, Hardy, was unworthy of his talents, and the rest of the performance was neither good enough for praise nor bad enough for reprobation.

ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.—On Monday night, her Majesty the Queen visited this theatre, which she entered a few minutes before seven o'clock, amidst the universal plaudits of a crowded and respectable audience. She occupied one of the boxes situated below the level of the stage, a circumstance which occasioned some displeasure until explained. After God Save the King had been sung by the company, with the discordant substitutions by the audience, the manager was peremptorily summoned to answer for the disrespect shown to the Queen in the selection of her box.

Mr. Bartley came forward; but for some time he might have been just as profitably employed in communicating with his own lips. Silence, however, was restored, and this respectable actor proceeded to inform the audience, that it was the wish of the manager to treat with all imaginable respect the august personage who had on that occasion condescended to honour the English Opera House with her presence. Mr. Bartley was proceeding, but he was interrupted by loud cries of 'the Queen, the Queen.' After some moments he proceeded;—

'Ladies and Gentlemen—I have had some experience of the stage, and I never, in the course of my life, heard an actor from the stage presume to designate one of the Royal Family by the title of King or Queen. So much for that objection; but if you think that I am derogating from that respect to which I consider her Majesty entitled, I assure you that I have not the slightest objection to state to you that the Queen has been placed in that box by the express desire of her own chamberlain. The selection, Ladies and Gentlemen, is his, and cannot, therefore, with justice, be attributed to the manager.'

This address was received with applause, and the performance proceeded. The operetta of Bachelors' Wives was followed by Love's Dream, in which Miss Kelly's acting was frequently and forcibly applauded. The Queen left the theatre at the conclusion of the second piece. The house at half price was crowded to excess.

SURREY THEATRE.—On Monday night the able and indefatigable manager of this theatre, Mr. Dibdin, had his benefit, when a new serious piece, entitled The Mysterious Marriage, and a new comic one, called Frederick and Voltaire, were produced. Miss Taylor and Mr. Huntley in the first were very effective; and the principal characters in the last piece were well sustained by Huntley, Bengough, Wyatt, and Fitzwilliam. The house was well filled.

MADAME CATALANI.

It forms no part of our plan to notice either public or private concerts, confident that our pages can generally be devoted to objects of more extended interest, we are, however, disposed to make an exception in the case of that sweet syren, Madame Catalani, who, after an absence of seven years, has returned in the fulness of her strength, to reap new laurels and impart new pleasures.

In our notice of Lady Morgan's Italy, we mentioned, in an anecdote, that Madame Catalani was born at Senigaglia, and, we believe, in the year 1780, and of respectable parents. She was educated at the Convent of Guccio, where her exquisite voice soon rendered her so conspicuous, that the nuns, jealous of her superiority, succeeded in prohibiting her from singing in the church. At the age of fourteen, she quitted the convent, and being furnished with the means of cultivating her talents by a cardinal, she made such rapid progress in vocal music, that she soon ventured, publicly, to compete with the two famous singers, Marchesi and Crescentini. She placed herself under the tuition of a celebrated Italian singer, Anna Morichetto Bosello, who died about the year 1800. Madame Catalani now shone successively at the theatres of Venice, Milan, Florence, and Rome; she was next invited to the court of Lisbon, where she remained four years, with a yearly salary of 24,000 cruzados. From thence she proceeded to Madrid, with letters of recommendation to the queen, who loaded her with favours; and, at a single concert which she gave in that capital, she received nearly 3500*l.* From Spain she went to France, and was received with such distinction in all the towns throughout which she passed, that her journey resembled a triumphal march. At Paris, she gave four concerts, which attracted immense crowds, notwithstanding the exorbitant price of the tickets, which were one louis d'or each.

In the year 1806, Madame Catalani visited England, where her talents were as much admired and more liberally paid than in any country she had previously visited, and in a residence of somewhat less than eight years, she gained the immense sum of 90,000 guineas! In the beginning of the year 1814, she returned to France, and, by permission of the king, established an entertainment, which combined the opera seria and the opera buffa, in the Theatre Favart. She was, for a considerable time, sole proprietor and manager of this theatre, which possessed the best orchestra in Europe, under the direction of the celebrated Paer.

When the congress was held at Aix-la-Chapelle, Madame Catalani relieved the tedium of partitioning kingdoms, by the soft enchantment of her voice, which procured her the applause and the rewards of all the sovereigns and princes there assembled; since that time she has visited various parts of Italy and Germany.

Having given this brief biographical sketch of this celebrated singer, we shall now notice her first appearance this season, at a concert at the Argyle Rooms, on Monday evening. The performance was announced for nine o'clock, and at that hour the Music Hall was crowded with amateurs and persons of fashion. In the royal box were the Dukes of Clarence and Cambridge, with, we believe, the Duchesses of Kent, Gloucester, Clarence, and the Princess Augusta. The concert began with a symphony of Mozart. Spagnoletti led the orchestra, and Clanchettini sat at the piano-forte. The symphony was correctly played, and intolerably tedious. This was followed by a comic duet song, As it might so please Fortune, by the Signors Placchi and Angrisani.—On Catalani's ascending the orchestra, every glass and every eye was turned upon her; a considerable part of the assembly rose, and the singer seemed for the moment not slightly embarrassed. Catalani's face and figure are much improved; her physiognomy, without losing its powerful expression, is fuller, and her form more rounded. Her voice has undergone a change not unlike that of her person. It is richer, more complete, more rounded. Its spirit has undergone no change: it is still the same brilliant, vivid, and penetrating talent; its tone is magnificent. This tone is obviously improved in quality; it has acquired additional sweetness without losing its early delicacy, and runs through the most minute divisions of the scale with matchless sweetness. Some of its cadences were prolonged with a splendid ostentation of her strength, and their closes were unfailingly wound up with some subtle sudden feat of taste and skill, that left the audience in wonder.

The first song, Della Superba Roma, a bravura, gave a fine occasion for the development of her volume of voice. She reserved her mastery of the scale for another display; but, even in this less ambitious commencement, she gave striking evidence of her powers. A duet on the harp and piano-forte, by the Misses Ash, was next performed. It was a clever composition, and executed with a neatness very creditable to those young performers. Rodés Violin Variations followed, sung by Catalani. This was palpably for the display of that rapid execution which first distinguished this great singer. It was delightfully performed, and applauded in the highest degree.

Non più andria was one of the most striking efforts of the night. The melody is popular from its elegance and gaiety, and Catalani sang it with singular grace and animation. The night concluded with God save the King. The audience rose, and Catalani sang a verse with a tolerable English pronunciation, and with extraordinary force of voice. We have spoken of this performance in superlatives; but nothing can be too strong for the description of Catalani's excellence; her voice is of unlimited compass; her execution is eminently dextrous, swift, and articulate. She has a perfect shake, of surprising strength, finish, and sustained tone, which leaves all competitors at an immeasurable distance.

MR. KEAN'S FAREWELL TO AMERICA.

(From the National Advocate of June 8.)

SIR,—As I find it impossible for individual efforts to stem the torrent of opposition with which I have to contend, and as I likewise consider it inconsistent with my feelings and character to make additional apologies, I have resolved to return to my native country, and beg leave to offer to the public my thanks for that portion of favour bestowed upon me, and respectfully bid them farewell.

Had I been aware of the enormity of the offence which has excited so much indignation, I certainly should not have permitted my feelings to interfere with my interest.

The 'very head and front of my offending' amounts to this: an actor, honoured, patronized by his native country, and enjoying a high rank in the drama, withheld his services, under the impression that they were not duly appreciated; and so much do I fear the frailty of my nature, that it is not improbable, under the same circumstances, I might be tempted to act in the same manner. I therefore think it proper to leave the theatre open to such compeers, whose interests it may be to study the customs, and not offend them by my presence any longer.

Before I left England, I was apprised how powerful an agent the press was in a free country, and I was admonished to be patient under the lashes that awaited me; and, at a great sacrifice of feeling, I have submitted to their unparalleled severity and injustices. I was too proud to complain, and suffered in silence; but I have no hesitation in saying, that the conduct I pursued was that which every man of reputation pursued under the same circumstances, in that country where Shakspeare was born, and Garrick had acted.

Again, I disclaim any intention of offending; and although every natural domestic tie, as well as the public love, await me on my own shores, it is with reluctance and regret, I leave my friends in America.

EDMUND KEAN.

STATEMENT OF THE BOSTON MANAGERS.

TO THE PUBLIC.—The Managers of the Boston Theatre having suffered, not only severe mortification from the disappointment experienced by the public, but a heavy pecuniary loss from Mr. Kean's non-fulfilment of his engagement with them, indulged the hope that they should not, in addition, be accused of 'concurring in any offence to the public.' Mr. Kean's statement, however, republished in the Boston papers of this day, has reduced them to the unpleasant alternative of either, by silence, admitting the truth of that statement, or of publicly disavowing it. They, therefore, respectfully state, that Mr. Kean's refusal to perform the part of Richard III. was not only without their concurrence, but met from them all the opposition in their power, which they thought decorous and gentlemanly. This course was dictated by a sense of duty that they owed to the patrons of the drama; and when they add, that Mr. Kean was not to receive any specific sum for his services, but was to share the receipts of the eight nights, if they exceeded a certain agreed sum, and to have the ninth night clear for his benefit, it will appear evident, that interest as well as duty would prevent them from 'concurring.'

The managers submit this statement in duty to the public and themselves, not from any hostility to Mr. Kean.

Monument to the late Mr. Cooke.—We are informed that Mr. Kean, previous to his departure from this country, put into effect his original intention when he first arrived among us, and has erected a splendid monument, in St. Paul's Church Yard, in this city, to the memory of the celebrated Cooke.—New York Paper.

THE CORONATION.

HAVING already said so much in the Literary Chronicle on the coronation generally, it may be expected, now that the splendid pageant is over, that we should be equally forward in describing it. Our object, however, was to prepare our readers for the event by collecting such information as escaped the vigilance of other journalists; and now, when there is nothing left us but the description of the ceremonial, such are our narrow limits that we could not enter upon it without being inferior to every daily and evening paper, which have the most ample details.

The coronation was in every respect similar to that of James II. and George the Third, except in what relates to the coronation of a Queen. His Majesty went through the whole of the ceremony with great dignity, and without appearing to suffer much from fatigue.

There is one circumstance which will particularly distinguish the coronation of His Majesty George the Fourth, and which ought to be recorded by every journalist—the great accommodation made for the gentlemen of the press. At the last coronation, they were not recognized, and only admitted even to the Houses of Lords and Commons by stealth, and their reports, meagre and wretched as they were, were suffered by connivance.

The newspapers, the day after the coronation of George the Third, contained nothing more than the programme of the ceremonial, and a solitary paragraph; now the evening papers of the same day fill their sixteen columns with an account of the events, which on the following day are extended to twenty close columns in some of the morning papers. In noticing this difference, we cannot sufficiently praise Lord Gwydyr, the Deputy Lord Great Chamberlain, with whom the important arrangement originated. The boxes, belonging to this office in the hall, had, at former coronations, been turned to a profitable account, but his lordship generously gave his up to the gentlemen connected with the press, who were accommodated with one of the best boxes in the hall, which was exclusively devoted to their use. We wish we could have accorded a similar praise to the deputy or acting earl marshal, who, by virtue of his office, has charge of the abbey: but, although admissions were given to reporters, yet it was done in a reluctant and ungracious manner, and the place assigned to them was well calculated to render their attendance of as little service as possible.

There is another point in which the present coronation will be distinguished from all others, in the liberal provision made all over the metropolis for the amusements of the populace. We do not allude to the booths and galleries which were erected in the neighbourhood of Westminster Hall and the Abbey, to enable spectators to see the procession; for these were prompted by cupidity. Owing, however, to various circumstances, these galleries were very slenderly filled, and seats, which, a few days before, were charged three and four guineas, might, on the day of coronation, have been procured for as many shillings. The accommodation we allude to was that provided by government.

We have often been reproached by our Gallic neighbours, who open their places of public amusement on great occasions, for not following their example. This, however, was done on Thursday, and without any of the consequences which had been dreaded from it. By command of the King, all the theatres were open to the public; and we need not say, that they were all very well filled: tickets of admission were given in the morning from ten till two o'clock, to all applicants until as many were issued as would fill the theatres.

In addition to the above, there were the most splendid fire-works in Hyde Park—a sort of naumachia on the Serpentine—the ascent of a balloon in the morning—the discharges of rockets from various parts of the town; and bands of music paraded the streets to enliven and amuse the inhabitants. There was a liberality in all this, which we cannot but applaud, and we are happy to say that it seemed to be appreciated by the public.

Literature and Science.

Coronation Tickets.—The tickets for admission to Westminster Hall and the Abbey, on the day of the Coronation, were printed on Sir William Congreve's plan, in colours, and are embellished with very elegantly embossed borders, and other decorations, illustrative of the occasion. The Hall Ticket comprised the mark of the Congreve Press, eight inches long and five broad, in black and red, which is succeeded by a beautifully embossed border, more than three-quarter inches wide, composed of oak branches, with their leaves and acorns connected at each angle by the Union Badge, surmounted by the crown of state. Within a circle of about two-and-a-half inches in diameter, there is a representation of his Majesty, seated in his coronation chair: an angel is pouring the holy oil on his head; Britannia presents him with the sceptre; while Justice, with her scales, and Mercy, with the cintara or pointless sword, are also in attendance. Each Hall Ticket is signed by Lord Gwydyr, the Deputy Great Chamberlain. The Abbey Ticket is printed with the same Congreve plate as the former, but, in respect to the solemnity of the place, with blue and black ink instead of red and black; it is decorated by Mr. Dobbs, with a different but most appropriate frame-work in relief; it consists of a rich border of embossed Gothic fancy, in quatre foil panels, the margin between the panels being ornamented with the laural branch; whilst the rose, shamrock, and thistle, are alternately distributed within them; the angles are appropriated to the (Abbey arms) portculis, surmounted with the royal crown, the space on each side being filled with the Union Badge, the rose, thistle, and shamrock; the backs of the tickets are distinguished by different colours, red, green, blue, and yellow, applicable to the particular situations in the Abbey, &c. The execution of these tickets do no credit to the arts; and if Sir William Congreve's plan can do nothing better, we would never wish to see it employed on any thing but ornaments for valentines, for which it seems admirably suited.

LORENZUS.

Marshal Keith.—When the Turks had invaded the Ukraine on the side of Russia, that empire sent two numerous armies to repel the invaders. The one commanded by Count Lasci, an Irishman, broke through the Turkish intrenchments, and ravaged Crimean Tartary with fire and sword. The other army, under the command of Count Munich, was destined for the destruction of Oczakow. In this army, Mr. Keith, then a lieutenant, but afterwards governor of Berlin, and field marshal of the Russian forces, served; and by his valour and skill at the head of eight thousand men, contributed most materially to the taking of the place. In storming this city, Lieutenant Keith gave such instances of tenderness and humanity, as diffused additional lustre round his military glory, for while the furious Moscovites were sanguine in their revenge, he checked their ferocity, and exhorted them to spare the lives of their enemies. Among others, he rescued a child of six years of age from the hands of a Cossack, who had already raised his scymitar to cut off her head, as she was struggling to extricate herself out of some rubbish in which she had been entangled. The father of the child was a Turkish grandee of some eminence; but being now left an orphan, Mr. Keith took her under his protection, educated her in the most liberal manner, and treated her as if she had been his own daughter. When she grew up, he gave her the charge of his house, where she did the honours of the table, and proved herself worthy of the kindness she had experienced.

Miracles.—Gervase informs us, that such multitudes of miracles were wrought at the tomb of Thomas Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury, that the number and nature of them, instead of satisfying the world, would, in an age less credulous, have created a suspicion of their reality: neither Christ nor his Apostles performed so many to prove the truth of Christianity, as Becket did to defend the privileges and immunities of the clergy. The monks affirm, that he not only restored dead men to life, but that he even raised the very beasts. They farther add, that being exposed to view in the church, before he was interred, he rose out of his coffin, and went and lighted the tapers which had been extinguished; and that, after the funeral ceremony was over, he held up his hands and blessed the people. The fame of these miracles drew such an immense number of votaries from all parts of Christendom, that in the year 430, no less than fifty thousand foreigners came on a pilgrimage to the shrine of this renowned martyr.

St. Erremond.—The following character of St. Erremond is drawn by himself.—I am a philosopher, as far removed from superstition as from impiety; a voluptuary, who has not less abhorrence for debauchery, than inclination for pleasure; a man, who has never known want nor abundance. I occupy that station of life which is despised by those who possess every thing; envied by those who have nothing, and only relished by those who make their felicity to consist in the exercise of their reason. Young, I hated dissipation; convinced that a man must possess wealth to provide for the comforts of a long life; old, I disliked economy, as I believe that we need not greatly dread want, when we have but a short time to be miserable. I am satisfied with what nature has done for me; nor do I require a fortune. I do not seek in men what they have of evil, that I may censure; I only find out what they have ridiculous, that I may be amused. I feel a pleasure in detecting their follies; I should feel a greater in communicating my discoveries, did not my prudence restrain me: life is too short, according to my ideas, to read all kinds of books, and to load our memory with an infinite number of things at the cost of our judgment. I do not attach myself to the sentiments of scientific men to acquire science; but to the most rational, that I may strengthen my reason. Sometimes I seek for the more delicate minds, that my taste may imbibe their delicacy; sometimes for the gay, that I may enrich my genius with their gaiety; and, although I constantly read, I make it less my occupation than my pleasure. In religion and in friendship, I have only to paint myself such as I am—in friendship, more tender than a philosopher; and in religion, as constant; and as sincere as a youth who has more simplicity than experience. My piety is composed more of justice and charity, than of penitence. I rest my confidence in God, and hope every thing from His benevolence.—In the bosom of providence, I find my repose and my felicity.

Away from our lovers,
We doubt, we desire,—
Our breast is on fire,

But blest hope appearing,
Our clouded brows cheering,—
The heart soon discovers

Review of New Books.

Ten Years' Exile; or, Memoirs of that interesting period of the Life of the Baroness de Staël Holstein, written by herself, during the Years 1810, 1811, 1812, and 1813, and now first published from the Original Manuscript, by her Son. Translated from the French. 8vo. pp. 434. London, 1821.

THE literary fame of Madame de Staël is fixed on too firm a basis to be shaken by the publication of an incomplete and unfinished work; and, therefore, we exonerate her son from giving these fragments of her Memoirs to the public in the state in which he found them. The Ten Years' Exile is now first added to a complete edition of this distinguished lady's works, published by her son, in seventeen volumes, octavo, in French. The title is one chosen by the authoress, but the work comprises only a period of seven years. The narrative begins in 1800, two years previous to Madame de Staël's exile, and stops at 1804, after the death of her father, M. Necker. It recommences in 1810, and breaks off abruptly at her arrival in Sweden, in the autumn of 1812. Between the first and second parts of these Memoirs, there is, therefore, an interval of nearly six years.

The narrative dwells principally on the persecution to which Madame de Staël was subjected during the imperial government, in exiling her from Paris, and subsequently sending her out of France, and in suppressing her work on Germany. The editor, in his preface, deprecates the idea of exulting over a fallen enemy, in painting, in strong colours, the imperial government; but as the powerful of the earth have carefully gathered up the shameful inheritance of him whom they have overthrown, he considers this work as attacking a still powerful adversary, and calculated to increase the horror of arbitrary government.

Madame de Staël commences her work with an account of the causes of Bonaparte's animosity against her, the principal of which was the respect she always entertained for real liberty. She says,—

Shortly after the 18th Brumaire, Bonaparte had heard that I had been speaking strongly in my own parties, against that dawning oppression, whose progress I foresaw as clearly as if the future had been revealed to me. Joseph Bonaparte, whose understanding and conversation I liked very much, came to see me, and told me, "my brother complains of you. Why, said he to me yesterday, why does not Madame de Staël attach herself to my government? what is it she wants? the payment of the deposit of her father? I will give orders for it: a residence in Paris? I will allow it her. In short, what is it she wishes?" "Good God!" replied I, "it is not what I wish, but what I think, that is in question."

Before we proceed further in Madame de Staël's Narrative of the persecutions she suffered from Bonaparte, we ought to state that his advocates give a very different version of the affair. They assert, that during the first campaigns in Italy, where Napoleon established his reputation, Madame de Staël often wrote long letters to him, in which she was by no means sparing of her praises; and that, after his return from the Italian campaigns, at the great fêtes which the government gave to him, she was unwearied in her attendance on Bonaparte. It is also said, that during the latter part of the imperial government, she endeavoured to obtain the situation of Dame du Palais to the Empress Maria Louisa, but without success, Bonaparte always treating her with great coolness.

This, it will be seen, is a very different account of the transactions between Bonaparte and Madame de Staël from what she gives, and perhaps truth lies between the two. We have already stated, that a love of liberty is said to have been Bonaparte's first cause of animosity against this lady; a second is said to have been her friendship for M. Benjamin Constant, who consulted her on a speech he was about to deliver in the Tribune against tyranny. When that speech was delivered, Madame de Staël's drawing room, which had hitherto been frequented by Joseph and Lucien Bonaparte, and several partisans of Bonaparte, became deserted, and she was suspected of having excited M. Constant to speak so freely.

The narrative is very desultory, and often interrupted by disquisitions which display the good sense and profound thinking of the author. Spraking of the policy of Bonaparte, which she aptly calls a system of fusion, she says,—

While we have seen the Christian kings take two confessors to examine their consciences more narrowly, Bonaparte chose two ministers, one of the old and the other of the new regimes, whose business it was to place at his disposal the Machiavelian means of two opposite systems. In all his nominations, Bonaparte followed nearly the same rule, of taking, as it may be said, now from the right, and now from the left,—that is to say, choosing alternately his officers among the aristocrats and among the Jacobins: the middle party, that of the friends of liberty, pleased him less than all the others, composed as it was of the small numbers of persons, who, in France, had an opinion of their own. He jested much better to have to do with persons who were attached to royalist interests, or who had become stigmatized by popular excesses. He even went so far as to wish to name as a counsellor of state a conventionalist sullied with the vilest crimes of the days of terror; but he was diverted from it by the shuddering of those who would have had to sit along with him. Bonaparte would have been delighted to have given that shining proof that he could regenerate, as well as confound, every thing.

What particularly characterizes the government of Bonaparte, is his profound contempt for the intellectual riches of human nature; virtue, mental dignity, religion, enthusiasm,—these, these are in his eyes, the eternal enemies of the Continent, to make use of his favourite expression; he would reduce man to force and cunning, and designate every thing else as folly or stupidity. The English particularly irritate him, as they have found the means of being honest, as well as successful, a thing which Bonaparte would have us regard as impossible. This shining point of the world has dazzled his eyes from the very first days of his reign.

In 1800, when Bonaparte was in his way to make the campaign of Italy, he went by Geneva, and expressed a wish to see M. Necker, who waited on him, and interceded so far for his daughter as to ensure her, for some time longer at least, a residence in France. It cannot be disguised, that Madame de Staël's work is written with a very strong prejudice against Bonaparte; she confesses, that she wished he might be beaten in the Italian campaign, 'as the only means of stopping the progress of his tyranny.' This is a rather singular declaration for a woman who boasts so much of her attachment to glory and to France. Speaking of one of the most splendid of Napoleon's victories, she says,—

'The battle of Marengo was lost for a couple of hours: the negligence of General Melas, who trusted too much to the advantages he had gained, and the audacity of General Desaix, restored the victory to the French arms. While the fate of the battle was almost desperate, Bonaparte rode about slowly on horse-back, pensive, and looking downwards, more courageous against danger than misfortune, attempting nothing, but waiting the turn of the wheel. He has behaved several times in a similar way, and has found his advantage in it. But I cannot help always thinking, that if Bonaparte had fairly encountered among his adversaries a man of character and probity, he would have been stopped short in his career. His great talent lies in terrifying the feeble, and availing himself of unprincipled characters. When he encounters honour any where, it may be said that his artifices are disconcerted, as evil spirits are conjured by the sign of the cross.'

Madame de Staël returned to Paris from Geneva, in November, 1800, and was within hearing of the explosion of the infernal machine, intended for the destruction of Bonaparte:—

'He discussed very coolly at his own house the same evening what would have happened if he had perished. Some persons said, that Moreau would have replaced him: Bonaparte pretended that it would have been General Bernadotte. "Like Antony," said he, "he would have presented to the inflamed populace the bloody robe of Cæsar." I know not if he really believed that France would have then called Bernadotte to the head of affairs, but what I am quite sure of is, that he said so for the purpose of exciting envy against that general.'

It is very evident, that Madame de Staël entertained a much higher opinion of her own importance than Bonaparte did; and she tells us, that being invited to General Berthier's one day, when the first consul was to be of the party, she, thinking that he might accost her rudely, wrote down 'a variety of tart and piquant replies' to make to him; a precaution which proved quite unnecessary, as 'he only addressed the most common questions possible.'

Our fair author condemns, with just indignation, Bonaparte's conduct in regard to the English détachés, and she gives an amusing account of the preparations for invading England:—

'During the summer of 1803 began the great force of the invasion of England; flat-bottomed boats were ordered to be built from one end of France to the other; they were even constructed in the forests on the borders of the great roads. The French, who have in all things a very strong rage for imitation, cut out deal upon deal, and heaped phrase upon phrase: while, in Picardy, some erected a triumphal arch, on which was inscribed, "the road to London;" others wrote, "To Bonaparte the Great." "We request you will admit us on board the vessel which will bear you to England, and with you the destiny and the vengeance of the French people." This vessel, on board of which Bonaparte was to embark, has had time to wear herself out in harbour. Others put, as a device for their flags in the roadstead, "a good wind and thirty hours." In short, all France resounded with gasconades, of which Bonaparte alone knew perfectly the secret.'

In the month of September, 1803, Madame de Staël was, by order of Bonaparte, banished to forty leagues distance from Paris. Lucien and Joseph Bonaparte and General Junot, all interceded in her behalf, but ineffectually; Joseph even received her into his house at the time she was thus the object of his brother's persecution. He also succeeded in obtaining permission for her residence in Prussia, and gave her some strong letters of recommendation to Berlin. The King of Prussia received Madame de Staël with great kindness, and which she repays by gross flattery. It was at Berlin that our author first heard of the death of the Duke d'Enghien, and the fatal event was announced to her by Prince Louis. She condemns it as a horrible action, and inquires, how was it possible for a single monarch in Europe to connect himself with such a man? and yet we find nearly all the sovereigns of Europe, including her favourite King of Prussia, uniting with him in all the cordiality that friendship or necessity dictated. On this subject, she gives some interesting anecdotes:—

'A lady of my acquaintance related to me, that a few days after the death of the Duke d'Enghien, she went to take a walk round the castle of Vincennes; the ground, still fresh, marked the spot where he had been buried; some children were playing with little quills upon this mound of turf, the only monument for the ashes of such a man. An old invalid, with silvered locks, was sitting at a little distance, and remained some time looking at these children; at last he arose, and leading them away by the hand, said to them, shedding some tears, "Do not play there, my children, I beseech you." These tears were all the honours that were paid to the descendant of the great Condé, and the earth did not long bear the impression of them.

'For a moment at least, public opinion seemed to awaken in France, and indignation was general; but when these generous flames were extinguished, despotism was but the more easily established, from the vain efforts which had been made to resist it. The first consul was for some days rather uneasy at the disposition of men's minds. Fouché himself blamed this action; he made use of this expression, so characteristic of the present regime: "It is worse than a crime; it is a fault." There are many ideas in this short phrase; but, fortunately, we may reverse it with truth, by affirming that the greatest of faults is crime. Bonaparte asked an honest senator, what was thought of the death of the Duke d'Enghien. "General," replied he, "it has given great affliction." "I am not astonished at it," said Bonaparte, "a house which has long reigned in a country always interests: thus wishing to connect with motives of party interest the most natural feeling that the human heart can experience. Another time he put the same question to a tribune, who, from the desire of pleasing him, answered: "Well, general, if our enemies take measures against us, we are in the right to do the same against them;" not perceiving that this was tantamount to a confession that the deed was atrocious. The first consul affected to consider this act as dictated by reasons of state. One day, about this period, in a discussion with an intelligent man about the plays of Corneille, he said, "you see that the public safety, or, to express it better, that state necessity has with the moderns been substituted in the place of the falsity of the ancients: there is, for instance, such a man, who naturally would be incapable of a crime, but political circumstances impose it upon him as a law. Corneille is the only one who has shown, in his tragedies, an acquaintance with state necessity; on that account, if he had lived in my time, I would have made him my prime minister."

The illness and death of M. Necker, which occurred about this time, are related with that blind affection for which his daughter was so much distinguished. The trial and banishment of Moreau, and the commencement of the French empire followed:—
The empire to call Bonaparte to the empire was made in the tribunate by a conventionalist, formerly a jacobin, supported by Jaubert, an advocate and deputy from the merchants of Bourdeaux, and seconded by Simeon, a man of understanding and good sense, who had been proscribed as a royalist under the republic. It was Bonaparte's wish that the partisans of the old regime, and those of the permanent interests of the nation, should unite in choosing him. It was settled that registers should be opened all over France, to enable every one to express his wish regarding the elevation of Bonaparte to the throne. But, without waiting for the result of this, prepared as it was before-hand, he took the title of emperor by a senatus consultum, and this unfortunate senate had not even the strength to put constitutional limits to this new monarchy. A tribune, whose name I wish I dared mention*, had the honour to make a special motion for that purpose. Bonaparte, in order to anticipate this idea, adroitly sent for some of the senators, and told them, "I feel very much at thus being placed in front; I like my present situation much better. The continuation of the republic is, however, no longer possible; people are quite tired out with it: I believe that the French wish for royalty." I had at first thought of recalling the old Bourbons, but that would have only ruined them and myself. It is my thorough conviction, that there must be at last a man at the head of all this; perhaps, however, it would be better to wait some time longer I have made France a century older in the last five years; liberty, that is a good civil code, and modern nations care little for any thing but property. However, if you will believe me, name a committee, organise the constitution, and, I tell you fairly, adding he smiling, "take precautions against my tyranny; take them, believe me." This apparent good nature seduced the senators, who, to say the truth; desired nothing better than to be seduced. One of them, a man of letters, of some distinction, but one of those philosophers who are always finding philanthropic motives for being satisfied with power, said to one of my friends, "it is wonderful! with what simplicity the emperor allows himself to be told every thing! The other day, I made him a discourse an hour long, to prove the absolute necessity of founding the new dynasty on a charter which should secure the rights of the nation." And what reply did he make you? was asked. "He clasped me on the shoulder with the most perfect good humour, and told me: you are quite right, my dear senator; but from now, this is not the moment for it." And this senator, like many others, was quite satisfied with having spoken, though his opinion was, not in the least degree, acted upon. The feelings of self-importance have, a prodigiously greater influence ence over the French than those of character."

The first part of Madame de Staël's Narrative terminates here, and there is a period of five years before it is resumed. Her son has, however, given a rapid sketch of the principal events of her life during this period. On the death of her father, Madame de Staël went to Italy, where she remained a few months, and then returned to Coppet, where and at Geneva she passed a year, during which time she began to write Corinne. She afterwards went nearer Paris, but was again banished, to Switzerland. In 1807, she set out for Vienna, afterwards passed two years in Switzerland, writing her reflections upon Germany, which were finished in 1810. She then wished to superintend the printing of them at forty leagues distance from Paris, a distance still permitted her; and here she resumes her Narrative in the commencement of the second part of the work, which, however, we shall not enter upon at present. (To be continued.)

Notes relating to the Manners and Customs of the Crim Tatars; written during a Four Years' Residence among that People. With Plates. By Mary Holderness. 12mo. pp. 168. London, 1821.

This little work, with its modest title, contains much interesting information respecting a people of whom we have hitherto known little. The fair author resided four years, from the year 1816 to 1820, at the village of Karagose, in the Crimea, where she had daily opportunities of becoming acquainted with the Tatar inhabitants of the neighbourhood. Such of these as appeared to be most remarkable, she occasionally noted, for the amusement of a friend in England, carefully committing to paper her observations as they successively arose. The sketches, though in the form of notes, are not altogether unconnected; and although the author claims no other merit than their fidelity, yet we may assign them not a higher praise certainly, but an additional one—that they are written in a very pleasing and familiar manner. The plates which embellish the work, are coloured engravings, representing the costume of the inhabitants. We have seldom met with a work that required less introduction, and, therefore, we shall do nothing further than make a few extracts, to enable our readers to judge for themselves:—

Simplicity of Manners.—In the simple life of the Tatars much may be traced of similarity with those recorded in the earliest ages of Scripture history. Their riches consist now, as was usual then, in flocks and herds, and in the number of their families. Many also of their domestic habits are the same; nor is it so much a matter of wonder, that, in lives so simple, so much accordance should be found, as that any people, having had for some centuries past an intercourse with more civilized nations, should still retain those manners which characterized mankind before learning had enlightened and commerce enriched the world. Here, the former is still unknown, and the latter scarcely ventures a step beyond the neighbourhood of the seaport whither navigation tempts her. Exchange is still the medium of purchase, and money is but seldom required or produced in bargains made between one Tatar and another, since they look with far more anxious eyes at the expenditure of a single *petack, than at the cost of ten or twenty roubles, if negotiated by the way of exchange. Poor Tatars, like Jacob, serve an apprenticeship for their wives, and are then admitted as part of the family.

Costume.—The dress of a Tatar gentleman is of cloth, trimmed with gold or silver lace, or, in the heat of summer, of Turkish silk, or, of silk mixed with stuff. In winter, his coat is lined with fur; his trousers are worn tight and low at the ancles, and are made of some bright coloured linen, frequently blue. He wears upper and under slippers, and no stockings. He has generally a large high cap of broad cloth, (which distinguishes him from the peasantry,) and a coloured linen shirt. The priests and old men wear their beards, but the young shave them. All shave the head; and the Mullas are known by a white linen cloth which they bind round the outside of their caps.

The dress of the women consists of a pair of trousers, tied at the ankle and falling loose to the heel; a shift, and a quilted robe, made either of Turkish silk or cotton, or of gold or silver brocade, according to the rank and condition of the wearer. The cap worn by the girls is of red cloth, trimmed round with gold fringe, or (amongst the peasantry) with their small gold money; of which they also make necklaces; these latter are likewise sometimes of silver, in form somewhat resembling a collar, being tight round the neck, with silver pendants hung close around it. Their bracelets occasionally consist of three or four silver chains affixed to a broad clasp, but are most commonly rings of coloured glass, of which they often wear two or three on each arm. Every finger is loaded with a multitude of rings of brass, lead, silver, and some few of gold, generally with coloured stones in them. A broad belt is worn around the waist, hanging very loose and as low as the hips:

its materials vary according to the taste of the owner, but it is generally worked with gold or silver thread on black velvet, and fastened with a clasp as big as the palms of both hands: these are sometimes of gold or silver, richly embossed, and occasionally of brass or lead. A pair of silver clasps costs from one hundred and twenty to one hundred and seventy roubles.

Tatar Women.—The Tatar women suckle their children from two to three years, and think us barbarous for weaning our's so early. For the first half year they are seldom carried in the arms, but are commonly laid on their backs in a kind of cradle, in which they are bound so as not to roll out. To the top of this, immediately over their heads, are attached coloured beads, bits of glass, or money, in order to attract their notice. This, to an English mother, appears a most promising plan for making the infants cross-eyed, but it rarely happens that they are so. A Tatar child is swathed from head to foot with no other clothes than a few rags, for the first two or three months, but, after that, it is habituated in the same stiff and formal manner as the mother; and its dress, the ugliness of its features, and, more than all, the scorbatic humours which almost invariably cover it from a very short time after its birth, make it, of all the infants I ever saw, the most disgusting and uninteresting. Rarely, indeed, is one seen which we may venture to take in our arms.

A Tatar wife is most completely the slave of her husband, and that the men consider her such I had from the mouth of one of the most respectable of them. Thus she is only desirable as she serves to gratify his passions, or to connect him with some Tatar of better family or greater riches than himself. Among the peasantry, however, who are less bound by rigid forms, or less observant of them than their superiors, I have often seen sincere affection displayed; but their religious tenets, as well as long established customs, teach them to suppress and subdue feeling rather than to indulge it. When a Murza visits the apartments of his women, they all rise on his entrance, and again when he leaves it, although he comes and goes very frequently. This ceremonious mark of respect is never omitted, even by the wife or by any other of the females, except they be very old women, who, on account of their age, are excused from this form.

Marriages.—December 21st, O. S. 1819. The wedding of one of the sons of Atti Bey Murza is now going on in this neighbourhood, where it is supposed that the persons who will assemble on the last day of the ceremony, will not be fewer than a thousand, and that the money expended will not be less than seven or eight thousand roubles. The receiving of guests will have lasted eight days, and on each day from four to five hundred persons have attended.

It is by no means rare for a Tatar peasant to expend from one thousand to two thousand roubles at his wedding, though there are many who are compelled by poverty to more frugality.

It is well known that the Mahometan law admits of a plurality of wives. Four are allowed, but few Tatars are found to have more than one. As long as they continue to live in unity with the first, it very seldom happens that they take a second; for the women, though brought up in such perfect subservience and submission, have still the same passions and feelings as ourselves, and can as ill brook to share with another the affections of their husbands. Whether or no, the existence of the law, and the knowledge of the right which it confers, may stimulate them to a more attentive observance of their duties, and more constant endeavours to maintain undivided the regard of their lords, I will not venture to say, but I think it by no means an improbable effect; certain it is, that though a Tatar husband is supreme and absolute, and though he considers his wife most perfectly his slave, still is he affectionate and kind to her, and instances of unhappy marriages are rare.

In cases where husbands have two or more wives, separate apartments and separate establishments must be given them; they will never consent to live together, and always regard each other with feelings of hatred, jealousy, and pride.

The priest possesses the power of giving a divorce under particular circumstances. If the husband beat or ill use his wife, she may complain to the Mulla, who, attended by the community of the village, comes to the house, and pronounces a formal separation between the parties. The woman goes back to her own relations.

Runaway matches, though not common, sometimes happen, and appear to be as valid as those which are sanctified by the priest. No other shame attaches to them than that which results from the omission of the proud ceremonies and festivities. The woman considers herself as effectually bound to the man, and he as faithfully attaches himself to her, as if they had passed through the long ordeal of a Tatar marriage. An instance of this happened in the village of Karagoss, amongst our own labourers.

A Tatar having more than one daughter, will not give the younger in marriage before the elder, even though a higher price be offered for her; therefore, be her beauty or disposition ever so much commended and extolled by her attendants, the girl has no chance of being married sooner than her sisters, or, perhaps, if there be many of them, of getting a husband at all. Among the peasantry, however, this rule is possibly dispensed with. The daughter of a Murza may not marry a peasant, and the number of her own rank is now diminished to a small one.

Superstitions.—The Tatars wear a great number of charms and amulets, as preservatives from sickness and other dangers. They commonly consist of some written paper, purchased from the Mulla, and carefully sewn up in a piece of cotton or silk. These hang in strings about the neck, are suspended by the women to the hair, and are worn by the men in the centre of the back, stitched to the outer garment. They use this remedy for the sickness of their horses as well as for their own, and one of them lending my son a bridle, begged him to take care of the amulet attached to it, "for which," said he, "I paid five roubles." Another of their favourite specifics, is a bag of millet tied round a horse's neck, which, as it is applied either for a lame foot or a sore back, is, I suppose, equally efficacious for each. They likewise throw an egg, or eggs, into the face of a horse which is ill, but that this charm is not always effective I can answer from my own experience. These superstitions, gross as they may appear, are by no means confined to the lower class. During the illness of one of my children, the steward of a neighbouring Murza, who accidentally came to the house, informed me that his master had the power of curing it. "He will write a paper for you," said the man, "which you must burn, and hold the child over the smoke of it; this does, he will recover; or, perhaps, he will direct you to sew up the paper, without looking at it, and let her constantly wear it. Do not hesitate to send to him if you desire it." I had no occasion to try the strength of this charm, as my child recovered without its assistance.

In common with many other nations of the east, they retain the superstition of the evil eye, which is too well known to require description; connected with this is the belief that the admiration of a stranger is liable to bring bad luck upon their children, cattle, &c.; and the very ancient method of averting its ill consequences, by spitting on the object supposed to be affected.

Another and more singular prejudice which pervades the better informed as well as the lower class of people, is that respecting bees. They suppose that if any robbery be committed where a number of hives is kept, the whole stock will gradually diminish, and in a short time die; "for bees," say they, "will not suffer thieving." This remark has been more than once made to me by respectable, and on other subjects, apparently sensible persons.

In cases of epidemic disease amongst cattle, a Tatar expects to cure it by cutting off the head of one of them, and putting it in a hole. This, I believe, is a sacrifice to the Devil, or evil spirit, who has sent the contagion.

It is a very common custom in the Crimea, with the Tatars as well as the Bulgarian settlers, to stick up a horse's skull near their houses, in order to preserve them from witchcraft. It appears, I am told, from ancient authority, that a somewhat similar superstition prevailed among the earliest known inhabitants of this country, (the Taurians,) who, however, made use of a human skull for this purpose.

'A Tatar, who was hired to go from Karagoss to Odessa, refused to set out on a Tuesday, considering it an unlucky day; "for," said he, "I once began a journey on that day, and lost two horses by it, so that I would not again run the risk for one thousand roubles." He added, that it was against the law; which I cannot believe, since it is not probable that Mahomet, who allows his followers to work on their sabbath, should prohibit them from doing so on any other day.'

Tatar Meals.—At their dinners they sit in a circle around a small table, about a foot from the ground, over which is thrown a large table-cloth, or more commonly a very long napkin, covering the knees of all the party. The first dish, which generally consists of soup, is then brought in, with slices of bread, and a spoon for each person. All eat out of the same dish, and the use of forks is unknown. When roast or boiled meat is sent to table, the master of the house cuts it into slices, and helps his guests with his fingers, placing every one's portion upon his bread, or upon the tray. At their parties they serve up ten or fifteen dishes, one at a time, and at a friendly dinner I have never seen less than six. Water is commonly drank at table, and when that is removed, excellent coffee, often without sugar or cream, is handed round. An ewer and basin are brought to each person, before and after the meal. It is not their custom to say grace aloud, but I have remarked the elder women of the family repeating some sort of prayer before they began to eat.'

Tatar Mills.—A Tatar mill is the most simple piece of mechanism that can be conceived. Few windmills are employed. The water-mills are all undershot, and being worked by very small streams, seldom move above half the year; for in the height of summer they frequently stand still from drought, and in winter from frost. At these times, it is often necessary to send corn to be ground to the distance of forty or fifty versets. These mills perform their office so badly, that the best wheat which can be procured will not give a fine flour. The only mode of dressing it known here, is by sieves at home, and all the fine flour in use throughout the southern governments of Russia, is brought from Moscow. It sells at from seven to ten roubles per peck, while the best home flour, undressed, is bought at from twelve to twenty-five kopecks the oka.

Rye-flour is universally used by the Tatars in the manufacture of bread, and wheat-flour in that of pastry. The small quantity of good wheat which they rear, is almost all sold to purchase the few necessaries which they have occasion to buy.'

Agriculture.—All agricultural labours are performed by oxen, except that of threshing, which is generally done by horses. From the rude and barbarous form in which their ploughs are constructed, seven pairs of oxen are often required in breaking up old grass land. In ploughing a second or third time, they use two, three, or four pairs of oxen. They work these animals until they are upwards of twenty years old, and consider it wasteful to kill them while they are still able to labour. In order that they may earn as soon as possible the cost of their sustenance, they are broken into the plough as early as at two years old. The Tatar oxen are small and ugly, and those more remarkable for size and beauty, which are often seen in the Crimea, are brought from the southern provinces of Russia, particularly from the Poltava government. The cows give but a small quantity of milk, which is perhaps attributable to the dryness of the soil. The best are those of the German breed.'

'The common price given to a proprietor by those who pasture their sheep on his land, is an ewe and a lamb per hundred, for three or four months. The Tatars have an idea, that if their sheep feed on the stipa pinnata, a plant which grows upon the Stepp, it destroys them, by eating into their livers.

Goats are kept in great numbers with the flocks of sheep. They are not handsome of their kind, and as neither the carcass nor skin bear any considerable value, they seem to be very unprofitable stock. A Tatar, however, computes his riches by the number rather than by the intrinsic worth of his possessions.

'Some shawl goats were lately brought from Bucharia to the Crimea, and were shipped for France from the port of Kaffa. The fine wool for which they are so famous, is concealed under a coat of long coarse hair, and in appearance they are very little superior to the native breed.'

Amusements.—Coursing is a favourite amusement with the Tatars, who, contrary to our practice, take out for this purpose as many dogs as they can muster, and ensure the destruction of poor puss by surrounding and besetting her on all sides, like some ferocious animal, until she is hunted by one greyhound into the mouth of another. As soon as they have picked up their prize, they immediately cut its throat, as they are forbidden to eat "flesh with the blood thereof." I have seen them refuse to partake of game at our table, because they suspected that it had not undergone this operation. The hares of the Crimea are very large, generally weighing nine or ten, and often thirteen or fourteen pounds. Their fur becomes somewhat more grey in winter, but never white, as in the north of Russia and Poland. The wild rabbit does not exist in the peninsula.'

The length of our extracts will be a sufficient apology for the brevity of our criticism, and will sufficiently recommend the work to the general reader.

Gascoigne's Princely Pleasures, with the Masque intended to have been presented before Queen Elizabeth, at Kenilworth Castle, in 1575. With an Introductory Memoir and Notes. 12mo. pp. 104. London, 1821.

This elegant re-print of a scarce work, has been induced by the last romance of the Great Unknown, to which it will form an appropriate and illustrative appendage. The 'Princely Pleasures' of Kenilworth, though forming a prominent feature in the romance to which we have alluded, have been further elucidated by the publication of Laneham's Letter, which we noticed in our 94th Number; but, though Laneham gives a perfect description of the arrangement and nature of the various pageants, yet he often professes himself unable to give more than a general abstract of the many laudatory orations, both in verse and prose, which were delivered in the course of the Queen's visit. Laneham's Letter being thus imperfect in its details, Gascoigne's work, which supplies the deficiency, is arranged on the same popular plan (and, we presume, by the same editor), and thus completes a perfect view of the Kenilworth pastimes.

The work consists of a series of masques, not altogether unconnected, and written by various persons, of whom biographical notices are added by the editor. The introductory preface contains a brief memoir of Gascoigne, who was the son and heir of Sir John Gascoigne, of an ancient family, in Essex. Gascoigne, after being at the university, was entered of Gray's Inn, where he led so dissipated a life, as to cause his father to disinheritor him: Left entirely to himself, he embarked for Holland, entered the service of William, Prince of Orange, in 1573, and was in a fair way for promotion, when a quarrel with his colonel caused him to remove to Delft, in order to resign his commission. He did not, however, quit the army, but was with William of Nassau, at the siege of Middelburg, where he displayed such bravery, that the prince, as he relates, presented him with—

'Three hundred guilders good above my pay,
And bad me bide till his ablance
Might better gerdon my ablance.'

Gascoigne was afterwards taken prisoner by the Spaniards, in an affair which did him much credit, and, after remaining four months in captivity, he returned to England, where he again began to study the law, and published such of his more serious poems, as he expected would efface the memory of his former amatory productions. In 1875, he attended the Earl of Leicester to Kenilworth, to assist Hunnis, Badger, Goldingham, Ferrers, Mulcaster, and others, in the production of masques and pageants for Queen Elizabeth's entertainment. When this festival was over, Gascoigne employed himself in arranging his works for the press, and, in little more than two years after, on the 7th of October, 1877, he died at Stamford, in Lincolnshire, according to his poetical biographer, Whetstone, with such calmness—

'as no man there perceiv'd,

By struggling sign, or striving from his breath,
That he abode the pains and pangs of death.'

Of Gascoigne's miscellaneous poems we shall not speak, although the editor has given an interesting bibliographical notice. As a poet, he ranks high in the Elizabethan period; he had an intimate knowledge of the world, and his poems are distinguished by considerable warmth of sentiment and fertility of fancy, as well as by smoothness and harmony of versification.

Gascoigne, who had a considerable share in the masques, was, on the Queen's preparing to depart, commanded by the Earl of Leicester to 'devise some farewell worth the presenting,' on which he clothed himself like Sylvanus, god of the woods, and meeting the queen as she went out a hunting, addressed her extempore. 'Her majesty stayed her horse to favour Sylvanus, fearing lest he should be driven out of breath by following her horse so fast. But Sylvanus humbly besought her highness to go on, declaring, that if his rude speech did not offend her, he could continue this tale to be twenty miles long.' This was courtly enough, but not so much so as his protestation, 'that he had rather be her majesty's footman on earth than a god on horseback in heaven.' Among the characters which Gascoigne had placed to join in complimenting the queen, was Deep Desire, who was placed in a holy bush, and thus addressed her majesty:—

'Stay, stay, your hasty steps,
O Queen without compare;

And hear him talk, whose tasty tongue consumed is with care:

I am that wretch Desire,
whom neither death could daunt,

Nor dole decay, nor dread delay,
nor signed clear enchantment;

Whom neither care could quench,
nor fancy force to change;

And therefore turn'd into this tree,
which sight, perchance, seems strange.

But when the gods of heaven,
and goddesses withall,

Both gods of fields and forest gods,

yea, satyrs, nymphs, and all,

Determined a doly,

by course of free consent,

With wailing words and mourning notes,

your parting to lament:

Then thought they meet to choose me, silly wretch, Desire,

To tell a tale that might bewray

as much as they require.

And hence proceeds, O Queen,

that from this holly-tree

Your learned ears may hear him speak, whom yet you cannot see;

But, Queen, believe me now,

Although I do not swear,

Was never grief, as I could guess,

Which set their hearts so near,

As when they heard the news,

that you, O royal Queen,

Would part from hence; and that to prove it may full well be seen.

For mark what tears they shed

these five days past and gone:

It was no rain of honesty,

it was great floods of moan.

As first Diana wept

such brinish bitter tears,

That all her nymphs did doubt her death,

her face the sign yet bears.

Dame Flora fell on ground,

and bruis'd her woeful breast:

Yea, Pan did break his outen pipes;

Sylvanus and the rest,

Which walk amid these woods,

for grief did roar and cry;

And Jove, to shew what moan he made,

with thundering, crack'd the sky.

O Queen, O worthy Queen,

within these bolts and bills,

Were never heard such grievous groans,

nor seen such woeful wills.

But since they have decreed, that I poor wretch, Desire,

In their behalf shall make their moan,

And comfort thus require:

Vouchsafe, O comely Queen,

yet longer to remain,

Or still to dwell amongst us here;

O Queen, command again

This castle, and the knight which keeps the same for you;

These woods, these waves, these fowls, these fishes.

these deer which are your due:

Live here, good Queen, live here,

you are amongst your friends;

Their comfort comes when you approach,

and when you part, it ends.

What fruits this soil may serve,

thereof you may be sure:

Dame Ceres and dame Flora both will with you still endure.

Diana would be glad to meet you in the chase;

Sylvanus and the forest-gods

would follow you apace;

Yea, Pan would pipe his part,

such dances as he can;

Or else Apollo music make,

and Mars would be your man.

And to be short, as much as gods and men may do,

So much your highness here may find,

with faith and favour too.

But if your noble mind,

resolved by decree,

Be not content, by me, Desire,

persuaded for to be:

Then bend your willing ears unto my willing note.

And hear what song the gods themselves have taught me now by rote.

Give ear, good gracious Queen,

and so you shall perceive

That god's in heaven, and men on earth,

are both such Queens to leave.'

Gascoigne's work is preceded by a tract of uncommon rarity, Whetston's 'Remembrance of the well employed life and godly end of George Gascoigne, Esq.' which is printed intire. This tract, which contains only thirteen pages in the original, and is printed in black letter, formerly belonged to Mr. Malone, who gave forty guineas and a half for it at a public sale. From this really scarce poem, we quote a few stanzas, on account of their excellent moral as well as poetic merit:—

'What is this world? A net to snare the soul.

A mass of sinne, a desert of deceit,

A moment's joy, an age of wretched dole,

A lure from grace, for flesh a loathsome baite,

Unto the minde a cankerworm of care,

Unsure, unjust in rendering man his share;

A place where pride o'erturns the honest minde,

Where rich men joyne to rob the shiftless

wretch,

Where bribing mist the judges eyes doo blinde,

Where parasites the fattest crummes do catch;

Where good deserts (which challenge like reward)

Are overblown with blasts of light regard.

And what is man? Dust, slime, a puff of winde,

Conceiv'd in sin, plant'd in the world with grief,

Brought up with care, till care hath caught his minde,

And then, (till death vouchsafe him some relief),

Day, yea nor night, his care dooth take an end,

To gather gods for other men to spend.

O foolish man, that art in office plaste!

Think whether thou camst, and whether the shall go;

The huge life okes small windes have overcast,

When slender reeds in roughest weathers growe.

Even so pale death oft spares the wretched

wight,

And woundeth you who wallow in delight.'

The notes to the two tracts of which this little volume consists, are very curious and interesting, and discover considerable research and bibliographical erudition; and we cannot withhold our tribute of praise to the liberality of the editor and publisher in re-printing works of such rarity at so moderate a price, as not to confine them to the library of the bibliomaniac, but to make them extensively known.

A Legend of Argyll; or, 'tis a Hundred Years since. 3 vols. 12mo. pp. 967. London, 1821.

SOME months ago, we noticed a well-written novel, entitled 'Glenodon,' which gave a good view of the state of the Highlands previous to 'the 45,' as a true jacobite would call it, and a pretty faithful picture of the memorable events of the period, grafted on a tale of considerable interest. 'Lochiel' is a novel of precisely the same class, and forms a counterpart to the one previously published; the subject is the less formidable rebellion of 1715; and it is treated with equal, if not with superior ability. In addition to the interesting scenes which this insurrection furnishes, the work embraces a variety of characters, so prominent in their day, and even in history, that the author has had the most ample materials for his novel. Among the most important personages in the drama, were the Duke of Argyle and Rob Roy; but these characters have already been so ably drawn by another pen, that the author labours under a disadvantage; he has, therefore, contented himself with describing the outer man of the latter, which traditionally differs from the account of him given by the author of Waverley. Our author thus describes this famous freebooter:—

'His stature was gigantic, his limbs robust, but exquisitely symmetrical, and where left bare between the kilt and hose, covered with long red hair.

'His body was not proportionally stout, but bore all the appearance of great strength, as well as agility; his arms were of an unusual length, and a long red grizzled beard descended on his breast.

'As he acted on this occasion, we believe, for the first time as the chief of the clan, his low Highland bonnet was adorned with the eagle's plume. Beneath the fold of his plaid, he wore a breast-plate and back-piece. He disdained to use any other armour, saying that he despised the man whose hand could not keep his head without the aid of an iron scull-cap; and the other extremities of his person were never thought of as wanting such defence.

'His physiognomy had in it a mixture of ferocity, with arch pleasantry and good humour, as he looked from under his shaggy red eye-brows; and he marched with such rapid strides, as to keep many of his followers in a continual trot. He led a party of grotesque, but sturdy and resolute looking fellows, some of whom were well clad, and shod with the low-heeled shoe and silver buckles, with ruffles at their wristbands and bosoms; these denoted the successful invaders of their neighbour's property; whilst others, not so fortunate, were but meanly dressed, some barefooted, and some wearing the gaidharra, or sandals reaching above the ankle, made of untanned leather. They all, however, wore the Highland dress of the same pattern and shape, and were armed in the same sort. Many ancient and curious pieces of armour might be discerned amidst their ranks, which are, at this day, almost unknown to antiquarian research, such as legs-plents, pesanes, rebarbasses, and other specimens of the "unfeeling armour of old times," of equally obscure denominations.'

There is a well-drawn character in this novel, one Saunders Knox, a conventing schoolmaster and catechist of Auchterblair, who loses no opportunity of detailing all the Latin he remembers since he quitted St. Andrews. Saunders is the first man to inform the Duke of Argyle of the rising of the rebels, which he does by vociferating through the huge horn that hung at the wicket of the castle of Inverara, that 'the holy kirk of Scotland and the whole Protestant religion are in danger, unless the Duke o' Argyle quickly arise, and gird up his loins against the men o' Belial, who come up against him!' The duke opened the postern, and, notwithstanding the alarming annunciation with which Saunders had greeted his ears, he could not suppress a hearty laugh at the grotesque figure of the chivalrous pedagogue of Auchterblair:—

'His tall and thin form was raised to a colossal height, by a helmet or steel cap, in shape somewhat like a bishop's mitre; his body was hamessed in half-armour, and a huge broad sword dangled at his side; his brogues were armed with a pair of rusty antique spurs, and his lower person was clad in a kilt and taitan hose, with a surtout o' hoddenn gray' over all.

'When his grace had in some degree recovered his composure, "the kirk of Scotland and the Protestant religion," he replied, "are built on a rock which cannot be shaken; so dismiss your fears, stable your garron, and join me in the study, where I shall wait to learn the source of this your alarm, and deliberate on the means to obviate its cause. You see Mac Callumore is never discomposed."

"But I am," replied Saunders; "and once again I tell your grace, that this is nae time for stabling o' garrons, but for turning them out; and, instead o' deliberating, the friends of the kirk should be acting. The kirk o' Rome is in the field, and the kirk o' Scotland is in peril. Rob Roy and his clan marched past the school-house o' Auchterblair in the dead o' night, but it was nae for fear of being known, for his pibroch sounded ten miles off."

"Ah!" replied the duke, "Rob Roy in the field! then, Saunders, there is some danger, but property has more to fear than religion, from the excursions of Rob. Neither the church of Rome or of Scotland will find him a zealous crusader, unless, indeed, the spoils of some captured city, or the droves of a strath, are likely to reward his services."

"Rob is a waldy creature, sure enough," rejoined Saunders, "and gold,

I may say, is his god; but he's a Papist inwardly; and, if your grace wo'n't take my warning, ye may repeat o' when its too late. If ye don't smother the flame in time, the bonny towers o' Inverara may, ere long, fall a prey to its fury. Ye should bear in mind—

'Proximus a tectis ignis defenditur ager,' as we used to say at St. Andrew's. It is a cautious and a salutary maxim, my lord duke."

"So it is, Saunders," said the duke; "but I have been always considered as much of a Scipio as a Fabius, at least; and I know too well how to appreciate the motives and the power of Rob Roy, to give way to any serious apprehensions for the safety of either church or state on his account. I shall call up Duncan Buie, the butler, to whose care I shall assign you till the morning, when we may, perhaps, hear further tidings of these marauders, for all my clan are on the alert to watch their motions. Take courage, man! Mac Callumore is your host:—

'Revocate animos, mestumque tororem Mittite.'

is a maxim which, I hope, was not unknown at St. Andrew's in your time; but college maxims, I fear, are in the same predicament as college oaths—reduced, by frequent repetition, to mere matters of form."

"I would have your grace to know," rejoined Knox, "that when religion is in danger, I can be as bauld as my great namesake of old,—

'Wha' never feared the face o' man?'

and he added, with increasing fervour, and casting a significant look on his warlike accoutrements, "when I buckled on this martial panoply, which, by the bye, did good service to the cause at Bothwell Brigg before now, it was with a resolution never to loosen its thongs, or free my person from its icy bonds, unless hewn off piecemeal by the swords of the enemy, till I have either fought for, or otherwise served the good cause in a notable manner."

"And you have done the cause a notable service," rejoined the duke; "you have, like a true and valorous knight, accomplished your vow, in communicating this important intelligence to myself; and let me now beg that you will enlist yourself under my banners—leave all the rest to me."

We shall not enter into any narrative of the incidents of this novel, nor shall we make another extract, but merely content ourselves with stating that the author appears not only intimately acquainted with the history of the period on which he writes, but also very familiar with Scottish manners and customs. The work is well-written, and, as an historical novel, is second only to those of the same class by the celebrated author of 'Waverley.'

Enchiridion; or, a Hand for the One-Handed. By George Webb de Renzey, Captain, H. P. 82d Regiment. 8vo. pp. 60. London, 1821. With the most sincere respect and good wishes for Captain de Renzey, we devoutly wish that we may not have a single reader that may require the assistance of his ingenious work. Should, however, any of them have suffered a similar misfortune with the author, that of losing a right hand, we recommend them, without delay, to avail themselves of the valuable helps which he has contributed for their assistance.

Captain de Renzey, losing his arm at the battle of Vittoria, has since been induced to devote a considerable portion of his time and thoughts to the contriving and perfecting of a set of instruments, such as shall enable the possessor of them to dispense with the attendance of a servant, or that attention from a friend, which would otherwise be absolutely necessary to supply to him those minute arrangements of neatness and economy, which the modes and refinements of social life render indispensable to personal comfort and appearance. The captain's attention has been devoted to constructing a variety of articles for a complete apparatus, sufficient to enable a one-handed person to go through the whole business of the toilet, dispatch eggs at his breakfast with the greatest ease, mend his own pens, brush his hat, &c. sit down in any company with as much ease and independence as the rest of the guests,—

"No fear lest dinner cool"

while he waits for the assistance of his neighbours,—crack his nuts himself at the desert, like his jokes, and play a rubber at whist; provided he knows the game, wherever he may go." Such are a few of the advantages to be gained by Captain de Renzey's Enchiridion, which will recommend itself to all who may require its assistance.

MALE AND FEMALE EMPLOYMENTS.

It has ever been the praise of England, that as the weaker sex are excluded, more strictly perhaps than in most other European countries, from all the walks of profit or honour, an amends is made to them by their being excused from those more laborious offices, which are neither fitted to the weakness of their frame, nor the delicacy of their habits and manners. This state of society has been, in some degree, attempted to be disturbed; and among the premiums of the Bath Agricultural Society, in 1805, there is one for

* From the Perey Anecdotes, No. XX. Anecdotes of ladies.

'women ploughing.' What might be the motive of this singular attempt to give a new direction to the industry of one half the species, it is not easy to determine; for, notwithstanding the consumption of human lives by our fleets and armies, and our devouring manufactures, there are still men sufficient left for the purpose of agriculture.

It was esteemed one of the most unequivocal signs of the exhausted and miserable state to which France was reduced in the latter days of Louis XIV. that in many provinces they had only women left for the offices of husbandry; and in all ages and countries, to have only women to till the ground, or gather in the fruits of the earth, has been thought to present a striking picture of desolation. The country is poor, whatever else is plentiful, where men are scarce. This scarcity does not exist in England; and the evil is, that the men have usurped the departments of the women. If we ask where are the robust frames that ought to be toiling in the winter's frost and summer's sun, we shall find that some of them are stationed in warm carpeted rooms, handing tea to a circle of idle listless ladies and gentlemen; others are lifting up and down their long legs, and painfully trying to accommodate their pace to the short strip of a delicate young lady, who walks before them, or the slow pace of an infirm old one: some are carrying out lap dogs to air; some with white sleeves and aprons making cheese-cakes; and hundreds are stationed the live-long day behind counters, sorting thread, and measuring lace and ribbons. Let, then, the servants' halls give up the idle that are in them, and the pastry-cooks' and haberdashers' shops the idle that are in them, and there will be a sufficiency of stout recruits for the plough, without taking the women from their appropriate employments. Indeed they cannot attend to both; and if the wives are to be in the field, their husbands must, in return, wash the linen, rock the cradle, and dress the dinner.

Of the consequences of such an exchange of employment, we have an admirable picture in an old Scotch ballad, called 'The Wife of Auchtermuchty:—

'In Auchtermuchty dwelt a man,

An husband, as I heard it tawd,

Wha weel could tillie out a can,

And neither luvit hunger nor cauld;

And ance it fell upon a day,

He yokit his pleuch upon the plain,

But soon the storm would let him stay,

Sair blew the day with wind and rain.'

Loosening his oxen from the plough, he returns home; and envying the snug warmth which his wife enjoys by the fire side, he insists that she shall to-morrow go out to the field, and he will attend to the domestic duties. The good dame at once consents, on condition that it shall be a binding bargain to go to the labours of the field day about. The account of the first day's trial is told with great humour.

After the wife has gone to the plough, the husband drives out the geese, seven in number, to feed; the fox comes past and carries off five of them; on hearing their cries, he runs out, when taking advantage of his absence, the calves break loose, and save him the trouble of milking the cows. On his return, he sits down to spin; but stooping down too near the grate, the lint takes flame, and sets fire to the chimney, which he has no small difficulty in quenching. He then tries the churn; but after toiling at it for an hour, 'the sorrow a crap of butter he gat;' on his abandoning the butter-making in despair, the sow comes in, and is beginning to lap up the un churned milk, when seizing the churn-staff to drive it away, he kills, by mistake, the two godings which the fox had left. It is now time to go and 'take up the bairns;' but here such a scene awaits him, that—

—'Up he gat on a know-head,

On her to cry, on her to shout;

She heard him, and she heard him not,

But stoutly steered the stots about.

She drove the day unto the night;

She lood'd the pleuch, and syne cam hame;

She fand all wrang that suld been right,

I trow the mon thoct meikle shame.

'Quoth he, my office I forsake,

For all the hail days of my life;

For I wuld put a house to wreck,

Had I been twenty days, guid wife.

Quoth she, weel might ye bruk your place,

For truly I sail ne'er accept it;

Quoth he, fey'd I fe' the lark's face,

But ye ye may be blyth to get it.

'The up she gat a meikle mug,

And the guid mon made to the door;

Quoth he, dame I sail hald my tongue,

For an we fecht I'll get the war.

Quoth he, when I forsok the pleuch,

I trow I wuld forsok my skill;

Then I wuld to my pleuch again,

For I and this house will never do weel.'

The poet of nature, Thomson, has described, in glowing colours, the hay-making lass, placed by the side of her lover, with all—

'Her kindled graces burning o'er her cheek.'

But it is a question if he would have been equally pleased with the idea of a sturdy lass bending over a plough, and whistling to the horse. But, indeed, before the effect can well be ascertained, it should be known with more accuracy what is intended; for it does not appear, whether the Bath agriculturalists intended the female to guide the plough, or to be yoked to it. The latter, though somewhat novel, would not be altogether unprejudiced, since we are informed by a late writer, Mr. Barrow, that in China, a country which does not yield in politeness even to Bath, it is not uncommon to see a husbandman plough with a woman and an ass yoked together. This is an age of improvements; and if the Chinese custom were adopted, it would, no doubt, be a great saving in the labour of that noble quadruped the horse; and would correspond to the scale of excellence of some philosophers, who hold that man is of a more perfect and beautiful form than his female companion, and a horse more perfect and beautiful than either of them.

HUDIBRISTIC QUOTATION.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—In the last, and, I believe, in a preceding number of the Literary Gazette, appeared some observations on a well-known couplet, often supposed to form a part of Hudibras, but which, it is almost needless to add, is not to be found throughout the whole of that celebrated poem. I allude to the lines,

'For be that fights and runs away,
Will live to fight another day.'

Butler has, indeed, two or three passages somewhat similar, and of which, the one that comes nearest, is the following:—

'For those that fly, may fight again,
Which he can never do that's slain.'

Now, the fact is, that the couplet, thus erroneously ascribed to the author of Hudibras, occurs in a small volume of Miscellaneous Poems, by Sir John Mennes, written in the reign of Charles II. and which is now become extremely scarce. I have not the book at hand, but have no doubt of having found the lines there, as I took a note of the circumstance at the time. And to this I may add, that the original of this couplet may be traced even to Demosthenes, who has the following expression:—

ἡ ἀνὰ οὐρανὸν καὶ πάλιν μαχεσθῆναι, of which the English lines are almost a literal translation.

If you think these remarks worthy of insertion, I shall be happy to see them in your next Chronicle; and I may hereafter trouble you again with respect to some other popular and disputed quotations. OROVER.

ON THE

PUNISHMENT OF SCOLDS.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—In turning over one of the early numbers of your interesting journal*, I met with an ingenious article in defence of scolding, on account of its great antiquity; but, as neither time nor precedent can make that right which is morally wrong, I shall not attempt to combat the arguments of your correspondent, but shall, as an appendix to this paper, or as an antidote to its effects, make a few observations on this subject, and on the means formerly resorted to for the punishment of scolds;

namely, the ducking or cucking-stool, which was formerly as common in every parish in England, as the stocks or the whipping-post. Your correspondent has traced scolding to the gods; I cannot, I confess, carry its punishment to such high authority, and yet it has some claims on the score of antiquity.

The cucking-stool, called also a tumbrel, tribuck, tribucket, and a thewe, was an engine invented for the punishment of scolds and anquet women, by ducking them in the water, after having placed them in a stool or chair fixed at the end of a long pole, by which they were immersed in some muddy or dirty pond. The ducking-stool is of great antiquity; Bourne says it was in use in this country in the time of the Saxons, by whom it was described to be, 'cathedra in qua rixosæ mulieres sedentes aquis demerguntur.' It was a punishment also inflicted anciently, upon brewers and bakers transgressing the laws.

In the 'Promptorium Parvulorum' MS. Harl. 221. Brit. Mus. 'ESYN or CUCKYN' is interpreted by Stercoris, and in the Domesday Survey, in the account of the city of Chester, vol. 1. fo. 262. b. we read, 'Vir sive mulier falsam mensuram in civitate faciens deprehensus, iiii. solid. emendab. Similiter malam cervisiam faciens aut in CATHEDRA ponebatur STERCORIS, aut iiii. solid. dab. prepositis.' And in the Regiam Majestatem, by Sir John Skene, this punishment occurs as having been used anciently in Scotland: under Barrow Laves, chap. lxi. speaking of browsters, i. e. 'women quha breues aill to be sauld,' it is said, 'gif she makes gude aill, that is sufficient; but gif she makes evill aill, contrair to the use and consuetude of the burgh, and is convict thereof, she shall pay one unlaw of aucht shillings, or sal suffer the justice of the burgh, that is, she shall be put upon the cuck stule, and the aill sal be distributed to the pure folk.'

Borlase, in his Natural History of Cornwall, p. 303, tells us, 'Among the punishments inflicted in Cornwall, of old time, was that of the cucking-stool, a seat of infamy, where strumpets and scolds were condemned to abide the derision of those that passed by, for such time as the bailiffs of manors, which had the privilege of such jurisdiction, did appoint.'

Mr. Lysons, in his Environs of London, vol. ii. p. 244, mentions, that at a court of the manor of Edgeware, held in the year 1552, the inhabitants were presented for not having a tumbrel and a ducking-stool, by which it would appear that there was a difference between them; and the following extract from Cowell's Interpreter is in confirmation of the difference:—'Georgius Grey, comes Cantuariensis in maner de Bushton and Aytoun punire delinquentes contra assisam paniset cervisie, per tres vices per amerciamta, et quarta vice piores per pillorium, braciatores per tumbrellam et rixatrices per thewe, hoc est ponere eas super scabellum vocat, a cucking-stool. Pl. in litiu, apud. Cestr. 14 Hen. VII.'

Misson, who suffered no popular custom to escape his notice, in his Travels in England, thus describes the ducking-stool:—

'Chaise la maniere de punir les femmes querelleuses et debauchées est assez plaisante en Angleterre.

'On attache une chaise à bras à l'extrémité de deux especes de solives longues de douze ou quinze pieds et dans un éloignement parallele, en sorte que ces deux pieces de bois embrassent par leur deux bouts voisins, la chaise qui est entre deux, et qui y est attachée par le côté comme avec un essieu, de telle maniere, qu'elle a du Jeu, et qu'elle demeure toujours dans l'état naturel et horizontal auquel une chaise doit être afin qu'on puisse s'asseoir dessus, soit qu'on l'éleve soit qu'on l'abaisse. On dresse un poteau sur le bord d'un étang ou d'une rivière, et sur ce poteau on pose presque en equilibrium, la double piece de bois à une des extremités de laquelle la chaise se trouve au dessus de l'eau. On met la femme dans cette chaise et on la plonge ainsi autant de fois qu'il a été ordonné, pour rafraichir un peu sa chaleur immodérée.'

Mr. Lysons gives us a curious extract from the churchwarden's and chamberlain's accounts, at Kingston-upon-Thames, in the year 1572, which contains a bill of expenses for making one of these cucking-stools, which, he says, must have been much in use formerly, as there are frequent entries of money paid for its repairs. He adds, that this arbitrary attempt at laying an embargo on the female tongue, has long since been laid aside. The following is the extract:—

'1572. The making of the	l	s	d.

These stools seem to have been in common use when Gay wrote his Pastorals; and they are thus described in the Dumps, 1, 165. —

'I'll speed me to the pond, where the high stool
On the long plank hangs o'er the muddy pool,
That stool the dread of every scolding queen,' &c.

The stool is represented in a cut annexed to the Dumps, designed and engraved by Lud. de Guernier.

There is also a wooden cut of one in the frontispiece of the popular penny history of 'The Old Woman of Ratcliff Highway.'

In 'Miscellaneous Poems,' &c. by Benjamin West, of Weedon Beck, Northamptonshire. 8vo. 1780, p. 84, is preserved a copy of verses, said to have been written near sixty years ago, entitled the 'Ducking-Stool.' The description runs thus:—

'There stands, my friend, in yonder pool,
An engine call'd a ducking-stool:
By legal pow'r commanded down,
The joy and terror of the town,
If jarring females kindle strife,
Give language foul, or lug the coif;
If noisy dames should once begin
To drive the house with horrid din,
Away you cry, you'll grace the stool;—
We'll teach you how your tongue to rule.
The fair offender fills the seat,
In sullen pomp,—profoundly great,
Down in the deep the stool descends,—
But here, at last, we miss our ends;
She mounts again, and rages more
Than ever vex'd did before.
So, throwing water on the fire,
Will not make it burn the higher.
If so, my friend, pray let her take
A second turn into the lake;
And, rather than your patience lose,
Thrice and again repeat the dose.
No brawling wives, no furious wenches,—
No fire so hot but water quenches.
In Prior's skillful lines, we see:
For these another recipe:
A certain lady, we are told,
(A lady, too, and yet a scold,)
Was very much relieved, you'll say,
By water, yet a different way;
Amuseful of the same she'd take,
Sure not to scold, if not to speak.'

A note informs us, 'To the honour of the fair sex in the neighbourhood of R*, this machine has been taken down (as useless) several years.'

In the 'New Help to Discourse,' 3d edit. 1684, pt. 2dG, we have the following report on the subject of the ducking-stool:—'Some gentlemen travelling, and coming near to a town, saw an old woman spinning, near the ducking-stool; one, to make the company merry, asked the good woman what that chair was for? Said she, 'you know what it is.' Indeed, said he, 'not I, unless it be the chair you use to spin in.' No, no,' said she, 'you know it to be otherwise;'

have you not heard that it is the cradle your good mother hath often lay in?'

How long this wholesome corrective, the ducking-stool, has been in disuse in this country, I know not; but that it was not always effectual, appears from the records of the King's Bench, where we find, that in the year 1681, Mrs. Finch, a most notorious scold, who had been thrice ducked previously, for scolding, was a fourth time convicted for the offence, when the court sentenced her to pay a fine of three marks, and to be imprisoned until it was paid.

From an American newspaper of 1818, I find that a public ducking is still the punishment inflicted on a common scold, according to the law of Baltimore; and that one Mary Davis, who had been indicted for the offence, was found guilty by the jury, after a consultation of an hour and a half.

While on the subject, it may not be irrelevant to notice another punishment for scolding women, culled the branks. They have an artifice at Newcastle-under-Line and Walsall, says Dr. Plott*, for correcting of scolds, which it does too, so effectually and so very safely, that I look upon it as much to be preferred to the cucking-stool, which not only endangers the health of the party, but also gives the tongue liberty 'twixt every dip, to neither of which this is at all liable; it being such a bridle for the tongue, as not only quite deprives them of speech, but brings shame for the transgression, and humility thereupon before it is taken off; which being put upon the offender by order of the magistrate, and fastened with a padlock behind, she is led round the town by an officer, to her shame, nor is it taken off till after the party begins to shew all external signs imaginable, of humiliation and amendment.

Dr. Plott, in a copper-plate annexed, gives a representation of a pair of branks. They still preserve a pair in the town court at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, where the same custom once prevailed.

It appears from 'Gardiner's England's Grievance, in relation to the coal trade,' that in the time of the commonwealth, the magistrates of Newcastle-upon-Tyne punished scolds with the branks, and drunkards by making them carry a tub, with holes in the sides for the arms to pass through, called the drunkard's cloak, through the street of the town.

REMARKABLE DEATHS.

PLURIMA MORITUS TRAGO.

THE recent death of the most extraordinary, if not the greatest man, of the present age, of a disease, considered by the learned in these matters as an unique in nosology, has induced us to recal to mind some of the most uncommon deaths which are to be found on the pages of history. We have accordingly thrown together the few following, which relate, for the most part, to some of the most celebrated names of antiquity. To do full justice to the subject, would far exceed the bounds of our publication:—

—'adeo sunt multa loquacem
Delosare valent Fabium.'

We shall begin with Valerian, a Roman of distinction, who, being taken prisoner by Sapor, King of Persia, was by him stuffed, and afterwards preserved as a curiosity. A similar end is also ascribed to one Mance, at the hands of the same factious monarch, who seems to have had a singular taste in matters of exira. Gibbon is our authority for the first instance, but we forget by whom the latter is related. The exit of Chrysippus, the stoic of Tarsus, who, among sundry eccentric opinions, was wont to maintain the propriety of eating dead bodies rather than burying them, was not less strange than the tenets he espoused. For he is recorded to have died in his 80th year, in a violent fit of laughter, in consequence of seeing an ass eat figs off a silver platter. The same sort of fate is appropriated, by Valerius Maximus, to Philemon, the Greek poet. By the way, with reference to the singular doctrine entertained by Chrysippus, it may not be mal apropos to notice what is related by Juvenal, of an unfortunate Egyptian, who, being killed in the heat of a verbal controversy, was actually devoured by his antagonist on the spot. This, a punster would say, was getting the worst of the argument with a vengeance. Of a kin with the story above told of Sapor, is that ascribed to Cambyzes, who, upon the malversation of one of his judges, caused him to be staid alive, and his skin stuffed as a seat for his son, who was condemned to fill the post of his unfortunate father. Cambyzes defended this piece of cruelty by observing, that he had resorted to it in order that the very place, from which the new judge administered the laws, should keep him constantly in mind of his duty. And certainly, under the reign of such an individual, the reward must have proved most effectual. The death of father Le Vacher, a Frenchman, who was, in the year 1682, fired from a mortar by the Algerines, is, perhaps, a match for either of the foregoing. To these we may add the extraordinary exits of several of the most eminent Greek poets, as they are related by Valerius Maximus, who, in his chapter 'De Mortibus non Vulgaribus,' has also collected several other remarkable instances. To begin with the prince of poets,—he tells us, that Homer died of grief because he could not solve a question proposed to him by a fisherman. Æschylus, he says, was killed by the fall of a tortoise upon his head, being bald and exposed to the rays of the sun, an eagle had mistaken for a stone, and accordingly dropped the tortoise upon it, in order that, by thus breaking the shell, he might the more readily devour his prey. Euripides was torn to pieces by dogs; and Sophocles died of joy after being declared victor in a poetical contest, after a long and doubtful dispute. The death of Philemon has already been mentioned; and Pindar died in a school-room, reclining his head on the breast of a boy, who had been affectionately attached to him; and so tranquil was his departure, that it was not discovered until the school was about to be dismissed. And, to close the list, Anacreon, as every one knows, was choked by a grape-stone. We will merely remark, in conclusion, that, according to history, scarcely one of the Roman Emperors died a natural death.

O.

PICTURES, PERSONS, AND THINGS.

While some we ridicule, we some commend,
And use the mean connected with the end.

THE coxcomb stands in effeminate gestures, admiring the caricature of a peasant; and, in return, the peasant delights himself to think how cleverly the coxcomb's folly is represented. The footman boasts that his master imitates him in the cut of his clothes, and imagines an epaulet honourable since it is worn by officers of the army and navy. Miss Pique is quite horrified that Fanny, the cottager's daughter, should presume to go to church in a white frock with tucks, even admitting it to have been given her by the squire's lady for diligent behaviour and meritorious services; while Fanny is not a little gratified to receive a dip from some innocent child, who mistakes her for a young lady. I remember a gentleman, who, desiring to be taken for a clergyman, attired himself in black, wore a bush wig and hat, similar to that which we have seen in the old prints of Frederic of Prussia; he once rode in a chaise upwards of ten miles, into a part of the country to which the bishop was hourly expected, and exulted in the idea, from the notice he attracted, of being identified for the worthy prelate. If young ladies smile with our venerable grandfathers and speak kindly to them, they throw the golden-tipped cane aside, and, like cold weather, return again into mild.

Characters re-live, though few are found who figured in the days of Steele, Bickerstaff, and Addison; and many who are notoriously eccentric in the present day, will, like bulbous roots, be transplanted into the soil of a century hence, with new varieties of folly and vanity. The garden of literature is full of weeds; the most industrious critics cannot extirpate them;—exotics are cultivated in scientific ground, but too many, like tulips, are gay without perfume. Men are blind to their own failings, and apply them to others which should improve themselves. Laughter and mirth are born and fostered by those who want reflection, and a vain love of personal advantages prevents them from becoming sterling in value and useful in society. I would not be understood to discourage sprightliness, by which health is promoted, and, perhaps, secured. The medium of joy, by the assistance of wisdom, will counterbalance the weight of sorrow. The yoke of care might be easily borne, if it were the one which our Creator has designed us; but we, by our instability and mutable actions, make it heavy; and, alas! how many sink into an untimely grave by its distressing pressure! So fields of flowers are destroyed by the irresistible blast. The lament which affection inspires, softens our feeling and endears us while we follow the departed from earth to heaven; but then this carries its consolations and sympathies, its instructions and improvements, its subductions, preparations, and, finally, consummations. Would we were more disposed to fix the throne of happiness within our reach, whereon we might set the spirit of harmony to sway her sceptre continually over us. Would that we strove to be at peace with each other; and while we respect the laws of our country, we should maintain dignity, which is not exposed to servile department, and keep content, which is not innovated by anarchy. Rational beings are deserving of the free and liberal privileges of nature, and we should be protected but when we expose ourselves to error and shame. Like the light we see and the air we breathe, when our thoughts are pure, we should have the generous use of our faculties. We are told, 'to be good is to be happy;' hypocrisy is an obstacle to the attainment of it. Slandering our neighbours, on one view of the question, and without just evidence deciding on the other, is another obstacle. It is the foible of the mind, impregnated with pride, which deserves satire, and not the imperfections of nature. A deformed person may be good and happy, though unfit to represent the fair proportions and fine specimens of the noblest workmanship of the human race.

Biography.

HENRY EDRIDGE, Esq. R. A. F. S. A.

THIS amiable man and excellent artist was born at Paddington, in the year 1768; his father, who was in trade in the parish of St. James's, Westminster, died at the age of 44, leaving his widow, with five children, rather inadequately provided for. His mother was a woman of superior mind, and, in the early education of children, maternal influence most frequently forms the character, to her may be attributed the sense of propriety and correctness of conduct, which so conspicuously marked her son's progress through life.

Mr. Edridge was the youngest child; but one; and having very early shown an attachment to the Fine Arts, his mother was induced, by the advice of her friends, to place him, at the age of 14, with Mr. Pether, an artist, well known as a mezzotint engraver and painter of landscape. Two years after his apprenticeship, he was admitted a student in the Royal Academy, where he soon distinguished himself, and in 1786 obtained a medal for the best drawing of an academy figure. While studying at the academy, his talents attracted the attention, and procured him the regard of the then president, Sir Joshua Reynolds, whose pictures he was in the habit of copying in miniature for his own improvement. Upon one occasion, Sir Joshua was so much pleased with his performance, that he desired to have the copy, which of course was readily offered for his acceptance; that, however, was declined, and the young artist having been prevailed on to name a price, Sir Joshua not only paid him nearly double the amount, but meeting him a few days afterwards, insisted upon making him a still further payment, observing that he had since sold the drawing to a nobleman for a considerable profit, and was therefore debtor for the difference.

Mezzotint engraving being in no way suited to Mr. Edridge's taste, an arrangement was made with his master to permit him to study and practise miniature painting, to which branch of art he afterwards exclusively applied himself. During his apprenticeship he suffered a severe affliction in the loss of his mother, who had ever been to him a most tender and affectionate parent, and whose memory he constantly, to his latest breath, fondly and gratefully cherished.

In the year 1789, Mr. Edridge married a lady from Taunton of the name of Smith, and established himself as a portrait painter, in Dufour's Place, Golden Square, in which almost secluded situation he raised himself to the greatest celebrity, proving that merit, such as his, did not require the adventitious aid of outward circumstances to ensure its success.

Mr. Edridge's earliest works were miniatures on ivory; afterwards he made his portraits on paper, with black lead and Indian ink; to these he added back-grounds, which were beautifully diversified, and drawn with great taste; after continuing this practice several years, he discontinued Indian ink, and adopted water colours, still finishing his drawings slightly, except the heads, which were always remarkable for their force, brilliancy, and truth. It was of late years only that he made those elaborately high-finished pictures on paper, uniting the depth and richness of oil paintings with the freedom and freshness of water colours, and of which there is perhaps scarcely a nobleman's family in England without some specimen. His acquisition of this latter style is to be attributed to the study of Sir Joshua Reynolds's best works, which he omitted no opportunity of copying, and thereby not only obtained a collection of the most beautiful and faithful copies of that great master that have ever perhaps been made, but rendered the improvements of his own original works remarkably conspicuous.

In 1801, Mr. Edridge removed from Dufour's Place to Margaret Street, where he continued to practise his profession till his death. He had two children: the eldest, a daughter, who died May 1, 1807, in the 17th year of her age; the other, a son, who died July 20, 1820, at almost the precise age of his sister. He was a youth of great promise, and his premature death was an affliction from which Mr. Edridge never wholly recovered. He had watched over his son with an unwearied solicitude, which none can appreciate but those who feel the strength of parental anxiety, and have mourned the loss of an only child. It would be difficult to describe the feelings and sufferings he experienced at his loss, and though he bowed with submission to the will of heaven, his constitution sunk under the blow. For many years previous to his last illness, Mr. Edridge had occasionally laboured under considerable difficulty of respiration, which in January last greatly increased, and while suffering under a most distressing oppression of breath, he was attacked by spasms in the chest, from which he endured extreme torture. For above three months he had few intervals of ease, but during all that time his mind retained its accustomed vigour, and his fortitude in sustaining his affliction, together with his christian resignation to the will of God, was the admiration of those who witnessed it.

Mr. Edridge had always an exquisite taste for the picturesque beauties of landscape, but the extent of his practice in drawing portraits, prevented the devotion of much time to this his favourite pursuit, until after the death of his son, when having no longer a motive for adhering to the lucrative part of his profession, he indulged his inclination, and the drawings which he afterwards made from various scenes of nature, are most admirable. In 1817, and again in 1819, he visited France, where he found ample materials for the exercise of his taste, in the picturesque buildings of Paris, and still more interesting scenery of Normandy; the drawings made from these sketches, which were exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1820, as well as those of the present year, leave us to regret that this branch of art had not, at least, shared a greater portion of his earlier time.

The late Mr. Hearnse was the master from whom Mr. Edridge first acquired his taste and skill for sketching landscape scenery; a master, whose best works will ever be esteemed so long as there is any admiration for fidelity, united to the best qualities of the art. There was a timidity, however, in Mr. Hearnse's manner, which seemed to restrain him from venturing on those bold effects and strong transitions of chiaro scuro, that have since his time been the admiration of the public. In this respect, Mr. Edridge stepped far beyond his master. Though he did not practise it, Mr. Edridge, about two years ago, painted three pictures in oil colours; two of them were small landscapes, and the third was a copy from Teniers.

He was elected an associate of the Royal Academy of Arts, in November, 1820, and no better or more grateful tribute could be paid, either to his talents as an artist or his worth as a man, than the feeling and appropriate eulogy pronounced to his memory by the president, at the annual academy dinner, which took place immediately after his death.

As a man, Mr. Edridge possessed those amiable and endearing qualities which gained him the affection of all who knew him. His moral character was pure and unblemished; to the strictest integrity and benevolence of heart, he united the most polished and gentlemanly manners. He had an eloquence and suavity of speech, joined to a sportiveness of wit, that rendered his society extremely delightful; his thoughts were conceived with vigour, and expressed with the happiest propriety; and there never, perhaps, was a man more entitled, from his accomplishments, high judgment, and justness of sentiment, to move in the polished circles of life. In this society he was courted and caressed, and was distinguished by the friendship and affection of many in the highest rank, which continued with unabated kindness to the hour of his death.

Mr. Edridge died at his house, in Margaret Street, Cavendish Square, on Monday, the 23d of April, 1821, in the 63d year of his age.

Original Poetry.

TO THE THISTLE.

Badge of a people high in arms—
(In love, in song, renowned ay;
Whose very NAME thy bosom warms)
Dear theme of many a raptur'd lay!
Heaven bade thy rugged form advance
And bloom beneath a southern sky
Proud as the fleur-de-lis of France, thy Or England's rose of thimble-eyed
When on thy hills the Roman power
In Roman or Saxon days.

Thy image lent the hero's sword
A sterner glance—a keener edge.
And onward where the Wallace fought,
Or Brus in kingly terror rode,
Thy presence 'mong the South 'ron brought
The presence of the incensed god.
And still thy sons, unchanging, feel
Th' unconquerable thirst of flame—
The inborn love of Scotia's weal
Entwin'd for ever with thy name.
Badge of a people high in arms!
(In love, in song, renowned as;
Whose very name thy bosom warms)
Dear theme of many a raptur'd lay!

STANZAS,

Addressed to the Portrait of ———.

POOR representative of her who taught My heart to know its first wild throb of love,—

O'er thee I bend, although thou art not fraught
With her fine charms all equal far above!
A loveliness to which her lover's heart
Does higher justice than the painter's art.
O'er thee I bend in sorrow's dark'ning hour,
And woo the aid her memory should give,
To nerve my soul with firm and gentle power,
When hope and confidence have cou'd to live;
Would I could bear like her each bitter pang, Pardoning, like her, the source from which it sprang.

On thee I look at the lone hour of night
When all around is gloomy, dark, and still,
On thee I look, and visions of delight
Fleeting and frail, my charmed bosom fill, Thinking of other times, when 'sle whose shade
Thou art, my bower of blisses blest and made.

These happier hours are gone for ever now,
And all that of their mystery remains,
Is the remembrance of a plighted vow,
And lost affection's thrilling joys and pains;
Yet these are thoughts that ne'er may know deceit,
That may not change, and cannot pass away.

IMPROMPTU,

On meeting Miss B, 1814 March, 1820.
O HAPPY day! wherein my eyes were blest
With thy sweet image, which, howe'er impres'd
Deep on the tablet of my faithful heart,
Yet gain'd I for the living counterpart;
To see again that mild expressive eye,
Which spoke a heart of tenderest sympathy —
Again on that lov'd sybil-like form to gaze, Whose beauty struck my young heart with ecstasy,
And still the sweet remembrance round me hung.

Prompting to say unworthy to be sung,—
Thou' long the dear original, from my sight
Absent,—but not forgotten—held its light!

Since last we met, how many months, alas,
Hath old Time borrow'd—many more must pass,
Ere I can hope my passion to declare,
And seek from thee a solace to my care.
Yet still preserve my memory in thy soul,
(Till fate shall bid a few seasons roll,
Thy fate hath wrought a happier destiny,
And made me always worthy of thee.)

Metought the sickly hand of pale disease Had robb'd thee of (what still combin'd to please
In thy all lovely face) the roscate hue,
Which wou'd deck thy blooming cheek—beshrew
The pilfering knave?—but, ah! he could not steal
Thy beauteous eye-glance, powerful appeal
To finest feelings of the human breast,—
A whole vocabulary there express!

Adieu! sweet maid, when next thou walk'st abroad,
Towards thee may favouring Cupid guide my road;
For oh! believe me, when by heav'n I swear, Phæbus shines brighter—purer breathes the air.

More cheerily the feather'd warbler's sing—
Thy smile creation's charms enlivening! * * M.

TO THE GRECIAN TROOPS,

After a Victory obtained over the Turks.

O WHERE is the heart that lies still at the tidings
Of victory crowning the brows of the brave,
And changing the scorn of oppression's revil-
ings,
To the cry of lament o'er her hireling's grave!
O tell to that heart how the hot squadrons
dashing,
With eyes looking death, swept the foe from the plain!
O tell to that heart how their sabres' wild flashing
Lit the path of her lovers to liberty's fane!
Then, then, if it swell not, 'tis dead to each feeling,
That honour and freedom have cherish'd and blest!

And may that life fount, while its coldness
reveling,
Be frozen by death in its cowardly breast!
Fear not!—though the fortunes of gladness and sorrow
May follow each other like sunshine and shade—
The clouds will soon pass, and the sun of the morning
Rise splendid in glory that never shall fade.

Your comrades have won—your hearts bound at the hearing—
Then on to your tyrants with slaughter and flame,

And show, while the standard of liberty rearing,
'Tis bleach'd in their blood from each vestige of shame.

Let ev'ry god sword win its hero's exemption,
And sever the chains of his son and his sire,
Till each patriot voice joins the shout of redemption,
Round the burning of slavery's funeral pyre.

THE BIRTH-DAY.

ANOTHER year has roll'd along,
Since last I rais'd my annual song,
On Esther's natal day;
Since then I've heav'd full many a sigh,
And grief has often fill'd mine eyes,
As past the year away.
Oh, Esther! wou'd'st thou truly know
What feelings in this bosom glow,
In faithful love to thee

Oh take this broken heart of mine,
And give me, love, that heart of thine,
And give it but to me.

Thou' once thou gav'st me cause to grieve,
Thy faithfulness I now believe,
And still thy form adore;
But should I find thee faithless grown,
I'd cast thee from me with a frown,
And never see thee more.

That other arms should round thee twine—
That other lips should press on thine,
And tales of love declare;
That thou should'st listen to the lay,
And me forget when far away—
The thought I cannot bear.

For I do love thee more than life,
Do love thee more than ever wife
By man was ever lov'd:
The pensive night—the restless day—
The sighs which chase my joys away,
My love have often prov'd.

Full well I know that blessed day
When first I saw thee, lady gay,
And blushing at eighteen!
And tho' three years thy form I've known,
To me it still is lovelier grown,
Than when it first was seen!

And may'st thou never ever be
As blest, as happy, and as free
From grief, as thou art fair;
May years of joy succeed to this—
May stores of every earthly bliss
Be Esther's lot to share.
And, Oh! be mine the fate to know
That thy affections warmer glow
To me, and me alone!
May future years my Esther find
As faithful, friendly, and as kind,
As now at twenty-one.

MODES OF EXPRESSION.

AUTHORS are sometimes extremely careless in expressing themselves;
others pique themselves on a quaintness or an oddity, which is more honoured in the breach than the observance; for example,

Roger Ascham, describing Lady
Jane Grey, expresses himself thus:—
'At the time,' says he, 'that the rest of the company were gone out a hunting, and to their other amusements, I found, O Jupiter and all the gods! this divine young lady reading the Phædra of the divine Plato,' &c. Surely there was no occasion to disturb Jupiter and the conclave of Olympus, by calling on them thus abruptly.

Tom Brown has a curious figure of speech: satirising some person, he says, 'he is as dull as a lawfully begotten citizen's eldest son.'

The reformer Calvin's mode of expression was rather coarse. Luther had in one of his writings called him a disclaimer; and Calvin, to justify himself from such a title, breaks out thus:—
'Your whole school is nothing but a stinking sty of pigs. Dog! do you understand me? Do you understand me, madman? Do you understand me you great beast?

Sir Thomas More's life of Edward V., published in the year 1641, is entitled by a 'Pityful Life of Edward V.'

Lord Gardenstone has an odd way of expressing himself. 'I have remarked,' says he, 'that the men and the women, and also the horses, are larger and handsomer in Champagne and Burgundy than any where else.'

Home, the celebrated author of Douglas, seemed to have been very partial to alliteration; for example:—
'My father feeds his flocks, a frugal swain—
But when the matter matched his mighty mind—

But with the froward he was fierce as fire.'

'Sailors say, we carried away ourizen mast; a thing they are no way inclined to do, particularly in a storm.

Statesmen and lawyers are sometimes peculiar in their modes of expression. The Rev. Commissary Blair, who projected the college in the province of Virginia, and was in England to solicit benefactions and a charter, relates, that the queen (Mary), in the king's absence, having ordered the Attorney-General (Seymour) to draw up the charter, which was to be given with 2000*l.* in money, he opposed the grant, saying, that the nation was engaged in an expensive war, that the money was wanted for better purposes, and he did not see the least occasion for a college in Virginia. Blair represented to him, that its intention was to educate and qualify young men for the ministry of the Gospel much wanted there, and begged Mr. Attorney-General would consider, that the Virginians had souls to be saved as well as the people of England. 'Souls!' said he, 'd—n your souls! plant tobacco.'

The gentle Doctor South could, in argumentative allusion, use such terms as 'hell and d—nation proof!' which is certainly going as far as a point can well be carried.

Kneeling on your knees, may be found in one part of the Prayer-book.

Our old translators of the Bible often imiter, 'he answered and said.'

How came the strange expression of 'enjoying a bad state of health?' of all enjoyments this is one we are most anxious to get rid of; yet Giles Jobbins said his wife enjoyed a bad state of health for many years.

By the bye, one of the most common queries of late, made in the way of satisfaction, is very unbecomingly, however idiomatic it may be; we mean that of 'how do you do?'

'I have heard of a general officer,' says Walpole, 'who may be classed with the Archbishop of Grenada.' When he was about ninety years of age, he was disturbed with the noise of some young officers, diverting themselves with some girls. 'Is this, gentlemen, the example that I gave you.'

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—The principal novelty in the drama of this week, is the return of Mr. Kean to this theatre, the scene of his first and greatest triumph. In our last number, we prepared our readers to expect his return, by inserting his farewell to America; and we shall not now enter into any observations on the propriety or impropriety of Mr. Kean's quitting his transatlantic friends so abruptly. We may, however, say, without any fear of contradiction, that whatever Mr. Kean's talents may be, they are such as should not be permitted to 'waste their sweetness on the desert air' of the New World, while the old one is still ready so justly to appreciate and so liberally to reward them.

As soon as Mr. Ellistown heard that Mr. Kean might be expected in town on Monday, he announced him to play that and every other evening in the week. There was something very injudicious in thus hurrying an actor before the public, without suffering him to have a single day's repose after a long sea-voyage, and travelling by land, with all rapidity, a couple of hundred miles. The folly, too, of playing tragedy every evening, without a single performer capable of sustaining its higher walks, Mr. Kean excepted, is obvious; but this manager always runs from one extreme to another. At one time, we had no comedy but Wild Oats (though we think that Mr. Ellistown should have sown his long ago); then succeeded Miss Wilson, and the operamania raged for a few months; and now that Mr. Kean has returned, we are to have tragedy, not doled out to us according to the public taste or avidity, but guided by no other measure than that of the physical powers of the actor.

Mr. Kean's appearance, though not honored by an overflowing audience, had a very good one; and his welcome was as enthusiastic as we recollect to have witnessed at any period. The audience in the pit rose unanimously, cheering and waving their hats for so-veral minutes, and the applause of the boxes, though less boisterous, did not seem less sincere. Mr. Kean appeared almost overpowered with this flattering testimony of public approbation, but he soon proved by his talents, that it was not unmerited. The transatlantic excursion, though it has not improved this eminent actor's style, (but who would seek for improvement in America!) has not injured it; his voice, we think, is somewhat less hoarse; at least it appeared so to us in some of the early scenes, though, towards the conclusion, he became as hoarse as ever. It would be a work of supererogation to criticise a performance on which criticism has long yielded to universal admiration; and, therefore, we shall only say, that we never saw Mr. Kean sustain the character of Gloucester with more spirit or greater effect. There was nothing in the other characters deserving particular notice.

After the tragedy was concluded, Mr. Kean being called for, came forward, and, thanking the audience for their kind reception, said he hoped that, during his absence, he had done nothing unworthy of the character of an Englishman.—On Wednesday, this eminent actor (so Mr. Ellistown calls him, and we do not hesitate to acknowledge the propriety of the epithet) played Shylock to a crowded house.

ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.—We omitted last week to notice a new farce produced at this theatre, called Twopence. It is from the pen of Mr. Peake, the author of Amateurs and Actors, &c. and, like all the pieces of that gentleman, is full of spirit and humour. If Dr. Johnson had that antipathy to a pun which is attributed to him, he would have sat very uneasy under this farce, which abounds with puns, and though, as in all cases where they become numerous, there are many bad ones, yet their character generally was above those in modern farces. Wrench, as a Twopenny-Postman, has a good character; and Harley, as a Musical Cheesemonger, fonder of his bassoon than his business, elicited much applause. On the evening of the coronation, a new piece was produced, entitled A Squeeze at the Coronation. It is a loyal dramatic sketch, which possesses more merit than pieces written on a temporary occasion generally can boast of. The manager, to do honour to the event which occasioned it, with great liberality opened his house at half the usual prices, for three successive evenings.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—The favourite opera of Guy Mannering was performed admirably on Thursday; throughout the whole range of characters, there was not one which could merit censure; the house was elegantly filled, many of the songs were encored, and the audience testified their delight by loud and reiterated cheers. Miss Carew played Lucy Bertram; Miss R. Corri, Julia Mannering; Mrs. Johnson, Meg Merrilies; and Mrs. Jones led the group of gipsies. Mr. Leoni Lee, a gentleman who increases in favour every time he appears, played Henry Bertram, and sung most effectively; the major part of his songs were encored and marked with peculiar approbation. The Dominic Sampson of Mr. Tayleure also appeared to give great delight, and was certainly an excellent performance. Mr. J. Russell's Dandie Dimont was also a good piece of acting, in which he displayed rustic manners and native heroism with great truth and energy. We cannot conclude our present brief notice without observing that, as the season proceeds, the performances improve, and that many of the unfavourable remarks to which this company was subject at the opening of the theatre, cannot now, with justice, be repeated.

Literature and Science.

The Apograph.—A Mr. Andrew Smith, of Mauchline, in Scotland, has invented an instrument for copying drawings, &c. called by the learned, who have seen it, an apograph. It is 'so constructed,' that drawings of any kind may be copied by it upon paper, copper, or any other substance capable of receiving an impression, upon a scale either extended, reduced, or the same as the original. The arts, we understand, furnish no instance of an instrument resembling this, either in its appearance or operation, save what is called the pantograph, and even from this machine it differs materially. The beam, in the former, is suspended vertically from an universal joint, whereas the beam of the latter is supported on an horizontal plane. There is also, a counterpoise added to the apograph above the centre of motion, which relieves the hand almost entirely of the weight it would otherwise have to sustain when the beam is but of the vertical position.

Colour of the Skin.—In the Literary Chronicle, No. 99, we stated the observations of Sir Edward Home, that the black substance in the skin of the Negro has great influence in preventing the scorching operations of the sun's rays. In the fourth number of the Newcastle Magazine [a new work, which does honour to provincial literature], the arguments of Sir Everard are ingeniously combated, and his deductions positively denied. Sir Everard had said, that the rete mucosum of Negroes is a provision of nature against the scorching effect of the sun's rays. In answer to this assertion, the writer in the magazine contends, that, first, as a provision against the rays of the sun, black is the very worst colour that could possibly be chosen.—What should we think of the man, who, to defend his bare pole against the scorching rays of the sun, put on a black hat instead of a white one?—Unless nature were an idiot, she certainly would have preferred white.—Sir Everard proves his point in the most absurd possible manner. He interposes a piece of black crape between the skin and the concentrated rays of the sun, and then because the ardour of the rays are blunted, he maintains that the rete mucosum of Negroes is for this purpose! The texture of the crape is the true defence, and I will never believe but that white crape would answer much better.

Secondly, why should nature be so partial to black men? The ancient Egyptians, the ancient Hindoos, and Caribs, all lived within the tropics; the former were white, unless in those parts exposed to the sun; the latter were red. At this day the Cochino Chinese are yellow, and yet they reside in a very hot climate. It is true, the banks of the Senegal and Gambia are hotter still; but there are black men in New Holland, and very dark coloured skins near the north pole.

Thirdly, there is no such thing as a pigment in the rete mucosum at all. In the eye, indeed, there is a pigment. There was once a Frenchman pretended to demonstrate one in Edinburgh, but neither professor Monro nor any person could discover it, but only the Frenchman himself. It is quite impossible to separate the rete mucosum from the cutis vera or under skin, otherwise than by an arbitrary separation. The colour of the skin depends not upon any pigment, but upon its texture; the texture of that of the Negro is thicker, but coarser wove. This would be a better preventive against the sun's rays than any pigment; but the truth is, the whole idea is ridiculous.

lous, and it was decided as long ago as the days of Buffon, that it is the obtundity of the nervous system of the Negro which renders him callous to the most scorching heat.

LUCRETII.

An American Caleb Quotem.—As illustrative of the republican simplicity and character of our citizens, the following anecdote, which occurred in New York some time ago, will bear ample testimony:—An English dandy, just landed, ordered a suit of clothes to be made by one of our fashionable tailors, which, by agreement, was to be finished on a certain day. The gentleman being disappointed, went to the tailor's and rated him soundly for his neglect. 'Sir, damme, in my country, when a tailor disappoints his customer, we send him to the devil.' 'Ah! yes, sir.—' Don't say ah! I am not to be disappointed with impunity.' At that moment a person entered, who addressed the tailor as follows:—'Alderman, I have a petition before the Hon. the Corporation relative to one of the avenues, and I should be happy if you would be present and attend to it.' 'Very well, sir,' says the tailor, 'I know something of the subject, and shall do so.' Scarcely had he departed, before another one entered. 'I have,' said he to the tailor, 'placed a note in your bank for discount; I have not spoken to any other director but yourself—will you use your efforts to get it done for me?' 'I will do my best,' said the tailor. When the last person departed, a young officer in full dress entered, who addressed the tailor as follows:—'General, I have come to receive your orders.' The Alderman, General, Bank-director, and Tailor, said in reply, 'very well, sir, you shall have them, and you will take care that the adjutant has the division on the ground at the precise hour.' The Englishman, who attended these interviews, very leisurely lifted up his eye-glass, and having viewed the tailor from top to toe, took his leave, saying, 'Sir, you may send my clothes home whenever you please.'—American Paper.

Fair Rosamond.—Henry II. is said to have concealed his fair mistress, Rosamond, in a labyrinth at Woodstock, from the jealous researches of his queen, who, nevertheless, according to the common report, found means to discover he retreat, and take her off by poison. This account, however, is founded upon no better authority than that of the old ballad, composed upon the subject. But if we may believe Edinburgh, Rosamond did not die in 1173; nor was she poisoned by Queen Eleanor. This author expressly says, that after Henry had imprisoned Queen Eleanor, he continued to keep Rosamond publicly for a considerable time. This famous lady was buried in a church belonging to Godstow Nunnery, near Oxford.

THE NORTHERN EXPEDITION.

We have just been favoured with the following interesting extract of a letter from one of the gentlemen employed on the Northern Expedition:—

'His Majesty's Ship Fury, Hudson's Bay, the Coast of America, June 26, 1821.'

'I take the opportunity of writing you, by the return of the Nautilus transport, which accompanied us to carry our heavy stores. We have had an excellent passage from the Orkneys to this part of the world; the weather, however, since we have been here, has not been so favourable.

'We have made two attempts to unload the transport, having made fast to icebergs for that purpose, but have been blown off successively by heavy gales, with the loss of some of our boats from the deck, and no small share of tribulation for the transport, which has not been properly fortified for the ice. She has come off, however, very well, considering every thing, having only lost the copper from her bows. We are now taking advantage of a fine day, and hope to get rid of her in a day or two, and to proceed upon our destination.

'We made an island about a week ago, called Resolution Island, where we expected to see some Indians, but there was so much ice between the ships and the land, that we could not get in.

'It can hardly give you an idea of our intended route, or, more properly, of our ideal route; first, because our course must, in agreement, depend upon the state of the ice; secondly, for want of a chart; for those in common use are so incorrect in the general outline of the coast, as to be perfectly useless. If, however, you should fall in with a good map of the country, I will tell you the track we shall endeavour to take.

'After making Cape Farewell, the southern extremity of Greenland, in lat. 59. N. and long. 44. W. we proceeded nearly due west between Cape Chidley, on the Labrador Coast, and Resolution Island, in lat. 61. 40. N. and long. 63. W. where we now are; from hence we intend to steer, if wind and ice will permit, about a north-west course, and endeavour to explore an inlet to the east of Repulse Bay, which has never yet been entered by any one but Fox, about 160 years ago; thence we shall proceed to Hearne's Sea, where we shall winter (if we get there); then to Mackenzie's Sea, Behring's Straits, &c.

'All the officers are exceedingly agreeable, and I have but little doubt we shall spend the winter very comfortably together. We are all preparing our rifles for shooting deer, with which these islands abound. We are, however, exceedingly well off in the eating way—plenty of fresh beef, mutton, pork, eggs, fish, and poultry on board, besides sheep, pigs, and 22 fine bullocks, on board the transport, and pot and meats and soups of all kinds for more than three years, so that our salt provisions we scarcely need taste the whole voyage, unless we choose.

'The mean temperature where we now are is about 35° Fahrenheit, the sun just skimming below the horizon at this time at midnight, so that we have constant day, which you may conceive is a great comfort in navigation amongst ice. An apparatus was yesterday let down to the depth of 500 fathoms, for bringing up water: its temperature by a registering thermometer was 40½ degrees Fahrenheit; that at the surface being 36 degrees. The specific gravity, at the same depth, was 1.0278, and at the surface, 1.0260. Our position, as determined astronomically, is always to the north-west of our dead reckoning; from which it appears, that there is a constant current setting from the north-west to south-east.'

'A Romance has just made its appearance under the title of "A Legend of Argyle; or, 'Tis a Hundred Years Since," which we have perused with great delight. The combination of historical narrative with fictitious detail is admirably well managed, and throughout the entire work the utmost delicacy of a polished and sensible mind is maintained. We feel a pleasure, therefore, in recommending the "Legend of Argyle" to our numerous readers.'

Lady Morgan's New Work.

This day is published, in 2 vols. 4to., containing nearly 900 closely printed pages, price £3. 13s. 6d. boards,

ITALY.—BY LADY MORGAN.

OPINIONS ON THIS WORK.—

'LADY MORGAN'S View of Italy combines the high tone of philosophy with the most gay and familiar descriptions of the life and manners of the very mixed societies to which she has access: and her opportunities were highly favourable to the task she had in view. Her narrative abounds with striking anecdotes, traits of character, incidents, sites, and hues, which will highly interest the public.'—Morning Chronicle.

'This is a work that will largely occupy public attention. It is by far the most important work which its author has yet undertaken. It is not a classical tour, nor a picturesque tour; but it contains a rich harvest of "middle age" anecdote, abounding with such traits of the domestic, social, and political life of the great Republics of Italy, as cannot fail of exciting an intense interest. The gravity and massiveness of the subject have not, however, prevented the author from indulging largely in those humorous and striking details of real life, which form the charm of her more recent novels. Her views of society have been more intimate than those of any other recent traveller. Her literary reputation has opened wide the door of continental hospitality to her; and this circumstance has given the same view of interest and originality to her narrative which made the reputation of her work in France, and distinguishes it from all other books on that country.'—Weekly Register.

'It is only doing the author justice to say, that she has given us more information on the actual state of society in Italy at the present moment, than can be found in any of the numerous publications which have made their appearance since the peace.'—New Month Mag.

'We have travelled the garden of Europe before, but seldom with so entertaining a companion as Lady Morgan. Sheields the yoke of the Cicero with almost an enchantment's power. Description, remark, character, anecdote, incident, mingle in so rapid and vigorously succession, that our attention is kept constantly on the alert, from the beginning to the ending of her peregrinations, extending from the Alps to Italy's remotest bounds. All her feelings and opinions are on what may be called the right side, generous, benevolent, and liberal. She possesses a strong vein of ridicule, but, with a few exceptions, her shafts are tempered with delicacy and goodnature.'—Star.

'This is a highly instructive and entertaining work, full of variety, and displaying the riches of an acute and well-stored mind. A love of truth directs her researches, and manifests itself in her descriptions, the colours of which are clear, vivid, and glowing.'—British Press.

Review of New Books.

Italy and the Italians in the Nineteenth Century; or, Letters on the Civil, Political, and Moral State of that Country, written in 1818 and 1819. With an Appendix, containing Extracts from Modern Italian Literature. By a Foreign Officer in the British Service. 8vo. pp. 271. London, 1821.

LES Italiens sont plus remarquables par ce qu'ils ont été, et par ce qu'ils pourroient être, que par ce qu'ils sont maintenant. This observation of a distinguished writer, Madame de Staël, will not be disputed by any one at all acquainted with the history of Italy; but the Italians are even now remarkable and interesting in many respects, and are not deserving of that neglect which they have experienced from travellers in general; for, while the antiquities, ruins, and buildings of Italy have been so often and so ably described, the moral state of its inhabitants has been passed over almost unnoticed. The work before us is confined principally to the latter subject, on which information is certainly most wanted.

The author states himself to be a foreigner, who not only passed his childhood in Italy, and became perfectly master of its language, but has resided and travelled in it recently, in order to add fresh information to old recollections. His letters contain an account of two different journeys made through Italy, embracing the greater part of Italy, Naples, Tuscany, Lombardy, Piedmont, and Genoa. He says the Italians are but imperfectly known, and are often abused by foreigners, who include in one common description of character the whole of the various states, while 'a Tuscan and a Neapolitan, a Lombard and a Genoese, a Venetian and a Roman, are as different from one another as the Germans are from the English; or the Dutch from the French.' The author professes himself well acquainted with the religion of Italy, and, although he speaks of it with respect, he appears sensible of its superstitions; in his political principles he is temperate.

The work commences with an account of Naples, where the author arrived in the middle of the Carnival of 1818, of which and of the amusements of that city, he gives a very interesting description. The Neapolitans are said to have lost much of that harmless gaiety, and that openness of disposition, which formerly distinguished them; they are, however, as fond of pleasure as ever, from the king down to the Lazzaroni; and some of their amusements are sufficiently whimsical: take, for example, the following:—

'I saw, one day,' says the author, 'in the street of Toledo, Prince L—, the king's youngest son, in a car, with a numerous suite in the garb of ancient warriors, with shields and a kind of shovels, which they filled out of buckets full of confetti, discharging the contents against the company in the balconies. This is a favourite pastime of the season, although sometimes attended with unfortunate consequences; for as sugar confections are expensive, many substitute imitations for them, made of clay, which are very hard, and some as large as common nuts, so that a shower of them becomes a very unpleasant compliment, and serious diseases originate in this absurd custom.'

At the inferior theatres of La Fenice and San Carlino, farces and pantomimes are performed for the amusement of the lower classes:—

'There you see the Pollicciella in his genuine colours. This Neapolitan clown is something similar to the Arlecchino of Bergamo, pantalone of Venice, &c. but is not an honourable specimen of the national character of his country, of which it is intended as a caricature. Pollicciella is a servant from Acerra, a village in the neighbourhood of Naples, and he is so highly educated by nature and accomplished by education, that he is at once a thief, a liar, a coward, a braggart, and a debauchee; still the facetious way in which he relates his various feats enraptures his grovelling countrymen. He delights in licentious double entendre, gross jokes, and dirty tricks; there is not a single good quality in him; his cunning is very low, and he is always outwitted when he meets with any person of sense, so that in the end he is generally discovered, imprisoned, whipped, and hanged. Such is the celebrated Pollicciella.'

The author gives a good estimate of the general character of the Neapolitans, which is not a very amiable one. They seem sensible of their degraded moral state, and are quite indifferent to the opinion which strangers may entertain of them. 'Shame, that loitering attendant of virtue, seems to be lost in the general corruption, and patriotism has fled from the polluted soil.' Of the truth of these remarks, the Neapolitans have given unfortunate evidence very recently:—

Decency and delicacy are not conspicuous in the manners of the inhabitants of this country. Every thing is done in public, the conversation runs upon the most extraordinary topics and with as little disguise as possible. Boys are seen running about the streets, especially near the sea, in a state of nakedness or nearly so. The entrances and stairs of the houses and palaces are filled with every kind of nuisance. The windows and balconies are generally thrown open, so that every thing is to be seen which is going on in a neighbour's house. Neapolitans of every class; when they come home, during the summer, that is to say six months in the year, take off their coats and neckcloths, and sit down at dinner with a night gown on, or with their shirt sleeves tucked up to their elbows. Ladies perform their toilette with the doors of their dressing-rooms ajar, in sight of servants and strangers. All this, however, admits of some excuse, as the heat of the weather is in a great measure one of the principal causes of such indelicate customs.

'The greatest familiarity often prevails between masters and servants. The former often joke and laugh with the latter, they talk confidentially of their affairs and intrigues before them, some even play at cards with them; it is natural, therefore, to expect no reverence nor subordination from domestics who are the confidants of all their master's foibles and vices. This renders Neapolitan servants perhaps the very worst in the world. They are dirty, lazy, and careless, insolent and unfaithful. They are great thieves; some of them will steal the paltriest things that fall in their way. Most of them, especially when out of livery, would think it beneath them to carry a bundle, or any thing in their hands through the street, and will actually refuse to do so, or con-play a porter for the purpose. Gambling, sleeping, and defaming their masters, are the pastimes in which they spend the greatest part of the day while loitering in idleness in the ante-rooms. By their means, all the secrets of their masters and mistresses are made known to the world. Still the difficulty of getting better, and the danger of falling into worse hands, make their employers put up with them.

We will not dwell any longer on the dark side of the picture, but turn to the more favourable view of the Neapolitan character. When not under the immediate pressure of want, the Neapolitans are good natured and social, and, notwithstanding the misery of the lower classes, heinous crimes are rare in Naples:—

The Neapolitans are possessed of natural good sense, penetration, and humour: their shrewd and expressive eyes are often the only vehicles of conveying their sentiments, and a mute conversation is often carried on between two persons, of which a by-stander, who is not initiated in the mysteries of this telegraphic communication, has not the least suspicion. Their pantomime is excellent; they always accompany their words with gestures expressive of their ideas. Their repartees are generally ready and appropriate—even their lazzaroni shine in them. Under Murat's reign, a French general just arrived at Naples, had his trunk carried to the hotel by a porter; on the fellow's asking for a remuneration, which the Frenchman considered too much, the latter said he was well aware that Naples was a den of thieves; the lazzaroni shrugged up his shoulders, and with a half shy half simple look, turned to one of his comrades who was standing by, "Non te l'aggiu' ditto," said he, "che non ce ne stanno chiu' a Parigi de mariuoli, d'ò tutti benuti cò." Did I not tell you that there are no longer any thieves at Paris, for they are all come here.

In science, literature, and the mechanical arts, the Neapolitans are behind the rest of the Italians, though in literature Naples can boast several men of considerable talents.

At the Opera Buffa, at Sorrento, our author saw Hamlet converted into a ballet! "To what base purposes may we come at last." The subject, we are told, was sadly disfigured:—

"The ghost appears to Hamlet in his palace, and to explain the circumstance of the murder, points to a sort of mirror on which the horrible transaction is reflected; this contrivance has certainly a very striking effect. Hamlet becomes raving, and attempts at once to kill his uncle; the king is prevented by his wife from putting him to death, but has him confined in a dungeon, where he and all his court pay Hamlet a visit, and where a reputation of the same violence takes place. But the last scene is full of noise and confusion; peals of thunder are heard, clouds of smoke arise, the king is frightened, and Hamlet avails himself of this opportunity to stab him. The queen swoons, and, to crown the whole, the ghost appears again surrounded with phosphoric light to testify his satisfaction, and to give, as it were, his blessing to the audience. This is the substance of the plot; the piece is intermixed with dances and grotesque exhibitions, which have little to do with the story. The dresses are gaudy, according to the taste of the country. The music, however, is very good, and atones in part for the silliness of the performance."

At the same theatre, Tognino, a famous clown, who accompanied the manager, Barbaja, to London, has got up a sort of pantomime, in which he pretends to mimic French and English manner:—

"He appears on the stage with his wife, as just arrived from London, both dressed à l'Anglaise, at least according to the ridiculous notions here entertained of the English fashions. He affects to imitate English customs, but rather unsuccessfully, except that of shaking hands, which he repeats every moment, whether to the purpose or not. He changes his dress on the stage, and makes a dandy toilette, pulls on his buckskins by means of a pulley, and goes through a great deal of disgusting farce. Then he gets into a quarrel, and being challenged to fight, he refuses at first, and offers to box, and when presented with pistols, he appears not to know how to handle them. At last all is settled amicably, and he goes down an English country dance in a ridiculous and affected manner."

At Naples, there is an institution, the only one of its kind in Europe—the Chinese College, where young natives of China, smuggled out of the country when only thirteen or fourteen years old, by the missionaries, are brought up for the ecclesiastical profession, to return afterwards to their country to propagate Christianity: there were six Chinese in the college in 1818. From Naples, our author went to Leghorn, and afterwards to Pisa, Florence, and Bologna. The Tuscans were never much attached to the French, and the Austrians were not greater favourites:—

"Elisa Baciocchi, Napoleon's eldest sister, ruled Tuscany for several years, with the title of Grand Duchesse, although she was in reality no more than a subordinate agent of her brother. As such she cannot perhaps, with justice, be made accountable for the arbitrary acts which she enforced, in obedience to her imperial relative; but she displayed a haughtiness and a harshness which disgusted the gentle Florentines. She took frequent opportunities of humbling the nobility, who, in this country, are more unassuming than in other parts of Italy; and many anecdotes are related of her haughty overbearing disposition, by which, as well as by her features, she appears to resemble her brother Napoleon more than any of her sisters. Abundance of scandalous reports also circulate about the manners of her court. She certainly did not conciliate the minds of the inhabitants, who, at her departure in 1814, gave her unequivocal marks of dislike. Her husband, Baciocchi, originally an Italian, and formerly a commissary in the French armies, was a mere cypher, and had no share in the business of government, for which he did not seem calculated, and of which, happily for him, he was not ambitious. He, however, on his being appointed Prince of Lucca, was persuaded to change his Christian name of Pascal, which, in Italy, is vulgar, and subject to ridicule, being often used as synonymous to dunce, into the more dignified one of Felix the First; upon which occasion, some Tuscan wit produced the following epigram:—

"Quando tu eri Pasquali, noi eravam tutti felici;
Or che tu sei Felix, noi siamo tutti Pasquali."

"He was a harmless insignificant bon vivant, and seems to have fully understood his own mediocrity, for, when the gentlemen of Lucca apologized to him for their possible deficiencies in their new capacity of courtiers, saying, that they were not accustomed to the situation (Lucca having been until then a republic), he good-humouredly replied: "We will excuse one another mutually, gentlemen, as I was also a novice in my present profession."

Speaking of the difference between Italian and English beauty, the author says,—

"Italy and England are undoubtedly possessed of a greater share of female beauty than any other countries in Europe. But the English and the Italian beauties, although equally interesting, are very different from one another. The former are unrivalled for their complexions, their bloom, the smoothness and mild expression of their features, their modest carriage, and the cleanliness of their person and dress; these are qualities which strike every foreigner at his landing. On my first arrival in England, I was asked by a friend how I liked the English women, to which I replied, that I thought them all handsome. This is the first impression they produce. There is something so calm, so chaste about them, that to a native of the south they appear almost more than terrestrial. They look—

"With eyes so pure, that from their ray
Dark vice would turn abashed away;

Yet fill'd with all youth's sweet desires,
Mingling the rous'd and sweet desires
Of other worlds, with all the bliss
The fond weak tenderness of this."

"The Italian beauties are of a different

In their misery, as it arose from their boldness; they hugged themselves in their sufferings, as associating them with the misfortunes of their intrepid country. They were sometimes seen going into a coffee-house, solely to read the newspaper, in order to penetrate the fate of their friends through the lies of their enemies; their countenances were then immovable, but not without expression, exhibiting strength under the command of their will. Farther on, at Auxonne, was the residence of the English prisoners, who had, the day before, saved from fire one of the houses of the town where they were kept confined. At Besançon, there were more Spaniards. Among the French exiles to be met with in every part of France, an angelic creature inhabited the citadel of Besançon, in order not to quit her father. For a long period, and amidst every sort of danger, Mademoiselle de Saint Simon shared the fortunes of him who had given her birth.

At the entrance of Switzerland, on the top of the mountains which separate it from France, you see the castle of Joux, in which prisoners of state are detained, whose names frequently never reach the ear of their relations. In this prison Toussaint Louverture actually perished of cold; he deserved his fate on account of his cruelty, but the emperor had the least right to inflict it upon him, as he had engaged to guarantee to him his life and liberty. I passed a day at the foot of this castle during very dreadful weather, and I could not help thinking of this negro, transported all at once into the Alps, and to whom this residence was the hell of ice; I thought of the more noble beings who had been shut up there, of those who were still groaning in it, and I said to myself also, that if I was there, I should never quit it with life.

While in Switzerland, Madame de Staël was under the surveillance of the police, and she felt alarmed, lest from a banishment so rigorous, the change might shortly be to a prison; knowing that, if once arrested, and 'if these clat were once got over,' the emperor would not allow himself again to be spoken to about her. There is a tolerable piece of vanity in this, and, indeed, in the whole volume. New persecutions compelled her to seek another asylum, and she fled to Sweden, but how to get there was the difficulty; and she first travelled in Switzerland with M. Montmorency. In the Canton of Fribourg, she visited a monastery of Trappists, of whom she gives an interesting account:—

‘One can have no idea of the minute degrees of suffering imposed upon the monks; they go so far as even to forbid them, when they have been standing for some hours in succession, from leaning against the wall, or wiping the perspiration from their forehead; in short, every moment of their life is filled with suffering, as the people of the world fill theirs with enjoyment. They rarely live to be old, and those to whom this lot falls, regard it as a punishment from heaven. Such an establishment would be barbarous if any one was compelled to enter it, or if there was the least concealment of what they suffer there. But, on the contrary, they distribute to whoever wishes to read it, a printed statement, in which the rigours of the order are rather exaggerated than softened; and yet there are novices who are willing to take the vows, and those who are received never run away, although they might do it without the least difficulty. The whole rests, as it appears to me, upon the powerful idea of death; the institutions and amusements of society are destined in the world to turn our thoughts entirely upon life; but when the contemplation of death gets a certain hold of the human heart, joined to a firm belief in the immortality of the soul, there are no bounds to the disgust which it may take to every thing which forms a subject of interest in the world; and a state of suffering appearing the road to a future life, such minds follow it with avidity, like the traveller, who willingly fatigues himself in order to get sooner over the road which leads him to the object of his wishes. But what equally astonished and grieved me, was to see children brought up with this severity; their poor locks shaved off, their young countenances already furrowed, that deathly dress with which they were covered before they knew any thing of life, before they had voluntarily renounced it, all this made my soul revolt against the parents who had placed them there. When such a state is not the adoption of a free and determined choice on the part of the person who professes it, it inspires as much horror as it at first created respect. The monk with whom I conversed, spoke of nothing but death; all his ideas came from that subject, or connected themselves with it; death is the sovereign monarch of this residence. As we talked of the temptations of the world, I expressed to the father Trappist, my admiration of his conduct in thus sacrificing all, to withdraw himself from their influence. “We are cowards,” said he to me, “who have retired into a fortress, because we feel we want the courage to meet our enemy in the open field.” This reply was equally modest and ingenious.

After eight months passed in great anxiety, during which new vexations and persecutions were heaped on each other, Madame de Staël quitted Copet on the 23d of May, 1812, in great secrecy, and travelled through Germany. At Inspruck she went to see the famous tomb of Maximilian, which is in one of the churches there:—

‘The figure of Maximilian in bronze, is kneeling upon a sarcophagus, in the body of the church, and thirty statues of the same metal, ranged on each side of the sanctuary, represent the relations and ancestors of the emperor. So much past grandeur, so much of the ambition formidable in its day, collected in a family meeting round a tomb, formed a spectacle which led one to profound reflection: there you saw Philip the Good, Charles the Rash, and Mary of Burgundy; and in the midst of these historical personages, Dietrich of Berne, a fabulous hero: the closed visor concealed the countenances of the knights, but when this visor was lifted up, a brazen countenance appeared under a helmet of brass, and the features of the knight were of bronze, like his armour. The visor of Dietrich of Berne, is the only one which cannot be lifted up, the artist meaning in that manner to signify the mysterious veil which covers the history of this warrior.’

When Madame de Staël arrived at Vienna, Count Stachelberg, the Russian ambassador, wrote to his imperial master for passports for her. Bonaparte was at this time at Dresden, whither all the German princes had resorted, to do him homage:—

‘Napoleon had stopped at Dresden, under the pretext of still negotiating there to avoid the war with Russia, in other words, to obtain by his policy the same result as he could by his arms. He would not at first admit the King of Prussia to his banquet at Dresden; he knew too well what repugnance the heart of that unfortunate monarch must have to what he conceives himself obliged to do. It is said that M. de Metternich obtained this humiliating favour for him. M. de Hardenberg, who accompanied him, made the remark to the Emperor Napoleon, that Prussia had paid one third more than the promised contributions. The emperor, turning his back to him, replied, “An apothecary’s bill,”—for he has a secret pleasure in making use of vulgar expressions, the more to humble those who are the objects of it. He assumed a sufficient degree of coquetry in his way of living with the Emperor and Empress of Austria, as it was of importance to him that the Austrian government should take an active part in his war with Russia. In a conversation with M. de Metternich, I have been assured that he said, “You see very well that I can never have the least interest in diminishing the power of Austria as it now exists; for, first of all, it suits me that my father-in-law should be a prince of great consideration; besides, I have more confidence in the old than in the new dynasties. Has not General Bernadotte already taken the side of making peace with England?”

From Vienna, Madame de Staël passed into Galicia, and receiving her passport, she travelled through Poland, to Russia:—

'The Poles,' she says, 'love their country as an unfortunate friend; the country is dull and monotonous, the people ignorant and lazy; they have always wished for liberty; they have never known how to acquire it. But the Poles think that they can and may govern Poland, and the feeling is very natural. The education, however, of the people is so much neglected, and all kind of industry is so foreign to them, that the Jews have possessed themselves of the entire trade, and make the peasants sell them, for a quantity of brandy, the whole harvest of the approaching year. The distance between the nobility and the peasantry is so immense, the contrast between the luxury of the one, and the frightful misery of the other is so shocking, that it is probable the Austrians have given them better laws than those which previously existed. But a proud people, and the Poles are so even in their misery, does not wish to be humbled, even when they are benefited, and in that point the Austrians have never failed. They have divided Galicia into circles, each of which is commanded by a German functionary; sometimes a person of distinction accepts this employment, but it is much more frequently a kind of brute, taken from the subaltern ranks, and who in virtue of his office commands in the most despotical manner the greatest noblemen of Poland. The police, which in the present times has replaced the secret tribunal, authorizes the most oppressive measures. Now let us only imagine what the police can be, namely, the most subtle and arbitrary power in the government, entrusted to the rude hands of the captain of a circle. At every post-house in Galicia, there are to be seen three descriptions of persons who gather round travellers' carriages: the Jew traders, the Polish beggars, and the German spies. The country appears exclusively inhabited by these three classes of men. The beggars, with their long beards and ancient Sarmatian costume, excite deep commiseration; it is very true, that if they would work they need not be in that state; but I know not whether it is pride or laziness which makes them disdain the culture of the enslaved earth.

'You meet upon the high roads processions of men and women carrying the standard of the cross, and singing psalms; a profound expression of melancholy reigns upon their countenance; I have seen them, when not money, but food of a better sort than they had been accustomed to was given them, turn up their eyes to heaven with astonishment, as if they considered themselves unfit to enjoy its bounty. The custom of the common people in Poland, is to embrace the knees of the nobility when they meet them; you cannot stir a step in a village without having the women, children, and old men saluting you in this manner. In the midst of this spectacle of wretchedness, you might see some men in shabby attire, who were spies upon misery; for that was the only object which could offer itself to their eyes.'

In speaking of Moscow, we have the following anecdote:—

'Napoleon asked one of his generals, in the presence of M. de Balashoff, if he had ever been at Moscow, and what sort of city it was. The general replied that it had appeared to him to be rather a large village than a capital. "And how many churches are there in it?" continued the emperor. About sixteen hundred, was the reply. "That is quite inconceivable," rejoined Napoleon, "at a time when the world has ceased to be religious."—"Pardon me, sire," said M. de Balashoff, "the Russians and Spaniards are so still." Admirable reply! and which presaged, one would hope, that the Russians would be the Castilians of the north.'

In the road to Moscow, Madame de Staël stopped at Kiow, of which she gives some interesting particulars:—

'The houses at Kiow generally resemble tents, and at a distance the city appears like a camp; I could not help fancying that the moveable residences of the Tartars had furnished models for the construction of those wooden houses, which have not a much greater appearance of solidity. A few days are sufficient for building them; they are very often consumed by fire, and an order is sent to the forest for a house, as you would send to market to lay in your winter stock of provisions. In the middle of these huts, however, palaces have been erected, and a number of churches, whose green and gilt cupolas singularly draw the attention. When, towards the evening, the sun darts his rays on these brilliant domes, you would fancy that it was rather an illumination for a festival, than a durable edifice.

'The Russians never pass a church without making the sign of the cross, and their long beards add greatly to the religious expression of their physiognomy. They generally wear a large blue robe, fastened round the waist by a scarlet band; the dresses of the women have also something Asiatic in them; and one remarks that taste for lively colours which we derive from the east, where the sun is so beautiful, that one likes to make his éclat more conspicuous by the objects which he shines upon.'

The Greek religion is less intolerant than the Roman Catholic; and—

'The ceremonies of the Greek worship are at least as beautiful as those of the Catholics; the church music is heavenly; every thing in this worship leads to meditation; it has something of poetry and feeling about it, but it appears better adapted to captivate the imagination than to regulate the conduct. When the priest comes out of the sanctuary, in which he remains shut up while he communicates, you would say that you saw the gates of light opening; the cloud of incense which surrounds him, the gold and silver, and precious stones, which glitter on his robes and in the church, seem to come from countries where the sun is an object of adoration. The devout sentiments which are inspired by Gothic architecture in Germany, France, and England, cannot be at all compared with the effect of the Greek churches; they rather remind us of the miseries of the Turks and Arabs, than of our churches. As little must we expect to find, as in Italy, the splendour of the fine arts; their most remarkable ornaments are virgins and saints, crowned with rubies and diamonds. Magnificence is the character of every thing one sees in Russia; neither the genius of man nor the gifts of nature constitute its beauties.

'The ceremonies of marriage, of baptism, and of burial, are noble and affecting; we find in them some ancient customs of Grecian idolatry, but only those which, having no connection with doctrine, can add to the impression of the three great scenes of life—birth, marriage, and death. The Russian peasants still continue the custom of addressing the dead previous to a final separation from his remains. Why is it, say they, that thou hast abandoned us? Wert thou then unhappy on this earth? Was not thy wife fair and good? Why, therefore, hast thou left her? The dead replies not, but the value of existence is thus proclaimed in the presence of those who still preserve it.'

Madame de Staël was quite in love with the Russians. The peasants, she says, 'have an elegance and softness about them, which you find no where else'; and she agrees with what was said by a person of fine intellect, that 'Russia resembled the plays of Shakspeare, in which all that is no trifle is sublime, and all that is not sublime is faulty.'

Our fair author reached Moscow at the time that the utmost preparations were making to prevent the invasion of Bonaparte, and she made the tour of this beautiful city only a month before it was reduced to ashes. Her description of it is one of the most interesting passages in her book. In the churches, she says, 'you see only ornaments of gold and silver and rubies'; and she was told, that a Russian had proposed to form an alphabet with precious stones, and to write a Bible in that manner:—

'Several of the palaces of Moscow are of wood, in order that they may be built quicker, and that the natural inconstancy of the nation, in every thing unconnected with country or religion, may be satisfied by an easy change of residence. Several of these edifices have been constructed for an entertainment; they were destined to add to the éclat of a day, and the rich manner in which they were decorated has made them last up to this period of universal destruction. A great number of houses are painted green, yellow, or rose-colour, and are sculptured in detail, like dædemon ornaments.

“The citadel of the Kremlin, in which the emperors of Russia defended themselves against the Tartars, is surrounded by a high wall, embattled and flanked with turrets, which, by their odd shapes, remind one of a Turkish minaret, rather than a fortress like those of the west of Europe. But although the external character of the buildings of the city be oriental, the impression of christianity was found in that multitude of churches so much venerated, and which attracted your notice at every step. One was reminded of Rome in seeing Moscow; certainly not from the monuments being of the same style, but because the mixture of solitary country and magnificent palaces, the grandeur of the city, and the infinite number of its churches, give the Asiatic Rome some points of resemblance to the European Rome.

“It was about the beginning of August, that I was allowed to see the interior of the Kremlin; I got there by the same staircase which the Emperor Alexander had ascended a few days preceding, surrounded by an immense people, who loaded him with their blessings, and promised him to defend his empire at all hazards. This people has kept its word. The halls were first thrown open to me, in which the arms of the ancient warriors of Russia are contained; the arsenals of this kind, in other parts of Europe, are much more interesting. The Russians have taken no part in the times of chivalry; they never mingled in the crusades. Constantly at war with the Tartars, Poles, and Turks, the military spirit has been formed among them in the midst of the atrocities of all kinds brought in the train of Asiatic nations, and of the tyrants who governed Russia. It is not, therefore, the generous bravery of the Bayards or the Percys, but the intrepidity of a fanatical courage which has been exhibited in this country for several centuries.”

“From the ancient arsenal, I was conducted into the apartments formerly occupied by the czars, and in which the robes are preserved which they wore on the day of their coronation. These apartments have no sort of beauty, but they agreed very well with the hard life which the czars led and still lead. The greatest magnificence reigns in the palace of Alexander; but he himself sleeps upon the floor, and travels like a Cossack officer.

“They exhibited in the Kremlin, a divided throne, which was filled at first by Peter I. and Ivan his brother. The Princess Sophia, their sister, placed herself behind the seat of Ivan, and dictated to him what to say; but this borrowed strength was not able to cope long with the native strength of Peter I. and he soon reigned alone. It is from the period of his reign that the czars have ceased to wear the Asiatic costume. The great wig of the age of Louis XIV. came in with Peter I. and without touching upon the admiration inspired by this great man, one cannot help feeling the disagreeable contrast between the ferocity of his genius and the ceremonious regularity of his dress. Was he in the right in doing away, as much as he could, oriental manners from the bosom of his people? Was it right to fix his capital in the north, and at the extremity of his empire? These are great questions which are not yet answered; centuries only can afford the proper commentaries upon such lofty ideas.

“I ascended to the top of the cathedral steeple, called Ivan Velki, which commands a view of the whole city; from thence I saw the palace of the czars, who conquered by their arms the crowns of Casan, Astracan, and Siberia. I heard the church music, in which the catholicon, Prince of Georgia, officiated in the midst of the inhabitants of Moscow, and formed a Christian meeting between Asia and Europe. Fifteen hundred churches attested the devotion of the Muscovite people.”

“Of the Russians we are told, that— ‘No civilized nation has so much in common with savages as the Russian people, and when their nobility possess energy, they participate also in the defects and good qualities of that unshackled nature. The expression of Diderot has been greatly vaunted: “The Russians are rotten before they are ripe.” I know nothing more false; their very vices, with some exceptions, are not those of corruption, but of violence. The desires of a Russian, said a very superior man, would blow up a city; fury and artifice take possession of them by turns, when they wish to accomplish any resolution, good or bad. Their nature is not all changed by the rapid civilization which was given them by Peter I.; it has as yet only formed their manners; happily for them, they are always what we call barbarians, in other words, led by an instinct frequently generous, but always involuntary, which only admits of reflection in the choice of the means, and not in the examination of the end; I say happily for them, not that I wish to extol barbarism, but I designate by this name, a certain primitive energy which can alone replace in nations the concentrated strength of liberty.’

From Moscow, our exiled author went to St. Petersburg, where she was when peace with England was proclaimed. She had an audience of the Emperor, who conversed freely with her on politics:—

“The Emperor Alexander, whom Napoleon has endeavoured to misrepresent, is a man of remarkable understanding and information, and I do not believe that in the whole extent of his empire, he could find a minister better versed than himself in all that belongs to the judgment and direction of public affairs. He did not disguise from me his regret for the admiration to which he had surrendered himself in his intercourse with Napoleon. His grandfather had, in the same way, entertained a great enthusiasm for Frederick II. In these sort of illusions, produced by an extraordinary character, there is always a generous motive, whatever may be the errors that result from it. The Emperor Alexander, however, described with great sagacity the effect produced upon him by these conversations with Bonaparte, in which he said the most opposite things, as if one must be astonished at each, without thinking of their being contradictory. He related to me also the lessons à la machiavel, which Napoleon had thought proper to give him: “You see,” said he, “I am careful to keep my ministers and generals at variance among themselves, in order that each may reveal to me the faults of the other; I keep up around me a continual jealousy by the manner I treat those who are about me; one day one thinks himself the favourite, the next day another, so that no one is ever certain of my favour.”

“The emperor talked to me with enthusiasm of his nation, and of all that it was capable of becoming. He expressed to me the desire, which all the world knows him to entertain, of ameliorating the state of the peasants still subject to slavery. “Sire,” said I to him, “your character is a constitution for your empire, and your conscience is the guarantee of it.”— “Were that even the case,” replied he, “I should only be a fortunate accident.” Noble words! the first of the kind, I believe, which an absolute monarch ever pronounced! How many virtues it requires, in a despot, properly to estimate despotism! and how many virtues also, never to abuse it, when the nation which he governs is almost astonished at such signal moderation.”

Madame de Staël did not long remain in Russia; but quitted it for Sweden; but her narrative breaks off before she arrived there; and her editor subjects a note, to state that she passed eight months at Stockholm, and then departed for London, where it will be recollected she remained a short time.

We have already stated that this work should not, from the circumstances under which it was written and published, be subjected to rigid criticism. In point of literary merit, it is certainly inferior to the former productions of the fair author; and her egotism is so prominent a feature in the whole narrative, that it is really disgusting even in a woman of her talents. It is, however, an entertaining volume, and will be read with interest by all who admire one of the most able female writers of the age.

The Privateer; a Tale. 2 vols. 12mo. pp. 431. London, 1821.

THERE is not any class of books that comes under our notice, that we venture upon with so much reluctance as novels; to venture on a hot-pressed and wire-wove volume of poems or a more ostentatious 8vo. of travels, is a trivial task to encountering a novel in two or three volumes: the very cutting up the leaves is a laborious duty, to say nothing of the cutting up, which the work too often deserves afterwards. We should not, to ever, complain, if our labours did not so often go unrewarded; but too frequently, after passing over a barren desert without one cheering prospect, (the end of the work excepted,) and examining, page after page, for a favourable passage or toiling through a tedious story, in the hopes that the catastrophe at least may be interesting, we throw the work down in disgust, and lament the loss of time which might have been so much better employed. Such we are compelled to acknowledge is the character of three fourths of the novels that we meet with. There are, however, some grand exceptions. The Scotch novelist has redeemed the character of the host of novel writers; and there are other writers, who, though following at a humble distance, are not unworthy satellites of the splendid luminary.

We have been induced to make these remarks as rather apologetic for our introducing to the notice of our readers so few of the novels, which are so perpetually teeming from the press; but charity to the authors as well as to the public, induces us to pass them over in silence. We have said there are exceptions to this rather sweeping denunciation of novels; and we must name the work before us as one. The Privateer is a story of much interest; the language is pleasing and sometimes elegant; and the author evinces a knowledge of the world, and considerable talents in the portraying of individual character as well as in the grouping of the personages in the work, which we feel no hesitation in recommending to all our male and female friends who are novel readers.

Fidelia; or, the Prevalence of Fashion. 12mo. pp. 173. London, 1821.

'FIDELIA' is a novel of the old school; a sort of domestic tragedy, in which the miserable consequences resulting from a passion for gaming and duelling, are painted with great force. The author, who appears to have mixed with the fashionable world, and is sensible of the errors too often attendant on persons of rank, gives them, in the story before us, a very useful warning. We cannot too much praise the benevolence of disposition, the delicacy of sentiment, and the excellent morality which the author discovers in every page of this little volume.

SPECIMEN OF AN UNPUBLISHED WORK

Without a Name, written on a Nameless Occasion.

BOOK FIRST.

THE book's † half ended and I am well pleas'd,
Not with the book exclusively—but that
It is half ended—An unwieldy volume,
Like other ponderous things, is wearisome;
And this seems heavy in more ways than one.

Now I do mightily affect a book
Of such convenient and minute dimensions
As may be held between the thumb and finger,
And read reclining in an elbow chair.

A great book some one said is a great evil;
But when the book is half made up of margin
The evil is in that proportion lessened:
Thanks to the London printers, who provide
A comfortable breadth of vacant paper
On which the mind may rest itself, fatigued
With the bewildering simpleness that creepeth,
Turbid and deep sometimes and sometimes shallow

With even pace thm' the capacious page,
Like a dark gutter thro' a field of snow.

And who knows, said I to myself, but I Might also make a book! † a goodly quarto.
The world is full of readers' patient souls,
Who may endure my tediousness perhaps
As well as that of others.—I'll afflict them
With a few lines by way of specimen;
And thus they may begin. I gat me up,
And wash'd my hands and face, and ate my breakfast,

And comb'd my head.—I use the common parlance

Because 'tis common tho' it is improper,
For I did comb my hair and not my head;
And this I did before I ate my breakfast,
And should have so recorded it; for events
Of any moment should be chronicled
Precisely in the order of their occurrence.
But let that pass.—Well, I did eat my breakfast,

And then I sat me in my elbow chair
And gazed most intently at the window:—
But tho' my eyes were on the window fix'd
I noted not the outward forms of things
Or aught enacting in the external world:—
No—in profound abstraction I did gaze
Into the 'dun obscure' of my own mind,
If haply I might spy and seize for use
Some tiny stragglers of the ideal world;
But gaz'd on vacancy, for naught was there.
Even so abideth in a barn, an owl.
The bird of wisdom, and with look sedate

• A literary friend has called our attention to the above excellent imitation of the chief of the lake poets. It appeared in the National Gazette, a new paper lately established at Philadelphia; and we are happy in transferring it to our pages.—Ed.

† Wordsworth's Excursion—the large London quarto edition.

Watcheth, and he too watcheth oft in vain
For the small cattle that inhabit there.

Faring thus meagerly I walk'd me forth
To inhale the freshness of the morning air
And read the features of surrounding things:—
So other wise men, when their homes are render'd,
By whatsoever cause, uncomfortable,
Direct their meditative steps abroad.

I love not early morning walks, I love not
To get my feet wet; and the bard who wrote
The silly trash of brushing dew away
To see the sun rise, hardly knew I fancy
What dew was made of, or the vile effect
That frequent soaking bath upon shoe-in-ther,—

And yet he was a man who might have known
Once in his life perhaps, unlike the run
Of bards, the comfort of a pair of shoes.
Well, I did walk me down a quiet lane
In which was little to distract the thoughts
Of the wayfaring man, or lead him forth
From deep and dark communion with himself:—

It was not a green lane—a grassy lane—
And I have noted, that at certain seasons,
Particularly in the dead of winter,
But little green is met with any where,
Except indeed upon Venetian blinds
And the dried skins of murder'd katydids—
On either side and in the midst appear'd,
In proud defiance of marauding swine,
A goodly growth of Jemson weeds and Puke.

Now one who had pick'd up a farthing's worth

Of learned jargon, would embrace the occasion,
To shew his knowledge of outlandish terms
For common things, and say that in this lane,
Stramonium and the Phytolacca grew;
But I, who write for dwellers in the fields,
Write in the language of the land they live in,
And, therefore, write I—Jemson weed and Puke.

Oh! it hath smil'd me—that is, made me smile,

When I have seen an honest man endeavour
To pass himself for more than he was worth
Of mental treasure—in and out of season
Larding his lean and favourite discourse
With certain words of unthought learned length,
Which, like the parrot, he had got by rote.

As I did journey in this lane, beneath
A wither'd poke bush, I beheld a beecher—
A little beast he was, and had so tall—
A toad they call'd him, and he seem'd † in years,
And that toad, who had seen better days;
I lean'd my back against the fence, and stood
Under the shade of an old apple-tree,
That had been dead for years, my host un-garter'd,

Hung ruefully in wrinkles at my ankles,
And my slouch'd hat, my forehead's old companion,

Would have flapped mournfully about my ears
If there had been a breath of air to flap it.—
With both hands in my pockets thus I stood,
Resembling much a statue, (not of Greece),
And mus'd upon the toad, and the toad seem'd
As he were musing, and that reflection

Of by gone days and doings had mo'd him?
For ever and anon he raised his foot,
And wip'd his eye withal,—'tis wonderful
What curious thoughts unlook'd for will arise
Of in the minds of contemplative men—
Men who associate with the sticks and stones
And living tenants of the fields and woods.
Now, thought I, if this toad would get him up kind. Their features are more regular, more animated; their complexions bear the marks of a warmer sun, and their eyes seem to participate of its fires; their carriage is graceful and noble; they have generally fine figures; they are not indeed angelic forms, but they are earthly Venuses. It has been supposed that the habitual view of those models of ideal beauty, the Greek statues, with which Italy abounds, may be an indirect cause conducing to the general beauty of the sex; be that as it may, I think the fine features and beautiful forms of the Italian fair have a great influence upon the minds of young artists, and this is, perhaps, one of the principal reasons why Italy has so long excelled in figure painters. A handsome female countenance, animated by the expression of the soul, is among the finest works of nature; the sight of it elevates the mind, and kindles the sparks of genius. Raphael took the models of his charming Madonnas from nature. Titian, Guido, Caracci, and others derived their ideas of female beauty from the exquisite countenances so frequent in their native country.

Intending to return to this very interesting volume in our next, we shall, for the present, conclude with an account of the defiles and echelles of Savoy:—

'While the custom house officers were visiting the goods with which the diligence is generally loaded, we got our dinner, and at two o'clock we started again. We soon arrived at the pas du Chail, which is the first defile one meets entering Savoy. The road is narrow and cut out of the perpendicular rock on the brink of a fearful precipice, at the bottom of which, runs the river Guisiers. It is over this frightful chasm that smugglers venture often in the depths of night, climb the rocks at the risk of being precipitated into the abyss below, and wading through the river, they pass from one territory into the other, where the gens d'armes are in watch for them, and where they run the chance of losing their property, and with it their liberty, and sometimes their lives. Still the temptation is so great, on account of the heavy duties by which the governments of Europe have now thought proper to fetter commerce, that numbers of people are known to five by smuggling all along the frontiers. Gully as they are of breaking the laws of the country, I cannot help compassionating in some degree many of these people, whom real necessity and want of resources in these inland districts lead to follow this dangerous and illegal course of life. What nights of watching, fatigue, and anxiety they must pass when engaged in their expeditions; the profits of which very often serve to enrich their employers who rest secure at home, and who give them such a poor share as is barely sufficient to support existence. With what throbbing hearts must their families be waiting for their return! The subject is certainly very sad, and one of the evils of the present system. The gens d'armes trace out the smugglers, like hunters after their prey. I perceived the manoeuvres of some of them who had got scent of a depot of contraband goods concealed in a solitary house situated on the Savoy bank of the river, near the road; those who were on foot surrounded the place at a distance, concealing themselves behind the bushes, and then one who was mounted galloped to the house, when all the rest rushed in. Our carriage driving on, I could not learn any thing of the success, but I felt that the scene was a most unpleasant one to reflect upon.

'We arrived at sun-set at the great pass of les Echelles, one of the most romantic I have seen. A range of table mountains, which I take to be a secondary chain of Alps, runs across Savoy, between the Rhone and the Isere, and seems to forbid the approach to Italy on that side, appearing like an outwork of the great Alpine barrier. Formerly, the only way to proceed was by steps cut in the rock, accessible only to pedestrians, and resembling ladders, from which the pass took the name of les Echelles. Charles Emmanuel II. Duke of Savoy, had a road opened by mines through this mass of rocks for a length of about two miles; a most useful and noble undertaking. An inscription remains in commemoration of the sovereign who had it constructed. The road is winding, the cliffs are in some places nearly a thousand feet high, and almost perpendicular. A solemn stillness reigns in this region. At a tremendous height above your head, a few sheep and goats, scarcely distinguishable by the sight, are straying on the crags which hang over the precipice, and higher up, the azure sky contrasts with the grey colour of the rocks by which you are inclosed on every side, so as not to perceive any issue. The whole forms a most wild and dreary scene. In the midst of these horrors, the singular appearance of a beggar stationed on one side of the road, strikes the traveller. This man has lived twenty years in this place, in a kind of wooden hut built against the rock, ten feet in length and six in breadth; there he sleeps, works, cooks his scanty repast, and collects the alms of the passengers. A strange existence, which still must have its attractions.'

(To be concluded in our next.)

The Lord of the Desert; Sketches of Scenery, Foreign and Domestic; Odes; and other Poems. By David Carey, Esq. 12mo. pp. 225. London, 1821.

MR. CAREY is a very prolific writer, and extends his talents over a very considerable portion of the field of literature; we find him avowedly a poet, a novelist, and a critic on the fine arts, and we think we could trace him in several other characters, in which he is not less successful.

The incidents in the principal poem in this volume, 'Ismael,' are entirely fictitious, though some of the allusions may be traced to Arabian narrative; and to the well-known fact, that the inhabitants of the Arabian deserts are descendants of Ismael, whose hands, it was foretold, should be against every man and every man's hands against them. The prophecy has been verified, as from age to age these Ismaelites have been in perpetual hostility with the surrounding nations, and yet they occupy the same wilderness still.

The subject is a good one for a poet, and Mr. Carey has treated it well; there is much bold imagery painted in harmonious verse in his poem, which has all the characteristics of true poetry. We shall only make one extract; it is a description of a caravan perishing in a desert, and the fate of Ismael and his companions, for which the author acknowledges himself indebted to a painting by Mr. Horace Vernet, exhibited in the Louvre, at Paris:—

'O'er trackless deserts, rocking in his ire
Each blood-stained altar and each fan of fire,
Sirocco pours, with pestilential breath,
His scorching whirlwinds and his gales of death.'

Alas! what dire misfortunes press around
The travellers now who tread Arabian ground!
Long journeying haps from Assyrian land
To Mecca's holy fane, through wastes of sand;
With fainting frame and melancholy eye,
That droop beneath the fierce un pitying sky,
Perish'd by increasing thirst and hopeless toil,
They slowly track and scan the barren soil.
Upward from billowy bed and moving plain,
As if the ocean had enlarg'd her reign:
First the long column, with prognostic fire,
Of sand, rolls on, illum'd with sparkling fire.
Near and more near the dreadful grim draws,
And bids Death open wide his fearful jaws.
Earth heaves—the caravan is buried deep;
The camel-driven cease their songs, and weep.
Mourn in your beauty, maids of Mecca, Mourn!

The faithful youths that never shall return—
Priests of Medina! chant the sorrowing verse,
And hang with blackening pomp the sacred hearse;

For you, with ceaseless step and anxious toil,
No sainted pilgrims bring th' accustom'd spoil—

No balsams from spicy glades your shrines to heap—

Priests of Medina, mourn—and maids of Mecca, weep!

'Oh, why thus leave, with heart unkind,
The vales of fragrance far behind?
The sheltering grove, the mead, the hill,
The freshness of the gellid rill;
For desert scenes, where limpid stream
Ne'er glustened to the solar beam
And never herb or blossom drew
From Heaven the sweet empearling dew?'

What danger threatens? what foes assail?
What thoughts have steel'd thy breast, Israel!
That thou no more the truth wilt prove
Of Osman's vow, and Osman's love?
Alas! my heart forbidden woe,
When first I mark'd thy darkened brow,
And shuddering, trembling, heard thee own
That thou wert Hassan Sabah's son."

"The reddening cloud's portentous sign,
Precursor dread of wrath divine,
Is gathering in yon lurid sky;
Fly, traveller! dauntless horseman fly!
Ah! whither may the victim speed
From swift-wing'd death on fleetest steed?
The terror of the waste, Simoom,
Has spread around his sulken gloom—
Simoom, whose very breath is fate—

Fly, fly, Neidina! ere too late.
Alas! the cheek that once was warm
With love's and beauty's matchless charm,
Is languid now, and gustily pale;—
Behold thy victim now, Israel!
That drooping form, that dear one see,
The victim sad of love and thee.
In vain, with grief and breast of flame,
Thou call'st upon Khadij's name,—
Yain now is all thy tenderest care;
For fate with cruel dart is there.

"Short is the strife—the struggle vain
Where such triumphant conquerors reign.
Like Lily on the desert heath,
The lov'd Neidina sinks to death,
Where not a blossom springs to shed
Its velle incense o'er the dead;
But these dim clouds and lowering skies
Were but the gates of Paradise,
That opened to thy gaze, loved fair,
Thou' unfulfilling joys that centre there—
To thee, the angel of the good,
With smiles of pure beatitude,
The welcome gave from worlds like this
To scenes of never-dying bliss.

"The train have fled—the victor train
That late in triumph scour'd the plain,
Or sleeps at length the gory band
Beneath the mountain heaps of sand.
The lov'd, the lone, the brave Israel,
With maddening pulse and visage pale,
Alone defies the dread Simoom,
And claims Neidina from the tomb—
"Dread tyrant of the burning zone,
Who n'd'st supreme on Azrael's throne,
Though thus life's blossom thou may'st blight,
Thou shalt not hide her from my sight."

"Where once the palm-tree strove to spread
A shelter for the traveller's head,
His hands with frantic toil inhumed
The relics of Neidina's bloom;
There fondly strives the youth to trace
Each feature of her lovely face!
There dwells on every look and smile
That charm'd his captive heart erewhile;
Each pitying glance reviews with joy,
She gave the helpless Arab boy,
And every bliss and every pain
That memory loves to entertain;
Till with fresh vigour to destroy,
The ravager of life and joy
Comes awful forth, and lays Israel
Beside Neidina's ashes pale,
Mute as those lips, whose odorous breath
Gave fragrance to the caves of death.
There slumber in one lonely grave
The young, the beautiful, and brave;
No sculptur'd stone—no palm-tree's shade
Point where the hapless pair are laid;

The traveller's bones that whiten there Alone the dreary spot declare!"

The author exhibits a considerable talent of description in his Sketches of Scenery; and the Odes and Minor Poems possess much merit. There is a great deal of beauty and delicate pathos in the following sketch of

'THE CEMETERY OF PERE LA CHAISE,
IN THE NEIGHBOURHOOD OF PARIS.

When, like the fleeting forms that fled
In youth's fair morning from the view,
We sink on death's ungenial bed,
And bid to life and love adieu;

If aught that once with influence kind
Could chase the mists of sorrow's gloom,
Can please the disembodied mind,
And shed a pleasure o'er the tomb,

'Tis when with sympathizing care
Affection rears the votive bower,
And weeping Pity's daughters fair
Trim the lone monumental flower.

As in the precincts of La Chaise,
The hands of beauty nurse the wreath
That spreads the bloom of vernal days
O'er the cold sanctuary of death,

If aught of consolation sweet
Can mingle with the cup of woe,
When, far from each belov'd retreat,
Fate lays the hapless stranger low;

'Tis that his ashes may repose
In peace, where those we love are laid,
Where death has never paled the rose,
And tears of piety are shed.

How sweet to him, when passion's past,
Whose vows were paid at beauty's shrine,
To sleep where Abelard at last,
And his lov'd Heloise entwined.

How sweet to those whose generous breast
Was form'd in nature's school to feel,
In the elysium of the blest,
To sleep with virtue and Delille!

And such thy scene of lasting sleep,
So tranquil and so hallow'd now,
La Chaise! where once in vengeance deep
Dark Persecution breathed his vow.

Where Superstition banish'd far
Sweet Love and Mercy from the ground,
Benignant Pity's milder star
A holier feeling spreads around.

Here oft o'er lost affection's bier,
The mother and the lover bend,
To dress with many a flower and tear
The cherish'd child, the parted friend.

Here, side by side, in flowery graves,
The Russian and the Spaniard lie,
And peace immortal olive waves
O'er warring nations' enmity.

Then mourn not, stranger, though thy doom
Be sorrow's lot, and brief thy days—
If joy can penetrate the tomb,
Thou'lt find it here—in Pere la Chaise."

Among the other poems, we have been much pleased with the Birth of Hygieia, Anna's Grave, and a ballad, called Robin of Rubenslaw, which possesses much of the beauty and simplicity of the old English ballad; it is, however, too long for us to quote, and we must content ourselves with a shorter poem of a different character, but equally pretty:—

'THE LUTE.

I found it thistly fields among,
And rudely strove to wake its charm—
I dearly lov'd the voice of song,
My heart was young, my breast was warm.

I thought but of my lute and love—
I sung of joy with youthful fire,
I fondly thought that life would prove
The music of Apollo's lyre.

A day of sad experience came—
The rapture that my bosom fired
Was but a self-consuming flame—
The dream the lute and love inspired.

Th' enthusiast youth, who, lute, to thee
In pleasure's thoughtless triumph sings,
Though sweet thy jocund melody,
Too soon will weep o'er all thy strings.

Faust on the ear of boy's life
Falls the full, fond, and flowing strain;
Amid its mercenary strife,
Apollo's lute would sound in vain
The world has not a heart to feel;
And love but lives in vision's mood,
Or joins to woe a keener steel,
To pierce the gentle and the good."

Although we had previously formed a favourable opinion of Mr. Carey's poetic talents, yet we confess that opinion has been considerably enhanced by the perusal of the present volume, which contains some beautiful gems of poetry.

Ten Years' Exile; or, Memoirs of this interesting Period of the Life of the Baroness de Staël Holstein, written by herself.

(Concluded from p. 467.)

WHEN Madame de Staël's work on Germany was printed in Paris, though with the permission of the censorship, the minister of Police sent his officers to destroy the whole of the copies, (ten thousand,) and the author was ordered to quit France within three days. She, however, obtained permission to remain a few days longer, to arrange for her departure to America, which she at first determined on, but changed her destination for that of Coppet, her residence in Switzerland:—

"At fifty leagues from the Swiss frontier, France is bristled with citadels, houses of detention, and towns serving as prisons; and every where you see nothing but individuals deprived of their liberty, by the will of one man, conscripts of misfortune, all chained at a distance from the places where they would have wished to live. At Dijon, some Spanish prisoners, who had refused to take the oath, regularly came every day to the market-place to feel the sun at noon, as they then regarded him rather as their countryman; they wrapt themselves up in a mantle, frequently in rags, but which they knew how to wear with grace, and they gazed know not; but such is the love of the marvellous, that we doubt not the 'mysterious circumstance' will be remembered when his explanation is forgotten. The following extract from the Colonel's letter will explain the whole affair. It is addressed to the editor of one of the morning papers:—

"Sir,—The alarm expressed by a lady on seeing me in Westminster Hall on the day of his Majesty's coronation, and the publicity which her ladyship judged it becoming to give to that expression of her alarm by means of your paper, I should have treated with the indifference due to such mock heroics in one of the fair sex, but that it has been copied into other papers with comments and additions, which seemed to me to reflect both upon my conduct and the Highland character. I trust, therefore, to your sense of justice for giving to the public the real history of the 'mysterious circumstance,' as it is termed. I had the honour of a Royal Duke's tickets for my daughter and myself to see his Majesty crowned, and I dressed upon that magnificent and solemn occasion in the full costume of a Highland chief, including, of course, a brace of pistols. I had travelled about six hundred miles for that purpose; and in that very dress, with both pistols mounted, I had the honour to kiss my Sovereign's hand at the Levee of Wednesday last, the 25th instant. Finding one of our seats in the Hall occupied by a lady on our return to the lower gallery (whence I had led my daughter down for refreshments), I, upon replacing her in her former situation, stepped two or three rows further back, and was thus deprived of a view of the mounted noblemen, by the anxiety of the ladies, which induced them to stand up as the horsemen entered, whereupon I moved nearer the upper end of the gallery, and had thereby a full view of his Majesty and the Royal Dukes upon his right hand. I had been standing in this position for some time, with one of the pilasters in the fold of my right arm, and my breast pistol in that hand pointing towards the seat floor on which I stood, when the Champion entered, by which means I hung my body forward in any thing but 'seemingly as if going to present it;'" in fact, I had taken it into my hand in order to relieve my chest from the pressure of its weight, after having worn it slung till then, from four o'clock. It was at this instant that a lady, within a short distance, exclaimed, "O Lord, O Lord, there is a gentleman with a pistol!" to which I answered, "the pistol will do you no harm, Madam;" but a second time she cried out, "O Lord, O Lord, there is a gentleman with a pistol!" This last I answered by assuring her that the pistol was not loaded, but that I would "instantly retire to my place, since it seemed to give her uneasiness;" and I was accordingly preparing to do so, when, accosted by a young knight errant, and closely followed by two others likewise in plain clothes, one of whom, the first that began to mob me, for it merits no other term, laid his hand on my pistol, still grasped, under a loose glove, in my right hand; and, observing the numbers increase on his side, he asked me to deliver him the pistol. Need I say that, as a Highland chieftain, I refused his demand with contempt? The second gentleman then urged his friend's suit, but was equally unsuccessful; a Knight of the Grand Cross was then introduced with all due honours, by the name of Sir Charles, into this petty contention, and he also desired me to give up my pistol to that gentleman; which I flatly refused, but added, that understanding him by dress, &c. to be a Knight of the Grand Cross, he might have it if he chose, with all its responsibility; for, as I had already said, "it was not loaded, and pistols were a part of my national garb in full dress."

After stating the manner in which the Colonel satisfied the parties that his pistols were not loaded, he thus concludes his letter:—

"This, sir, is the whole history of the absurd and ridiculous alarm. Pistols are as essential to the Highlander's courtier's dress, as a sword to the English courtier's, the Frenchman, or the German, and those used by me on such occasions are unstained with powder, as any courtier's sword with blood; it is only the grossest ignorance of the Highland character and costume which could imagine that the assassin lurked under their bold and manly form."

"With respect to the wild fantasy that haunted Lady A.'s brain, of danger to his Majesty, I may be permitted to say, that George the Fourth has not in his dominions more faithful subjects than the Highlanders; and that not an individual witnessed his Majesty's coronation who would more cheerfully and ardently shed his heart's blood for him than —

"Your humble servant,
"not "Macnaughton," but

"ARD-FLATH SIOL-CAUINN MAC-MHIC ALASTAIR, which may be Anglified "Colonel Ronaldson Macdonell, of Glengarry and Clanronald."

"Gordon's Hotel, Albemarle Street,
"July 29."

Colonel Macdonald is, however, we believe, the head of his clan, which is one of the most distinguished in the Highland, and is the same gentleman who erected a monument to perpetuate an act of feudal justice, or rather vengeance, of which we find the following account in a contemporary collection of anecdotes:—

"By the side of a small fountain near the House of Glengarry, in the Highlands of Scotland, a pyramidal monument is to be seen, on the top of which are represented seven heads, with hideous distortion of feature, clutched by the hair in an enormous hand, a sword in which appears as if it had been the instrument of their decollation. On the four sides of the pyramid there is written, in Gaelic, English, French, and Latin, the following inscription:—

'IN MEMORY of the prompt and signal VENGEANCE
which the orders of Lord Macdonell and Aross directed according to the rapid course
of FEUDAL JUSTICE, inflicted on the Authors of the horrible Assassination
of
THE KEPPOCH FAMILY,
a branch of the Powerful and Illustrious Clan, of which his Lordship was the Chieftain.
THIS MONUMENT IS ERRECTED
by
Colonel M'Donnell Glengarry, his Successor and Representative,
the Year of our Lord, 1812.
The Heads of the Seven Murderers were brought TO THE FEET
of the Noble Chieftain, in the House of Glengarry,
after having been washed
in the Fountain:
And since that event, which took place in the first year of the Sixteenth Century, it has always been known by the name of
THE FOUNTAIN OF HEADS.'

'The seven individuals were, it appears, beheaded without any form of trial; circumstances pointed them out as the authors of the crime; and without more ado, the chieftain gave order to his satellites to bring him their heads.' "May my feeble voice," says a French traveller, M. Dupin, "make known this infamous monument from one end of Europe to the other; and may people feel what difference there is between the arbitrary sentences, the prompt, the glorious exterminations of feudal times, and the constitutional judgments of our free juries."

IMPROMPTU

On exchanging Portraits with S—.

You gave me your portrait you know, my dear maid,

And I give you mine—so we're even you see;
But somehow I wish something more than the shade,

Its the substance I want, yes, the substance for me.

If you wish the same, I've a way that ensures
Both wishes' fulfilment—this mighty design Is—if you'll give the substance of this shade of
your's,

I'll give you the substance of that shade of mine.

SONNET TO THE MOON.

SWEET Moon! who growest gently thro' the "sky,"

And givest us the growth of thy white form;
Sweet little tearless infant, born on high,
Secure from sin and cradled o'er the storm:
The last fair child of the old sun's delight,
Permitted of the stars to look on thine
And venture round the purple zone of night,
With that young, soft, endearing face of thine:

Thou teachest us to love thee for thy youth,
Thy beauty, cheerfulness, and chastity;
And may we catch a mirror of the truth
That to thy fount and silver age we see,—
Then, though thou wane into the sky, and space
Enshroud thee, still we bleat thy happy race.

TO ALLAN EDWARDS.

(NOW OF THE WEST INDIES.)

BELOVED, though distant and unseen—
Remembered, though away;
We prize the pleasure which have been,
Nor scorn the mystic sway
Of memory, when she bids us turn
O'er valued friendship's loss to mourn.

The thought of thee is ever dear,
In moments gay or grave:
For when thou wert among us here,
Thy generous spirit gave,
Or tears or smiles, in sympathy,
As either might demanded be.

'Twas gallant at the festive board
Where thou wert wont to sit,
Dispensing from thy mental hoard,
The treasures of thy wit;

O, when shall we again renew
An intercourse so fine and true?

'Twas soothing when the fever's fire
Ran through thy writhing frame,
To see that sickness could not tire,
The soul on wings could tame.
O, then I thought how light were all
The trials that could us befall!

Noble and kind! Long years may fleet,
And we may still be parted;—
But it is not for me to meet
A friend so cordial-hearted:

And Allan Edwards still shall be
A dear and lovely name to me!

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—Mr. Kean has played some of his favourite characters to well-filled houses. His Othello, which is his masterpiece, and is the most complete and finished performance on the stage, attracted a crowded audience, who frequently testified their admiration by the most enthusiastic plaudits. Mr. Cooper sustained the character of Iago, for the first time, and developed talents for which we had scarcely given him credit. His conception of the character was extremely good: Iago is a villain, a deep designing villain, and most performers betray that character so much in their countenances, that Othello must be the re-stiest 'ass that ever browsed a thistle,' to be imposed on by him. Mr. Cooper did better: for while he did not lessen his villainy, he concealed it under the mask of a polished gentleman, whose polite and friendly assurances might naturally work even on a man 'not easily jealous.' We never saw Mr. Cooper to so much advantage, nor Mr. Kean so well supported in the tragedy as on this occasion, and we hope the very excellent manner in which the two most important characters are sustained, will ensure frequent repetitions of the performance.

On Monday, the Queen again visited this theatre, and was received with the accustomed honours. The performance was Richard the Third, and as no play (Othello excepted) abounds with so many passages that may be applied to the unfortunate events of her Majesty's history, a portion of the audience frequently seized on them, to the great annoyance of those who only went to see the play. Some of the daily papers have, with bad taste, enumerated these allusions, which can have no other effect than keeping alive party feeling, and perpetuating the recollection of events which it would be well to bury in eternal oblivion. Her Majesty appeared to be much pleased with the performance, and to be fully sensible of the noisy honours heaped upon her.

On Wednesday night, a fac-simile (as far as the limits of a stage would permit it) of his Majesty's coronation was produced at this theatre, with unexampled splendour and effect. We have long been led to look to Covent Garden Theatre for spectacle, but in the present instance the palm must be given to Old Drury, whose lessee, Mr. Elliston, has far outstripped his rivals in this grand pageant, which has been got up with great cost and with minute exactness. The costume of the different classes in the procession, from the King down to the choristers, has been attended to and copied with singular fidelity. The spectacle opens with an admirable view of the Centre Pavilion; the platform is in front, and behind it are seen the soldiers, the groups in the pavilion, the spire of St. Margaret's church, and a part of Westminster Abbey. The procession along the platform was very fine, but rather too long, though the enlivening airs that were played, and the variety of dresses and personages, prevented any thing like tedium. The next scene represented the interior of Westminster Abbey, where Mr. Elliston, who personated the monarch with great dignity, went through the ceremony of crowning and investing with all the insignia of sovereignty. To allow time for arranging the last scene, a sort of interlude was introduced, in which Knight personated a countryman, and sung a loyal song, which was encored. The last scene was the banquet, and it was splendid beyond description in every point of view. Whether we consider the manner in which it is painted, the brilliancy with which it is illuminated, or the elegance with which the tables are decorated, it strikes us as being one of the most superb scenes ever exhibited in a theatre. The Champion, attended by the Lord High Constable and the Lord High Steward, each mounted on a very fine horse, and preceded by heralds, pass along a platform raised in the centre of the pit to the stage, where the ceremony of the challenge is gone through. The Champion managed his horse extremely well, and this was the most pleasing part of the ceremony. The splendid scene concludes with the national air of God Save the King. The house was crowded, and the spectacle loudly cheered during the whole of its progress. Great praise is due to Mr. Elliston for the liberal manner in which he has got up this splendid pageant, and we doubt not but he will be munificently rewarded in the public patronage.

GOVERNMENT GARDEN.—The success of the coronation additions to the play of Henry VIII. has induced the managers to keep the theatre open a few days longer than was intended; it will, however, close on Tuesday next. The winter theatres keeping open in the dog-days, is a sad encroachment upon their more humble but equally respectable neighbours, the Haymarket Theatre and English Opera House, which is certainly in subversion of that good old proverbial maxim—'Live and let live.'

ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.—On Monday evening, a new musical drama was produced at this theatre, entitled The Witch of Darnley. It is a new version of the celebrated romance of Guy Mannering, and differs very materially from the play of that name, which has been so long popular. Some of the daily papers express great astonishment that any one should venture on dramatizing a subject which was already so familiar and so popular; but they must have a singular knowledge of the novel of Guy Mannering, if

And stand erect upon his feet as I do,—
And if it lik'd him, less against the fence,
This simple exercise of mere volition
To action moving his somnolent powers,
Might in the reptile work a glorious change;
But how, by what intricate combination
Obscure or obvious of involved modes,
Reader, I leave for thy own cogitation;—
I do but start a slumbering thought or two,
And those who like may hunt 'em down for me.

By this the sun rode high; it might be noon,
But I did not consult my watch—my watch
Is not wound up so often as it might be,
And might, indeed, as well remain unwound,
For it keeps time about as carefully
As doth a sieve keep water—but no matter;
The man who stireth him upon the mountains,
Or in the valleys under open sky,
Needs not the aid of curious instrument
To warn him how time passes—no; he beareth
In his own breast a faithful monitor

Which duly indicates the hour of noon—
Yea, more especially if he should labour,
And labour by the day, he is most certain
To hit the hour of noon before the time;
For the delightful intertwined ideas
Of noon and dinner in the labourer's mind,
Like man and wife, are never to be parted.
And why is this? To say the man is hungry,
Is to say nothing, or at best, no more.
Than that he longs for something unpossess'd—
A common case—and therefore longeth he?
A question this, important and abstruse;
But peradventure it may be resolved
In some such way as this: we may behold
In the outward world no vacuum—all is full Of life and matter, multiform and mix'd, Sentient and senseless, and may hence conclude,

That in the little world of man, the region,
Call'd in the pugilist's vocabulary,
Bread basket, (term significant and neat),
Eachweeth mightily all emptiness.

And further, we may readily perceive
Within us and without us all is motion;
One spirit of activity pervades,
With purposeless energy, all forms of being,
And analogically may infer,
That the prime agent in the aforesaid basket,
The gastric fluid, hateth idleness—
And finding nothing wherewithal to work,
Like famish'd tiger, falls upon its keeper,
And suffereth not the honest man to rest
Till he hath got his dinner—I'll get mine.

EXIT.

SIR WALTER SCOTT'S DESCRIPTION OF THE CORONATION.

[So much has already appeared on the splendid ceremonial of the coronation, that we had determined to devote our columns to subjects which had not been so amply discussed. We are, however, induced to deviate from the course we had fixed, and we trust the occasion will justify us; since, whether the account we now present to our readers be by Sir Walter Scott or not, it is certainly from a much abler pen than any that has written on the subject, and it is well deserving a more important place than the ephemeral columns of a newspaper can give it. The letter which we subjoin, first appeared in the Edinburgh Journal, from which it was quoted in some other Scotch papers, as the undoubted production of Sir Walter Scott; and, indeed, it has rather strong internal evidence of having proceeded from his pen.]

London, July 20.

SIR,—I refer you to the daily papers for the details of the great national solemnity which we witnessed yesterday, and will hold my promise absolved by sending a few general remarks upon what I saw with surprise, amounting to astonishment, and which I shall never forget. It is, indeed, impossible to conceive a ceremony more august and imposing in all its parts, and more calculated to make the deepest impression both on the eye and on the feelings. The most minute attention must have been bestowed to arrange all the subordinate parts in harmony with the rest; so that, amongst so much antiquated ceremonial, imposing singular dresses, duties; and characters, upon persons accustomed to move in the ordinary routine of society, nothing occurred either awkward or ludicrous, which could mar the general effect of the solemnity. Considering that it is but one step from the sublime to the ridiculous, I own I consider it as surprising that the whole ceremonial of the day should have passed away without the slightest circumstance which could derange the general tone of solemn feeling which was suited to the occasion. You must have heard a full account of the only disagreeable event of the day. I mean the attempt of the misguided Lady who has lately furnished so many topics of discussion, to intrude herself upon a ceremonial, where, not being in her proper place, to be present in any other must have been voluntary degradation. The matter is a fire of straw, which has now burned to the very embers; and those who try to blow it into life again, will only blacken their hands and noses, like mischievous children dabbling among the ashes of a bonfire. It seems singular, that being determined to be present at all hazards, this unfortunate personage should not have procured a peer's ticket, which, I presume, would have insured her admittance. I willingly pass to pleasanter matters.

The effect of the scene in the Abbey was beyond measure magnificent. Imagine long galleries stretched among the aisles of that venerable and august pile—those which rise above the altar peeling back their echoes to a full and magnificent choir of music—those which occupied the sides filled even to crowding, with all that Britain has of beautiful and distinguished, and the cross-galleries most appropriately occupied by the Westminster school boys, in their white surplices, many of whom might on that day receive impressions never to be lost during the rest of their lives. Imagine this, I say, and then add the spectacle upon the floor—the altar surrounded by the fathers of the church—the King encircled by the nobility of the land and the counsellors of his throne, and by warriors wearing the honoured marks of distinction bought by many a glorious danger; add to this the rich spectacle of the aisles, crowded with waving plumage, and coronets, and caps of honour; and the sun, which brightened and saddened as if on purpose, now beaming in full lustre on the rich and varied assemblage, and now darting a solitary ray, which caught, as it passed, the glittering folds of a banner or the edge of a group of battle-axes or partizans, and then rested full on some fair form, 'the cynosure of neighboring eyes,' whose circlet of diamonds glistened under its influence; imagine all this, and then tell me if I have made my journey of four hundred miles to little purpose. I do not love your cui bono men, and, therefore, I will not be pleased if you ask me, in the damping tone of sullen philosophy, what good all this has done the spectators? If we restrict life to its real animal wants and necessities, we shall, indeed, be satisfied with 'food, clothes, and fire'; but Divine Providence, who widened our sources of enjoyment beyond those of the animal creation, never meant that we should bound our wishes within such narrow limits; and I shrewdly suspect that those non est tanti gentlefolks only depreciate the natural and unaffected pleasure which men like me receive from sights of splendour and sounds of harmony, either because they would seem wiser than their simple neighbours, at the expense of being less happy, or because the mere pleasure of the sight and sound is connected with associations of a deeper kind, to which they are unwilling to yield themselves.

Leaving these gentlemen to enjoy their own wisdom, I still more pity those, if there be any, who (being unable to detect a peg on which to hang a laugh) sneer coldly at this solemn festival, and are rather disposed to dwell on the expense which attends it, than on the generous feelings which it ought to awaken. The expense, so far as it is national, has gone directly and instantly to the encouragement of the British manufacturer and mechanic; and so far as it is personal, to the persoas of rank, attendant upon the coronation, it operates as a tax upon wealth and consideration, for the benefit of poverty and industry; a tax willingly paid by the one class, and not the less acceptable to the other, because it adds a happy holiday to the monotony of a life of labour.

But there were better things to reward my pilgrimage than the mere pleasures of the eye and ear; for it was impossible, without the deepest veneration, to behold the voluntary and solemn interchange of vows between the King and his assembled people, whilst he on the one hand called God Almighty to witness his resolution to maintain their laws and privileges, while they called, at the same moment, on the Divine Being, to bear witness that they accepted him for their liege sovereign, and pledged to him their love and their duty. I cannot describe to you the effect produced by the solemn, yet strange mixture of the words of Scripture, with the shouts and acclamations of the assembled multitude, as they answered to the voice of the prelate, who demanded of them whether they acknowledged as their monarch the prince who claimed the sovereignty in their presence? It was peculiarly delightful to see the King receive from the royal brethren, but in particular from the Duke of York, the fraternal kiss, in which they acknowledged their sovereign. There was an honest tenderness, an affectionate and sincere reverence, in the embrace interchanged between the Duke of York and his Majesty, that approached almost to a caress, and impressed all present with the electrical conviction, that the nearest to the throne in blood, was the nearest also in affection. I never heard plaudits given more from the heart than those that were thundered upon the royal brethren when they were thus pressed to each other's bosoms—it was an emotion of natural kindness, which, bursting out amidst ceremonial grandeur, found an answer in every British bosom. The King seemed much affected at this and one or two other parts of the ceremonial; even so much so, as to excite some alarm among those who saw him as nearly as I did. He completely recovered himself, however, and bore, (generally speaking,) the fatigue of the day very well. I learn, from one near his person, that he roused himself with great energy, even when most oppressed with heat and fatigue, when any of the more interesting parts of the ceremony were to be performed, or when any thing occurred which excited his personal and immediate attention. When presiding at the banquet, amid the long line of his nobles, he looked 'every inch a king,' and nothing could exceed the grace with which he accepted and returned the various acts of homage rendered to him in the course of that long day.

It was also a very gratifying spectacle to those who think like me, to behold the Duke of Devonshire and most of the distinguished Whig nobility, assembled round the throne on this occasion; giving an open testimony that the differences of political opinions are only skin-deep wounds, which assume at times an ugly appearance, but have no real effect on the wholesome constitution of the country.

If you ask me to distinguish who bore him best, and appeared most to sustain the character we annex to the assistants in such a solemnity, I have no hesitation to name Lord Londonderry, who, in the magnificent robes of the garter, with the cap and high plume of the order, walked alone; and, by his fine face and majestic person, formed an adequate representative of the order of Edward III. the costume of which was worn by his lordship only. The Duke of Wellington, with all his laurels, moved and looked deserving the baton, which was never grasped by so worthy a hand. The Marquis of Anglessea shewed the most exquisite grace in managing his horse, notwithstanding the want of his limb, which he left at Waterloo. I never saw so fine a bridle-hand in my life, and I am rather a judge of 'noble horsemanship.' Lord Howard's horse was worse bitten than those of the two former noblemen, but not so much so as to derange the ceremony of retiring back out of the hall.

The champion was performed (as of right) by young Dymoke, a fine-looking youth, but bearing, perhaps, a little too much the appearance of a mailen knight, to be the challenger of the world in a king's behalf. He threw down his gauntlet, however, with becoming manhood, and shewed as much horsemanship as the crowd of knights and squires around him would permit to be exhibited. His armour was in good taste, but his shield was out of all propriety, being a round rondache, or Highland target—a defensive weapon, which it would have been impossible to use on horseback, instead of being a three-corned, or heater-shield, which, in time of the tilt, was suspended round the neck. Pardon this antiquarian scruple, which, you may believe, occurred to few but myself. On the whole, this striking part of the exhibition somewhat disappointed me, for I would have had the champion less embarrassed by his assistants, and at liberty to put his horse on the grand pas. And yet the young Lord of Scrivenby looked and behaved extremely well.

Returning to the subject of costume, I could not but admire what I had previously been disposed much to criticize—I mean the fancy-dress of the privy-councillors, which was of white and blue satin, with trunk-hose and mantlet, after the fashion of Queen Elizabeth's time. Separately, so gay a garb had an odd effect on the persons of elderly or ill-made men; but when the whole was thrown into one general body, all these discrepancies disappeared, and you no more observed the particular manner or appearance of an individual, than you do that of a soldier in the battalion which marches past you. The whole was so completely harmonized in actual colouring, as well as in association with the general mass of gay and gorgeous and antique dress which floated before the eye, that it was next to impossible to attend to the effect of individual figures. Yet a Scotsman will detect a Scotsman amongst the most crowded assemblage, and I must say, that the Lord Justice Clerk of Scotland shewed to as great advantage in his robes of privy councillor, as any by whom that splendid dress was worn on this great occasion. The common court-dress used by the privy councillors at the last coronation, must have had a poor effect in comparison of the present, which formed a gradation in the scale of gorgeous ornament, from the unwieldy splendour of the heralds, who glowed like huge masses of cloth of gold and silver, to the more chastened robes and ermine of the peers. I must not forget the effect produced by the peers placing their coronets on their heads, which was really august.

The box assigned to the foreign ambassadors presented a most brilliant effect, and was perfectly in a blaze with diamonds. When the sunshine lighted on Prince Esterhazy, in particular, he glimmered like a galaxy. I cannot learn positively if he had on that renowned coat which has visited all the courts of Europe, save ours, and is said to be worth 100,000*l.* or some such trifle, and which costs the prince 100*l.* or two every time he puts it on, as he is sure to lose pearls to that amount.

This was a hussar dress, but splendid in the last degree; perhaps too fine for good taste,—at least it would have appeared so any where else. Beside the prince sat a good-humoured lass, who seemed all eyes and ears, (his daughter-in-law, I believe,) who wore as many diamonds as if they had been Bristol stones. An honest Persian was also a remarkable figure, from the dogged and imperturbable gravity with which he looked on the whole scene, without ever moving a limb or a muscle during the space of four hours. Like Sir Witful Witwood, I cannot find that your Persian is orthodox; for if he scorned everything else, there was a Mahometan paradise extended on his right hand, along the seats which were occupied by the peeresses and their daughters, which the prophet himself might have looked on with emotion. I have seldom seen so many elegant and beautiful girls as sat mingled among the noble matrons of the land; and the waving plumage of feathers, which made the universal head-dress, have the most appropriate effect in setting off their charms.

I must not omit that the foreigners, who are apt to consider us a nation en froc, and without the usual ceremonials of dress and distinction, were utterly astonished and delighted to see the revival of feudal dresses and feudal grandeur when the occasion demanded it; and that in a degree of splendour which they avowed they had never seen paralleled in Europe.

The duties of service at the banquet, and of attendance in general, were performed by pages, dressed very elegantly in Henri Quatre coats of scarlet, with gold lace; blue sashes, white silk hose, and white rosettes. There were also marshal's men for keeping order, who wore a similar dress, but of blue, and having white sashes. Both departments were filled up almost entirely by young gentlemen, many of them of the very first condition, who took these menial characters to gain admission to the show. When I saw many of my young acquaintance thus attending upon their fathers and kinsmen, the peers, knights, and so forth, I could not help thinking of Crabbe's lines, with a little alteration,—

‘Twas schooling pride to see the menial wait,
Smile on his father, and receive his plate.’

It must be owned, however, that they proved but indifferent valets, and were very apt, like the clown in the pantomime, to eat the beer they should have handed to their masters, and to play other tour de page, which reminded me of the caution of our proverb, ‘not to man yourself with your kin.’ The peers, for example, had only a cold collation, while the aldermen of London feasted on venison and turtle; and such similar errors necessarily befel others in the confusion of the evening. But these slight mistakes, which indeed were not known till afterwards, had not the slightest effect on the general grandeur of the scene.

I did not see the procession between the Abbey and the Hall. In the morning a few voices called, ‘Queen! Queen!’ as Lord Londonderry passed, and even when the sovereign appeared. But these were only signals for the loud and reiterated acclamations, in which these tones of discontent were completely drowned. In the return, no one dissonant voice intimated the least dissent from the shouts of gratulation which poured from every quarter; and certainly never monarch received a more general welcome.

You will have from others full accounts of the variety of entertainments provided for John Bull in the parks, the river, in the theatres, and elsewhere. Nothing was to be seen or heard but sounds of pleasure and festivity; and whoever saw the scene at any one spot, was convinced that the whole population of London was assembled there, while others found a similar concourse of revelers in every different point. It is computed, that about five hundred thousand people shared in the festival, in one way or another; and you may imagine the excellent disposition by which the people were animated, when I tell you, that, excepting a few windows broken by a small body-guard of ragamuffins, who were in immediate attendance on the Great Lady in the morning, not the slightest political violence occurred to disturb the general harmony, and that the assembled populace seemed to be universally actuated by the spirit of the day; namely, loyalty and good-humour. Nothing occurred to damp those happy dispositions; the weather was most propitious, and the arrangements so perfect, that no accident of any kind is reported as having taken place. And so concluded the coronation of George IV. whom God long preserve. Those who witnessed it have seen a scene calculated to raise the country in their opinion, and to throw into the shade all scenes of similar magnificence, from the field of the cloth of gold down to the present day.

AN EYE-WITNESS.

AERONAUTIC EXCURSIONS OF MR. GREEN.

‘Thus did of old the adventurous Cretan dare,
With wings not given to man, attempt the air.’

In the darkness of the middle ages, every man distinguished by superior knowledge was supposed to possess the power of flying in the air; the idea soon descended to a lower class of projectors, many of whom perished in their unskilful attempts. So early as the reign of Harold, in the eleventh century, Elmer, a monk of Malmesbury, made one of these dangerous experiments, and in the true spirit of an inventor, though he failed, still he believed it possible to succeed. Milton, in his History of Britain, speaking of this monk, says,—‘He in his youth strangely aspiring, had made and fitted wings to his hands and feet; with these on the top of a tower, spread out to gather air, he flew more than a furlong; but the wind being too high, he came fluttering down to the maiming of all his limbs: yet so conceited was he of his art, that he attributed the cause of his fall to the want of a tail, as birds have, which he forgot to make to his hinder parts.’

We need not however go so far back as the middle ages, since, so late as the year 1755, a fanciful scheme on the grandest scale for navigating the atmosphere was made by one Joseph Galien, a Dominican Friar at Avignon. This visionary proposed to collect the fine diffuse air of the higher regions, where hail is formed, above the summit of the loftiest mountains, and to enclose it in a bag of a cubical shape and of the most enormous dimensions, extending a mile every way and composed of the thickest sail cloth. With such a vast machine for outrivaling in the boldness and magnitude the ark of Noah, he thought it would be possible to transport a whole army through the air with all their munitions of war.

Men of science had long been acquainted with the principles on which a balloon could be conducted, but it was reserved for Stephen and Joseph Montgolfier, sons of the proprietor of an extensive paper manufactory at Annouay in France, to reduce these principles to complete effect. The first public ascent of a balloon was exhibited at their native town on the 5th of June, 1783. They afterwards constructed one on a larger scale at Paris, which reached the height of 1500 feet. A sheep, a cock, and a duck which had been put into the basket, the first animals ever carried up in the air, were found perfectly safe, and unhurt by the journey, and the sheep was even feeding at perfect ease.

The first aërial voyage ever made by man was on the 21st of November, 1783, when Pilatre de Rozier a young, naturalist of great promise, accompanied by the Marquess d'Arlandes, ascended from the Chateau de Murette. When the balloon was launched, wonder mixed with anxiety was depicted in every countenance, but when, from their lofty station in the sky, the navigators calmly waved their hats, and saluted the spectators below, a general shout of acclamation burst forth on all sides. As they rose much higher, however, they were no longer visible to the naked eye: they

"in the surging smoke Uplifted spurn the ground; thence many a legue,
As in a cloudy chair ascending, rise,
Audacious."

This balloon soared to an elevation of more than 3000 feet, and traversed by a circuitous route the whole of Paris. The daring aeronauts, after a journey of twenty-four or twenty-five minutes, in which they described a track of six miles, safely alighted beyond the Boulevards.

Such was the prosperous issue of the first aerial navigation ever performed by mortals; it was a conquest of science, which all the world could understand. Other experiments were now made in rapid succession, and some of the adventurers soared to the immense height of thirteen thousand feet.

Of the history of balloons since that period little remains to be said; for neither in their construction nor in the manner of steering them, has there been much improvement, though aerial ascents have been frequent in every country of Europe. One of the most successful of English aeronauts was Mr. Sadler, who has made many very successful ascents from the metropolis and other large towns. It is, however, we believe, five or six years since any balloon ascended from London, until the day of his Majesty's coronation, when Mr. Charles Green, of Goswell Street, made an ascent from the Green Park under rather novel circumstances.

From a variety of experiments, Mr. Green became persuaded that common gas would answer the purpose of aerostation, and though several men of science endeavoured to dissuade him from the trial, he determined to make it. The balloon in which he ascended was thirty-one feet in diameter, as nearly the size as possible of the one with which Garnerin first made an ascension in England. It was inflated with about 1900 cubic feet of carbonated hydrogen gas, supplied from the pipes of the original gas company. The day was remarkably fine, and the ascent, which was a very fine one, gave much delight to the countless thousands who were assembled in various parts of the metropolis. The balloon remained a considerable time in sight, when Mr. Green having thrown out some ballast, he

"With fresh alacrity, and force renewed,
Sprung upward, like a pyramid of fire,
Into the wild expanse!"

and, after traversing the air for forty-five minutes, he descended in a field about four miles from Barnet, in the parish of South Mimms, having, as he calculates, travelled altogether, in various directions, upwards of fifty miles. The following extract from Mr. Green's own narrative of his aerial voyage, is interesting:—

"About five minutes before one o'clock the ropes were divided; and having taken my seat in the car, the balloon rose in a majestic manner, nearly perpendicularly. The almost deafening shouts of the populace, and the roar of canon that took place when I had ascended a considerable distance from the earth, agitated the balloon. I felt the effect of it most sensibly. The moment the discharge of cannon took place, I knew it was the signal to be given when the crown was set upon the head of my most gracious Sovereign, and I drew the cork of a bottle of brandy, and, having poured out a full glass, I drank 'health, long life, and a glorious reign to his Majesty.' The effect of the air upon the brandy is worthy of notice: when I drew the cork, a report took place, which I attribute to the rarification of the air, similar to that produced by drawing a cork out of a bottle of soda-water. When the balloon travelled at its greatest rapidity, I felt not the least motion; it appeared as if the car in which I sat was stationary, and that the earth was receding from me. The balloon took a north-east direction at first; and on my looking down upon the vast assemblage of persons in Westminster, the delight I felt is out of my power to describe. The view presented one entire living mass of more than a million of human beings. Having ascended as high as I could without throwing out ballast, I determined, as the weather was so fine, to keep in sight as long as possible. I threw out two bags of sand of 10lbs. weight each, and immediately the balloon rose with astonishing rapidity almost perpendicularly, according to my wish. When the balloon arrived at its utmost altitude, which, in my opinion (I could not be certain, in consequence of the oscillation of the quicksilver in the barometer), was about eleven thousand feet from the earth, I found that I had entered a current of air, conveying me directly eastward, towards the North. The cold was extreme. I put on a cloak which I took up with me, and on looking at my glass I found that it was below 30—two degrees below the freezing point. I was fearful of being carried to sea, and immediately opened the valve; the gas issued in considerable quantities; and I found, by the increase of the size of objects below me to my optics, that I was descending very rapidly. The largest fields, which a few minutes before appeared to be not more than six inches square, increased in size greatly; and I very soon saw the sea and a number of vessels most distinctly. The balloon had a rotatory motion, and turned about four times in a minute."

On Wednesday, Mr. Green made a second ascent in the same balloon, from the Belvidere Tavern, Pentonville. It was again filled with common gas. At half past three o'clock, Mr. Green having taken his seat in the car, the cords were cut, and the balloon rose in a majestic manner amidst the shouts of an immense number of persons who had assembled. After remaining nearly stationary for a short time at the height of about 700 feet, Mr. Green threw out some ballast, and the balloon was soon lost to human view. The daring aeronaut traversed the air for half an hour, and then descended at Barking, without the slightest injury to himself or his aerial machine.

MACDONNELL OF GLENGARRY.

A day or two after the coronation, the newspapers, with great gravity, related a 'mysterious circumstance' which occurred, and which may, at some future period, figure in a romance or a melo-drama. At the coronation of George III. when a lady accidentally dropped a white glove in the hall, it was considered as a defiance to the Champion's challenge; and as nobody but the Pretender could be supposed to dispute the king's title to the crown, it was taken for granted that he must have been there; as stories gain in telling, the supposition was converted into an assertion, and it was stated that a nobleman actually recognized the Pretender in petticoats. What turn may hereafter be given to Colonel Macdonnell's appearance in the gallery, in the costume of a Highland chieftain, we

they are ignorant that it affords an ample field for half-a-dozen dramas essentially different, but all deeply interesting. The Witch of Derneleugh, which is from the pen of a young author of considerable promise, Mr. Planché, adheres much more closely to the original work, both in the incidents and language, than the drama of Guy Raverling: the Scotch manners are more faithfully imitated, and some of the characters even speak the Scottish dialect, though not in a manner that would give it any additional recommendation to a North Briton. The hero and heroine, Dirk Hatternick and Meg Merrieries, resume the important station they hold in the novel, and, from the powerful manner in which they are represented, they are prominent characters indeed. In the former, Mr. T. P. Cooke not only spoke like a Dutchman, who had learned the English language, but displayed all that daring ferocity which might be supposed to belong to the head of a desperate gang of smugglers, who possessed physical powers to give effect to his courage. His scene with Glossin, when he reproaches him with his villainy and his cowardice, and makes him promise to give him a thousand guineas, as an indemnity for the loss of his cargo, was admirable; nor was he less in character in his interview with Meg Merrieries, when his vengeance was restrained by the threat, that if he killed her, 'he would have but an hour to rue it.' It was not the dread of a common death, but the awe which the supernatural influence of which he supposed the witch of Derneleugh possessed, that worked upon him. Miss Kelly sustained the part of Meg Merrieries, and although we cannot congratulate her on her Scottish dialect, yet we must say this was the only drawback on a performance that was otherwise perfect. The Meg Merrieries of Miss Kelly was a drawing of her own conception, or rather a faithful portrait of the character as drawn in the novel. It differed from all those that have been presented to us by other actresses; it was a prominent, bold, and just colouring given to every part of this original portrait. She gave an awe-inspiring power to her supernatural agency; she commanded, she threatened, like a superior being, and was obeyed. The manner, the tone, and energy with which she brought to light the just claims of Ellengowan's heir, electrified and delighted the audience. It reminded us of some of those exquisite bursts of impassioned feeling with which Mrs. Siddons was wont to display her unrivalled powers in the sublime parts of tragedy. It is hardly necessary to observe, that every part of her performance drew forth loud and continued applause. From the manner in which we have spoken of the two principal characters, their tendency to throw the rest in the shade will be easily conceived; they were, however, performed very respectably. Wilkinson was amusing in Domine Sampson. Pearman and Broadhurst sung some pretty airs, which were much applauded. Glossin was well represented by Mr. Bennet, and Mr. Salter played the part of Dandie Dimmont with great spirit. The scenery is pretty, and the piece was received with unmixed applause.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—This house has been extremely well attended through the week, and a succession of popular pieces have been played with good taste and spirit. In the comedy of Exchange no Robbery, Mr. Oxberry joined the company, and convulsed the audience with laughter by his facetious representation of Sam Swipes.—Captain Littleworth was played by Mr. Horrebow, from a provincial theatre; his figure is well fitted for the character of a youthful naval hero; he represents the gentleman with natural ease, and his expression is distinct and appropriate; but we must see him in characters of a more difficult description, before we can decide upon his general merits.

SADLER'S WELLS.—This compact little theatre continues to enjoy a strong share of the public favour. The Heart of Mid-Lothian has proved very attractive, and a new melo-drama has been produced, which displays, among other novelties, the vast sheet of water peculiar to this house, upon which the storming of a castle is exhibited with good effect.

Literature and Science.

The Northern Expedition.—As every thing relating to our adventurous countrymen, now endeavouring to solve the great geographical question of a North-West Passage, cannot but excite interest, we readily add the following extracts of letters from officers attached to the expedition, in addition to the early information contained in our last:—

'His Majesty's ship Fury, Davis's Straits, June 30, 1821.

'MY DEAR SIR,—The transport Nautilus, which has accompanied us thus far on our voyage, is about to return to the Thames, where she is expected to arrive about the end of July. I gladly avail myself of the opportunity she affords of acknowledging the receipt of your kind letter of the 29th of April, and also of the account of the Tonga Islands. For these, and your good wishes for our welfare, I beg you to accept my most sincere thanks.

The perusal of that work has already afforded me pleasure and much information, and should we be so happy as to effect the so-long doubted passage into the Pacific, it may render us invaluable assistance. In that event, we should doubtless visit many of the islands that are washed by that immense ocean. At the Sandwich Islands we should certainly refresh and rest for the homeward voyage; but the Tonga Islands (which Mr. Mariner's Narrative has made doubly inviting) I fear, will be out of our track, whether we return home by circumnavigating the new world, or by passing through the Indian Ocean and round the Cape of Good Hope, and so making a circuit of the globe.

Hitherto, our voyage has been unmarked by any incident. We arrived at the edge of the ice, about forty miles from Hudson's Straits, on the 18th instant; since that period we have been employed in emptying the transport, an operation much impeded by a prevalence of cold dense fogs and boisterous weather. We enter the ice in prosecution of our voyage immediately; its comparative thinness in this latitude does not promise to offer us much resistance, and we may calculate upon arriving at the north-east end of Southampton Island by the 1st August. About these parts, of which our geographical knowledge is very confused, there is the greatest probability of finding the true coast of Continental America, which, if found, we expect will lead us eventually into the Pacific. The obstacles which oppose a successful navigation of such a coast are, however, too many and obvious to warrant an unbounded confidence of success. The general feeling is sanguine; and if, by the blessing of Providence, our timbers should hold together, I do not despair of dating the next letter I shall have the pleasure of writing to you from Kamschatka.

In the mean while, wishing the enjoyment of health, and all the good things we leave behind, I remain,

'My dear sir, yours, &c.

*'JOHN EDWARD, Surgeon of the Fury.
'To Dr. Martin, Registrar of the Royal Humane Society.'*

The following is an extract of a letter from another officer attached to the expedition, and is of the same date:—

'To-morrow we commence with the ice, and enter Hudson's Straits as soon as possible, keeping the north shore on board, until we reach (Middleton's) Repulse Bay. After examining that, we proceed to the Frozen Straits, where our greatest hopes of success lie, and where we expect to find an opening that communicates with Prince Regent's Inlet of last voyage. Should this prove to be the case, Captain Parry is almost sure of making the passage, because we cannot be led farther to the northward than 70 or 71; consequently, we shall have a long summer and a less thickness of ice to contend with. Should, however, all these our hopes and conjectures prove otherwise, we must go to the old road (Lancaster Sound), and endeavour, by keeping the south shore on board, to get on the Continent. If we find that so much of this year is expended in examining Hudson's Straits, as to leave but little hopes of doing any thing beyond getting into Lancaster Sound, we are ordered to return to England to refit and victual the ship; but a great deal is left to the discretion of Captain Parry, whom we place every confidence in. The transport leaves us completed with three years' full allowance of every thing, with 118 chaldrons of coals in the Fury, and about 120 in the Hecla; they are both so deep, that if a gale comes on before we get sheltered among the ice, I am afraid some damage will be done. Hitherto we have been very fortunate, the Hecla's having lost a boat, being the only damage sustained since our leaving Deptford. Both crews are very healthy, and, I am happy to say, seem very well-behaved men.

The Antarctic Islands.—Vessels from the lands situated to the south of Cape Horn, have arrived in different ports, with cargoes of seal skins. The regions visited by the New York navigators, lie in about the latitude of 62 deg. where vegetable life is so rare, that a little grass, in a few favoured places, and some moss on the rocks, are all the forms of it that exist. The dreary climate exhibits, during the entire summer, perpetual snow and ice; nor tree, nor even shrub appears.

The minerals brought home by Mr. B. Astor, are partly primitive and partly volcanic. The samples produced by Dr. Mitchell are—1. Quartz, in compact and crystallized forms. 2. Amethyst, in crystals. 3. Porphyry, in small masses. 4. Rough onyx, in pebbles. 5. Lumps of coarse flint. 6. Elegant Zeolite, like that of the Ferro group, in the North Atlantic Ocean. 7. Pumice stone. 8. Pyrites, surcharged with sulphur.

The manuscript chart made by Mr. Hampton Stewart, is an instructive addition to geography, and ought to be incorporated in the charts of the globe. Geologists will learn with surprise, that the high grounds and summits of the rocks in several of the spots that have been visited, are strewn with skeletons of whales, and relics of other marine animals, leading to a belief that the whole of the materials have been hove up by the operation of volcanic fire, from the depths of the ocean.

Further disclosures of the natural constitution of this curious region, are expected with impatience from future adventurers. There appears to be a wide field for new and original observation.

It is also hoped we shall soon receive a more full and satisfactory account of the Terra Australis, or continent of the southern hemisphere, occupying the vast space between the tracts already surveyed and the pole.—New York Gazette of May 8.

LORD BYRON'S NEW POEM.

Don Juan, Cantos III., IV., and V., 8vo. pp. 318. London, 1821.

THERE is no living poet half so popular as Lord Byron, nor is there any effort of his muse that has been so much read or so severely censured as the first two cantos of Don Juan. The mysterious announcement of 'Don Juan in a few days;' the brief title page of only sixteen words; the want of a publisher's name to the work, and the stanzas of asterisks, which were supposed to have marked the curtailments, all tended to give an additional interest, and to excite an unusual degree of curiosity respecting the poem. It was universally read, much admired, often abused, expelled from reading rooms and book-societies, proscribed at boarding-schools, abjured by married men, and read in secret by their wives throughout the whole kingdom. The price at which it was first published was some restraint on public curiosity, but as the copy-right was not secured, pirated editions gratified most abundantly the avidity of the reading world, and made his lordship's poetry and his morals most extensively known.

The volume now before us is a continuation of the adventures of that vicious libertine, Don Juan; but, before we enter upon the story, we shall say a word or two on some recent attacks upon his lordship. A gentleman, who can do better things, has devoted, or rather sacrificed about a dozen pages in a contemporary journal, to expose what he calls the plagiarisms of Lord Byron; the exposure has, however, recoiled on himself, and shown his weakness and ill-nature. He tells us that his lordship has transferred whole lines into his productions from the poem of Dr. Young,—that the plagiarisms from this author are 'numerous and palpable beyond all precedent;' and yet there is but one whole line from Young in the passages he has quoted. The use of a couple of words in succession is urged as an instance of Vol. III.

plagiarism: and so little does this hypocritical appear to know the meaning of words, that he says Lord Byron's expression in Manfred, that 'sorrow is knowledge,' is a plagiarism from a passage in the Night Thoughts, that 'knowing is suffering.'

But we turn from this petty nibbling to a more formidable accuser, in the last number of the Monthly Magazine, who, in a much better spirit than the gentleman we have noticed, points out plagiarisms really palpable. They occur in the first part of Don Juan, where the description of the storm and shipwreck is a sort of verification of the technical phrases used in describing similar scenes in prose, in a work intitled 'Shipwrecks and Disasters at Sea.' It is, however, merely in description, that his lordship has copied this work, and that so palpably, that he could not expect to conceal it: take, for example, the following:—

'The pumps, to the excellence of which I owe my life, were made by Mr. Mann, of London.'

'Loss of the ship Hercules.'

'But for the pumps; I'm glad to make them known
To all the brother tars that may have need
hence;
For fifty tons of water were upthrown
By them per hour, and they had all been undone
But, for the maker, Mr. Mann, of London.'

His lordship, in a note to the fifth canto of Don Juan, has observed, 'that a poet had better borrow any thing (except money) than the thoughts of another—they are always sure to be reclaimed.' We agree with his lordship, and notwithstanding all that has been said of his plagiarisms, it is not proved that he has borrowed one of the brilliant thoughts with which all his poems abound; and until this shall be proved against him, he will still remain the Mount Atlas of English poetry,—

'Though storms and tempests thunder on its brow,
And oceans break their billows at its feet;
It stands unmoved, and glories in its height.'

In our notice of Don Juan, see Literary Chronicle, No. 10, we said his lordship's description of the storm was 'tedious, and not in the author's happiest manner.'—Rev.

Though there was a great deal of genius displayed, and much fine poetry in the first two cantos of Don Juan, yet we thought it inferior to his lordship's other productions, and we are of the same opinion with respect to the three additional cantos now given to the public; to say nothing of the morality of the poem—indeed, the less said on this point the better. The second canto left Don Juan and Haidee happy:—

'— On the lone shore were plighted
Their hearts; the stars their nuptial torches, shed

Beauty upon the beautiful they lighted;
Ocean their witness, and the cave their bed,
By their own feelings hallowed and united,
Their priest was solitude, and they were wed;
And they were happy, for to their young eyes
Each was an angel, and earth a paradise.'

The third canto commences with some rather severe reflections on marriage: the poet says,—

'Tis melancholy, and a fearful sign
Of human frailty, folly, also crime,
That love and marriage rarely can combine;

And he then tells us that Haidee and Juan were not married, and cautions the reader, that if he would have them wedded, he should shut—

'The book which treats of this erroneous pair,
Before the consequences grow too awful;
'Tis dangerous to read of loves unlawful.'

While they are

'— happy in the illicit Indulgence of their innocent desires,'

Haidee's father returns home. It may be recollected that he was a Greek, who, by fishing and smuggling, had acquired 'an ill-gotten million of piastres:' the poet now vindicates his profession, and says,—

'Let not his mode of raising cash seem strange,
Although he fleeced the flags of every nation;

For into a prime minister but change
His title, and 'tis nothing but taxation;
But he, more modest, took an humble range
Of life, and in an honest vocation
Pursued o'er the high seas his watery journey;
And merely practised as a sea-attorney.'

But he vindicates worse things than this, and seems very anxious to shew the superiority of illicit amours over marriage. In speaking of the absence of a lover, he says,—

'If single, probably his plighted fair
Has in his absence wedded some rich man;
But all the better, for the happy pair
May quarrel, and the lady growing wiser,
He may resume his amatory care
As cavalier servente, or despise her;
And that his sorrow may not be a dumb one,
Write odes on the Inconstancy of Woman.
'And oh! ye gentlemen who have already
Some chaste liaison of the kind—I mean
An honest friendship with a married lady—
The only thing of this sort ever seen
To last—of all connexions the most steady,
And the true Hymen, (the first's but a screen)—
Yet for all that keep not too long away,
I've known the absent wrong'd four times a-
day.'

Lambro, for such was the name of Haïdée's father, was much surprised at his return to find a banquet, and that his daughter having heard he was dead, had taken full possession of his house.
His feelings, on being deprived of his house, and his affection for his daughter are finely portrayed: though the finest sentiment is rapidly succeeded by the broadest humour:—

'He enter'd in the house no more his home,
A thing to human feelings the most trying,
And harder for the heart to overcome,
Perhaps, than even the mental pangs of dying;
To find our hearstone turn'd into a tomb,
And round its once warm precincts palely lying
The ashes of our hopes, is a deep grief,
Beyond a single gentleman's belief.

'He enter'd in the house—his home no more,
'For without hearts there is no home'—and felt
The solitude of passing his own door
Without a welcome; there he long had dwelt,
There his few peaceful days Time had swept o'er,
There his worn bosom and keen eye would melt
Over the innocence of that sweet child,
His only shrine of feelings undefiled.'

'But whatso'er he had of love reposed
On that beloved daughter; she had been
The only thing which kept his heart unclose Amidst the savage deeds he had done and seen;

A lonely pure affection unopposed:
There wanted but the loss of this to wean
His feelings from all milk of human kindness,
And turn him like the Cyclops mad with blindness.

'The cubless tigers in her jungle raging
Is dreadful to the shepherd and the flock;
The ocean, when its yeasty war is waging,
Is awful to the vessel near the rock;
But violent things will sooner bear assuaging,
Their fury being spent by its own shock,
Than the stern, single, deep, and wordless ire
Of a strong human heart, and in a sire.

'It is a hard, although a common case,
To find our children running restive—they
In whom our brightest days we would retrace,
Our little selves re-form'd in finer clay;
Just as old age is creeping on space,
And clouds come o'er the sunset of our day,
They kindly leave us, though not quite alone,
But in good company—the gout and stone.

'Yet a fine family is a fine thing (Provided they don't come in after dinner);
'Tis beautiful to see a matron bring Her children up (if naming them don't thin
her);
Like cherubs round an altar-piece they cling
To the fire-side (a sight to touch a sinner).
A lady with her daughters or her nieces
Shine like a guinea and seven shilling pieces.'

After an account of the rooms and the banquet of a hundred dishes, we have the following description of Haï-dée:—

'Her hair's long auburn waves down to her heel
Flow'd like an Alpine torrent which the sun
Dyes with his morning light,—and would conceal

Her person *, if allow'd at large to run,
And still they seem resolutely to feel
The silken fillet's curb, and sought to shun
Their bosoms where'er some Zephyr caught began
To offer his young pinion as her fan.

'Round her she made an atmosphere of life;
The very air seem'd lighter from her eyes;
They were so soft and beautiful, and rife
With all we can imagine of the skies,
And pure as Psyche ere she grew a wife—
Too pure even for the purest human ties;
Her overpowering presence made you feel
It would not be idolatry to kneel.

'Her eyelashes, though dark as night, were tinged
(It is the country's custom), but in vain;
For those large black eyes were so thickly fringed,

The glossy rebels mock'd the jetty stain,
And in their native beauty stood against:
Her nails were touch'd with henna; but again

The power of art was turn'd to nothing, for
They could not look more rosy than before.

'The henna should be deeply died to make
The skin relieved appear more fairly fair;
She had no need of this, day ne'er will break
On mountain tops more heavenly white than
her;

The eye might doubt if it were well awake,
She was so like a vision; I might err,
But Shakspeare also says 'tis very silly
"To gild refined gold or paint the lily."

The establishment of Don Juan was complete: he had in his suite, dwarfs, dancing-girls, and a poet; the last was a trimmer, who—

—Lied with such a fervour of intention—
There was no doubt he earn'd his late-rate pension.'

Being called upon, he sang the following hymn, which contains some spirited reflections on the past and present state of Greece:—

'The isles of Greece, the isles of Greece!
Where burning Sappho loved and sung,
Where grew the arts of war and peace,—
Where Delos rose, and Phœbus sprung!
Eternal summer glides them yet,
But all, except their sun, is set.

'The Scian and the Teian muse,
The hero's harp, the lover's lute,

* The poet, in a note, says, he has seen four women who had their hair in such profusion.

Have found the fame your shores refuse;
Their place of birth alone is mute
To sounds which echo further west
Than your sire's! "Islands of the Blest."
'The mountains look on Marathon—
And Marathon looks on the sea;
And musing there an hour alone,
I dream'd that Greece might still be free;
For standing on the Persian's grave,
I could not deem myself a slave.

'A king sate on the rocky brow
Which looks o'er sea-born Salamis;
And ships, by thousands, lay below,
And men in nations—all were his!
He counted them at break of day—
And when the sun set where were they?

'And where are they? and where art thou,
My country? On thy voiceless shore
The heroic lay is tuneless now—
The heroic busts no more!
And must thy lyre, so long divine,
Degenerate into hands like mine?

'Tis something, in the dearth of fame,
Though link'd among a fetter'd race,
To feel at least a patriot's shame,
Even as I sing, suffice my face;
For what is left the poet here?
For Greeks a blush—for Greece a tear.

'Must we but weep o'er days more glorious blest?
Must we but blush?—Our fathers bleed.
Earth! render back from out thy breast
A remnant of our Spartan dead!
Of the three hundred grant but three,
To make a new Thermopylæ!

'What, silent still? and silent all?
Ah! no!—the voices of the dead
Sound like a distant torrent's fall,
And answer, "let one living hand,
But one arise,—we come, we come!"
'Tis but the living who are dumb.

'In vain—in vain: strike other chords;
Fill high the cup with Samian wine!
Leave battles to the Turkish hoards,
And shed the blood of Scio's vine!
Hark! rising to the ignoble call—
How answers each loud bacchanal!

You have the Pyrrhic dance as yet,
Where is the Pyrrhic phalanx gone?
Of two such lessons, why forget
The nobler and the manlier one?

You have the letters Cadmus gave—
Think ye he meant them for a slave?

Fill high the bowl with Samian wine!
We will not think of themes like these!
It made Anacreon's song divine:
He served—but served Polycrates—
A tyrant; but our masters there
Were still, at least, our countrymen.

The tyrant of the Chersonese
Was freedom's best and truest friend;
That tyrant was Militiades!
Oh, that the present hour would lend
Another despot of the kind!
Such chains as his were sure to bind.

Fill high the bowl with Samian wine!
On Sull's rock, and Parga's shore,
Exists the remnant of a line
Such as the Doric mortars bore;
And there, perhaps, some seed is sown,
The Hæcæan blood might own.

'Trust not for freedom to the Franks—
They have a king-like badge and sell;
In native swords, and native pauls,
The only force of courage dwells;
But Turkish force and Latin hand
Would break your shield, however broad.

Fill high the bowl with Samian wine!
Our virgins dance beneath the shade—
I see their glorious black eyes shine;
But gazing on each glowing maid,
My own the burning tear-drops leave,
To think such breasts must suckle slaves.

Place me on Samian's marbled steep,
Where nothing, save the waves and I,
May hear our mutual murmurs sweep;
There, swan-like, let me sing and die:
A land of slaves shall ne'er be mine—
Dash down you cup of Samian wine!

After some observations on the chance which often gives immortality to men, and the trifling of biographers who record silly incidents,—

As most essential to their hero's story,
They do not much contribute to their glory;

Our author has the following severe remarks on two poets of some celebrity:—

All are not moralists, like Southey, when
He prated to the world of "Pantismony;"
Or Wordsworth, unexcited, unshined, who then Season'd his pedlar poems with democracy;
Or Coleridge, long before his slighty pen
Let to the Morning Post his aristocracy;
When he and Southey, following the same path,
Espous'd two partners (milliners of Bath.)

Such names at present cut a convict figure,
The very Botany Bay in moral geography;
Their local legends, renegade rigours,
Are good manure for their more bare biography.

Wordsworth's last quarto, by the way, is bigger
Than any since the birth-day of typography;
A clumsy frowzy poem, called the "Excursion,"
Writ in a manner which is my aversion.

He there builds up a formidable dyke
Between his own and others' intellect;
But Wordsworth's poems and his followers, like

Joanna Southcote's Shiloh, and her sect,
Are things which in this century don't strike
The public mind, so few are the elect;
And the new births of both their stale virginities
Have proved but dropsties, taken for divinities.

We learn from Horace, Homer sometimes sleeps?

We feel without him: Wordsworth sometimes wakes,

To show with what complacency he creeps,
With his dear "Waggoners," around his lakes;

He wishes for "a boat" to sail the deeps—
Of ocean?—No, of air; and then he makes Another outcry for "a little boat,"
And drives seas to set it well aloft.

If he must fain sweep o'er the ethereal plain,
And Pegasus runs restive in his "waggon,"
Could he not beg the loan of Charles's Wain?
Or pray Medea for a single dragon?
Or if too chaste for his vulgar brain,
He fear'd his neck to venture such a wag on,
And he must needs mount nearer to the moon,
Could not the blockhead ask for a balloon?

"Pedlars," and "boats," and "waggoners!"
I ye shies

Of Pope and Dryden, are we come to this?
Thou shalt shoot such sort not alone erudite
Contempts, but from the bathos' vast abyss
Floats scum-like, uppermost, and these Jack Cuddies

Of sense and song above your graves may biss—

The "little boatman" and his "Peter Bell"
Can sneer at him who drew "Achtophel!"

The poet, amidst numberless digressions, devotes one stanza to the vindication of himself from the charge of wanting religion:—

'Some kinder caustics are pleased to say,
In nameless print—that I have no devotion;
But set those persons down with me to pray,
And you shall see who has the properest notion

Of getting into heaven the shortest way;
My altars are the mountains and the ocean,
Earth, air, stars,—all that spring from the great Whole
Who hath produced, and will receive the soul.'

He also alludes to the same subject in the fourth canto, when he says,—

'Some have accused me of a strange design
Against the creed and morals of the land,
And trace it in this poem every line:
I don't pretend that I quite understand
My own meaning when I would be very fine;
But the fact is that I have nothing plann'd,
Unless it was to be a moment merry,—
A novel word in my vocabulary.'

The third canto, it will be seen, contains little of the narrative of Don Juan; but in the fourth the author enters more largely on the subject. The happiness of the youthful pair appears complete:—

'They were alone once more; for them to be
This was another Eden; they were never Weary, unless when separate: the tree
Cut from its forest root of years—the river Damm'd from its fountain—the child from the knee

And breast maternal, wean'd at once for ever,
Would wither less than these two torn apart;
Alas! there is no instinct like the heart.'

Their happiness was, however, of short duration, for Lambro returned, and while the disturbed sleep and frightful dream of Haidee foreboded ill, he entered their apartment, and being seconded by a number of his men, after a stout resistance from Don Juan, they bore away his Haidee, and made him captive; he was placed in a boat, and carried to some gallies,—

'On board one of these, and under hatches,
They stowed him, with strict orders to the watchers.'

The fate of Haidee was still more melancholy; she, on being torn from Don Juan, and seeing him cut down, with a convulsive groan broke a blood vessel, and refusing all medical aid,—

'Twelve days and nights she wither'd thus; at last,

Without a groan, or sigh, or glance, to show
A parting pang, the spirit from her past:
And they who watch'd her nearest could not know

The very instant, till the change that cast
Her sweet face into shadow, dull and slow,
Glaz'd o'er her eyes—the beautiful, the black;
Oh! to possess such lustre—and then lack

'She died, but not alone; she held within
A second principle of life, which might Have dawn'd a fair and sinless child of sin;
But clos'd its little being without light,
And went down to the grave unborn, wherein Blossom and bough lie wither'd in one blight;

In vain the dews of heaven descend above
The bleeding flower and blasted fruit of love.

'Thus liv'd—thus died she; never more on her Shall sorrow light, or shame. She was not made

Through years or moons the inner weight to bear,

Which colder hearts endure till they are laid
By age in earth; her days and pleasures were Brief, but delightful—such as had not staid Long with her destiny; but she sleeps well
By the sea shore, whereon she lov'd to dwell.'

The conclusion of the loves of Don Juan and Haidee affording us a good opportunity for breaking off, we shall defer all further extract and remark for the present.

(To be concluded in our next.)

BIBLIOGRAPHY.

1. An Olio of Bibliographical and Literary Anecdotes and Memoranda, Original and Select. By William Davis. 12mo. pp. 150. London, 1817.

2. A Journey round the Library of a Bibliomaniac; or, Cento of Notes and Reminiscences concerning Rare, Curious, and Valuable Books. By William Davis. 8vo. pp. 96. London, 1821.

We have coupled the two productions of Mr. Davis together, though published at somewhat distant periods, as they relate to the same subject, and are intimately connected with each other. We confess ourselves rather partial to the study of bibliography, and should have been much more so had we not been disgusted with the ridiculous excess to which it has been carried, by those who have written most on the subject. We should wish not only to be acquainted with every curious and interesting book, but also with every curious incident or circumstance connected with early English literature; but we would never seek to extend our researches to the minutiae of bibliomania; we want not to perpetuate the wood-engravings of a halfpenny ballad of the seventeenth century, nor should we prefer an old book on account of its literal errors; and yet these are the trifles on which bibliomaniacs dwell.

We have been informed by a literary friend, that a gentleman of good fortune is now purchasing copies of all the obscure and still-born productions of the present day, in order that, a century or two hence, his descendants may possess a library of rarities which the world never thought worth preserving. We would suggest to this gentleman, in order to render his prospective library unique, that he should secure the proof-sheets of each work, and, according to the principle on which bibliomanics go, his library would be rendered much more valuable; but this is supposing that our descendants will be as foolish as ourselves in this respect, which it is scarcely fair to presume will be the case. What, we would ask, would the proof-sheets of the first edition of Shakespeare's plays produce at the present day? What a theme would such a work afford for the eloquence of Mr. Evans? Why! Mr. Dibdin would write a ten-guinea work on the subject, or, perhaps, have a fac-simile made of the whole, while the members of the Roxburgh club would mortgage their acres or sell their family plate to possess the treasure.

But to leave bibliomania, and turn to Mr. Davis, who is not a bibliomaniac, but a very intelligent gentleman, who has a pretty extensive acquaintance with rare books, and good taste enough to point out what is really curious and interesting:—we have read his little unassuming volumes with much pleasure, and we feel happy in making them more extensively known, through the means of our journal. From the extracts which we shall make, our readers will perceive that the author has blended literary information with bibliographical amusement, in a very pleasing and instructive manner; but to our extracts, and first from the 'Olio':—

'Errata.—Beneath the word finis, at the end of some very stupid book, a wit added the following pointed couplet:—

'Finis' an error, or a lie, my friend!
In writing foolish books there is no end."

'Scarron composed some verses, to which he prefixed the following dedication: A Guillemette, chienne de ma sœur; but having a quarrel with his sister, he inserted this among the errata, and added, for chienne de ma sœur, read ma chienne de sœur.'

From a very interesting notice of Sterne and his valet, La Fleur, we select the following:—

'Poor Maria was, alas! no fiction—"when we came up to her, she was grovelling in the road like an infant, and throwing the dust upon her head—and yet few were more lovely! Upon Sterne's accosting her with tenderness, and raising her in his arms, she collected herself and resumed some composure—told him her tale of misery and wept upon his breast—my master sobbed aloud. I saw her gently disengage herself from his arms, and she sung him the service to the Virgin; my poor master covered his face with his hands, and walked by her side to the cottage where she lived,—there he talked earnestly to the old woman."

'"Every day," said La Fleur, "while we stayed there, I carried them meat and drink from the hotel, and when we departed from Moulins, my master left his blessings and some money with the mother."—"How much," added he, "I know not—he always gave more than he could afford."

'Stevens' (George Alexander) Lecture on Heads.—A country mechanic furnished Stevens with the first idea of his lecture; being at a village where he was manager of a company of players, the force and humour with which he heard this countryman describe the members of the corporation, impressed so strongly on his mind the practicability of rendering something of the sort subservient to theatrical purposes, that he immediately set about it. When finished, the lecture met with unexampled success, and in the course of a few years produced the author near 10,000l. Stevens is said to have been the first instance that can be produced of the same person, who, by his writing and reciting, could entertain an audience for a continued space of four hours; he died in 1734, at Biggleswade, in Bedfordshire, it is believed, in not very affluent circumstances.

'Philidor on Chess.—It is not, I believe, generally known that this author's real name was André Danican; he was a native of Drieux, near Paris: Philidor was a sobriquet or nickname, given him by the King of France, after an Italian musician of that name. He was near seventy years of age at his death, and so remarkable for his skill in the difficult game of chess, that about two months before he died, he played two games blindfold, at the same time, against two excellent chess-players, and was declared the victor.'

'Milton's Paradise Lost.—Milton experienced some difficulty in getting his poem of Paradise Lost licensed, the licenser imagining that, in the noble simile of the sun in an eclipse, he had discovered treason. It was, however, licensed, and Milton sold his MS. to Samuel Simmons, April 27th, 1667, for an immediate payment of five pounds, with a proviso, that on thirteen hundred copies being sold, he was to receive five pounds more; and the same for the second and third editions.

The first edition appeared in 1667, in ten books, small quarto, advertised at 3s. plainly bound; but as it met with no very quick sale, the titles were varied, in order to promote its circulation—thus the edition of 1667, is frequently found with the titles of 1668 and 1669.

In two years, the sale of the poem gave the poet a right to his second payment, the receipt for which was signed April 26th, 1669.

'The second edition was printed in 8vo. 1674, but the author did not live to receive the stipulated payment. The third edition was published in 1678. The copy-right then devolving to Milton's widow, she agreed with Simmons to receive eight pounds for it; this agreement was concluded, and the receipt signed December 21st, 1680. Simmons transferred the right for twenty-five pounds, to a bookseller named Brabazon Aylmer, and Aylmer sold half to Jacob Tonson, August 17th, 1683, and the other half at a price considerably advanced, March 24th, 1690.

'Dr. Bentley, for his edition of Milton, in 1732, received one hundred and five pounds, and Dr. Newton, for editing the Paradise Lost, received six hundred and thirty pounds, and for Paradise Regained, one hundred and five pounds.'

'Littleton's (Adam) Latine Dictionary. Quarto. London, 1678 and 1684.

When the doctor was compiling his dictionary, and announced the word concurro to his amanuensis, the scribe imagining from an affinity of sound, that the six first letters would give the translation of the verb, said, "Concur I suppose, Sir," to which the doctor peevishly replied, "Concur!—Condo."—The secretary, whose business it was to write down what his master dictated, according, did his duty, and the word condog was inserted, and actually printed as one interpretation of "concurro," in the edition of 1678, but omitted in the subsequent one of 1684.

'Robinson Crusoe.—The fascination of this extraordinary work is not limited to the juvenile reader. Mr. Tawney, a respectable alderman of Oxford, used to read Robinson Crusoe through every year with great delight, and thought every part of it as much material of fact as his Bible. A friend at last asked him, how he could be such a child as to credit a story so marvellous. "The original Crusoe," added he, "was Alexander Selkirk; and Daniel Defoe, an ingenious author, embellished the plain story of his shipwreck upon the island of Juan Fernandez, with almost all the adventures and remarks you so much admire."—"Your information," said the alderman with a sigh, "may be correct, but I had rather you had withheld it, for by thus deceiving me, you have deprived me of one of the greatest pleasures of my old age."

Thus far the 'Olio'; we now turn to the 'Journey,' which is the more valuable work of the two; the notices are more rare, and although there are one or two trifling errors respecting the Hudibrastic quotation, and the date of Joe Miller's Jests, yet the author is generally correct:—

'A Righte Delectable Traytie upon a Goodly Garlande, or Chaplet of Laurell, by Maister Skelton, Poet Laureate,

• See Literary Chronicle, No. 116.

4to. bl. lett. Imprinted by Richard Faukes, 1523.

Bought at the Pearson sale, 1788, for 7l. 17s. 6d. it is now in the King's collection, and presumed to be unique.

This rare volume, one of the scarcest in the English language, has the author's portrait at full-length on the back of the title, with a branch of laurel in his hand.

Skelton, who was Poet Laureate to Oxford University, and tutor to Prince Henry, afterwards Henry VIII. was a determined enemy to Cardinal Wolsey; his remarkable boldness, in singly daring, in his poetical character, to attack the cardinal's imperious manner at the council board, is shewn as a remarkable coincidence by Neve, in his Cursory Remarks on English Poets. The fifteenth article of the charges against the cardinal, by the parliament of 1520, being precisely the same, only divested of rhyme:—

"Then in the Chamber of Stars,
All matters there he murs;
Clapping his rod on the board,
No man dare speak a word;
For he hath all the saying,
Without any reasoning.
He rollets in his records,
He sayeth, how say ye, my lords,
Is not my reason good?
Good even, good Robin Hood.
Some say yes, and some Sit still, as they were dumb."

The condition of so rare a book as the first edition of Shakspeare, is a matter of no little importance to the lover of fine-conditioned and really important books; the apparent difference in the prices for which the various copies before enumerated have sold, may, therefore, readily be accounted for.

The second edition. Folio. 1632.

Third edition. Folio. 1664.

Fourth edition. Folio. 1685.

The third edition is the most valuable of these editions, and a good copy nearly as valuable as the first edition.

Of the second edition, in folio, 1632, I find it recorded in Boswell's Life of Johnson, that it is adulterated in every page.

Some curious particulars respecting the various sums paid to the different editors of Shakspeare, may be found in the Gentleman's Magazine.

The most considerable appear to be—

Alexander Pope.....	£212 12 0
Theobald.....	237 10 0

Warburton.....	500 0 0
Capell.....	300 0 0
Dr. Johnson, for the 1st edit.	375 0 0

Of Johnson and Steeven's fourth edit. 15 vols. 8vo. 1793, large paper, on which paper only twenty-five were printed, one sold at Reed's for 20l.; and a copy at Mr. Stretell's, in 1820, for 10l. 5s. Ritson, 1803, 14l. 10s. Bindley, 21l.

The portrait of Shakspeare, by M. Droeshout, frontispiece to the title of the first folio edition of Shakspeare, served for all the four folio editions; good or first impressions of this portrait are valued, by judges, at about 5l. 5s. whilst inferior ones are scarcely worth one guinea, as the lines have been crossed over the face, in order to give strength to the impression; and Mr. Caulfield, a competent authority in these matters, says, the only way to discover the genuine state is, by observing the shading in the face to be expressed by single lines, without any crossing whatever.

Of Shakspeare it has been well and truly said,—

"Each change of many-coloured life he drew,
Exhausted words, and then imagined new;
Existence saw him spurn her bounded reign;
And panting time told'd after him in vain."

I may, perhaps, be excused for alluding to a projected guide or classed index, to refresh the recollection of the admirers of Shakspeare, since the intended publication is entirely abandoned. I had taken the index to the Dublin edition, printed by Grierson, which had been collated with the original folio and quarto editions as my ground-work, and had re-arranged and revised it under the following heads: Section 1. Characters of Historical Persons. Section 2. Index of Manners, Passions, and their external Effects. Section 3. Of Fictitious Persons, with the characters ascribed to them. Section 4. Index of Thoughts and Sentiments. 5. Table of the most considerable Speeches. Section 6.—part 1. Description of Places. Part 2. Description of Persons. Part 3. Description of things, and Description of Times and Seasons; and, lastly, an Index of Similes and Allusions.

I had afterwards to consider how I was to manage that this Index might be rendered generally available, and what edition to select for the purpose of reference, when I stumbled upon the following passage in Dr. Samuel Johnson's preface to his edition of Shakspeare, page 29, vol. 1, 8vo. London, 1765, which completely set aside all my air-drawn schemes on the subject, and I do not regret to say, caused me not only to alter my plan, but finally to abandon it altogether.

"It was said of Euripides, that every verse was a precept; and it may be said of Shakspeare, that from his works may be collected a system of civil and economical prudence. Yet his real power is not shown in the splendour of particular passages, but by the progress of the fable, and the tenour of his dialogue; and he that tries to recommend him by select quotations, will succeed like the Pedant in Hierocles, who, when he offered his house to sale, carried a brick in his pocket as a specimen."

It might seem great presumption to differ from so high an authority as Dr. Johnson, yet we think no one who has read Dr. Dodd's Beauties of Shakspeare, or any similar collection from his works, will deny that his power 'is shown in the splendour of particular passages,' or that he may be recommended by 'select quotations;' and we regret that Mr. Davis has been dissuaded from a project of such great utility and importance, as the guided or classed index to the works of our immortal dramatist:—

Hudibras Poème, trad. de l'Anglois, en Vers François. 3 vols. 12mo. Lond. 1750.

The author of this translation of the poem of Hudibras, was a man of superior abilities, and appears to have been endowed with an uncommon share of modesty. He presents his work to the public with the utmost diffidence; and, in a short preface, humbly deprecates its censure for the presumption that may be imputed to him, in attempting that which the celebrated Voltaire had declared to be the most difficult of tasks.

Yet, this task he has executed in a very masterly manner; and, almost literally transfused his original into the French version, clearly evincing, (according to the opinion of A. F. Tytler, in his Essay on Translation), that he possessed that essential requisite for his undertaking—a kindred genius with that of his great original.

This translation was made by Calouet Francis Townley, an English gentleman, who had been educated in France, and long in the French service, and who had acquired a most intimate knowledge of both languages. And is the same person who suffered death at Carlisle, for his concern in the rebellion, 1745-46, and who pleaded in vain his commission from the French king, as entitling him to the benefits of the cartel settled with France for the exchange of prisoners of war.

At Duten's sale, 1813, a copy of this book sold for 6l. 12s.; and at Mr. Bindley's for 5l. 5s.

King Charles the First's Works.—In the year 1677, the Parliament voted two months' tax, for the more decent interment of the body of the unfortunate Charles; and to raise a monument to his memory. Mr. Chiswell, son-in-law to Royston, then printer to the King, proposed a plan to supersede the necessity of a monument, which was, that part of the sum voted should be applied to the purpose of printing a new edition of Charles's works, a copy of which was to be fixed with a chain to every parish church in the kingdom; this plan was approved of.

by many, and Charles II. himself encouraged it; but the distrusts between the King and people, the heats in Parliament, and the Popish Plot, prevented the execution of it. On the Duke of York mounting the throne, Mr. Chiswell applied to Sir Roger L'Estrange to procure King James's commendatory letter; this request the King refused, stating as a reason for his refusal, that he did not believe "Icon Basilike" to be his father's production; Chiswell, on being informed of this, said, that omitting "Icon Basilike" would render the works imperfect, and, therefore, proposed printing it at the end of the works, as a sort of addenda after the finis; this the King consented to, on condition that some expressions which lie thought injurious to the monarchy might be expunged; but Chiswell objecting to this, it was at last agreed, that the objectionable parts should be inclosed within crotchets; and thus "Icon Basilike" stands at the end of the second part of the King's works, folio, 168d.

"In the Archiepiscopal Library at Lambeth Palace, is a copy with dasties of the pen through the monarch's prayers, as well as through every passage respecting the advancement of the Protestant religion.

A manuscript note at the beginning, by Zach. Cradock, and dated November 1st, 1678, accounts for the numerous expurgations as follows:—

"This book, being seized on board an English ship, was delivered, by order of the Inquisition of Lisbon, to some of the English priests, to be perused and corrected according to the rules of the Index Expurgatorius. Thus corrected, it was given to Barnaby Craford, English merchant there, and by him it was given to me, the English preacher resident there; in 1670; and by me, as I then received it, to the library at Lambeth, to be there preserved."

Mr. Davis, we understand, has limited his publication to two hundred and fifty copies; and this number would, no doubt, be enough for the ordinarily expensive works on bibliography, but certainly by no means sufficient for productions so cheap, interesting, and popular, as his Olio and Journey, and we not only look forward to new editions being rapidly called for, but we hope the author will continue a pursuit which he proves he is so well calculated to prosecute.

Travels in Georgia, Persia, &c. &c.
By Sir Robert Ker Porter.

(Concluded from p. 442.)

In returning to this bulky volume, which is one of the most interesting publications of the day, we shall not extend our extracts much further, but conclude with a description of the Palace of Ispahan, and an anecdote of a prime minister, which, however, is but a trivial addition to a very old story related of Cardinal Richelieu, and half-a-dozen other prime ministers of as many different countries:—

"The Chelch Setoon, or Palace of Forty Pillars, was the favourite residence of the latter Sefi kings; and certainly, when we turned into the grand avenue, and the palace broke upon us, I thought description was put to silence. Indeed, words can seldom give any thing like a just idea of the very intricate objects of sight; but, for the satisfaction of my readers, curious in comparing the taste of times and countries, I shall attempt some detail of this Persian Versailles. The exhausted profusion of its splendid material, reflected, not merely their own golden or crystal lights on each other, but all the variegated colours of the garden; so that the whole surface seemed formed of polished silver and mother-of-pearl, set with precious stones. In short, as I said before, the scene might well have appeared in an eastern poet's dream, or some magic vision, in the wonderful tales of an Arabian night.

"When we drew near, I found the entire front of the building open to the garden; the roof being sustained by a double range of columns, the height of which measured eleven Persian yards, (a Persian yard being forty-four inches), hence they rose upwards of forty feet. Each column shoots up from the united backs of four lions, of white marble; and the shafts of the columns rising from these extraordinary bases, were covered with the arabesque patterns and foliage, in looking-glass, gilding, and painting; some twisting spirally; others winding in golden wreaths, or running into lozenges, stars, connecting circles, and I know not what intricacies of fancy and ingenious workmanship. The ceiling was equally enriched, with flowers, fruits, birds, butterflies, and even couching tigers, in gold, silver, and painting, amidst hundreds of intermingling compartments of glittering mirror. At some distance, within this open chamber, are two more pillars of similar taste to the range; and from their capital springs a spacious arch, forming the entrance to a vast interior saloon; in which all the caprices and labours and cost of eastern magnificence, have been lavished to an incredible prodigality. The pillars, the walls, the ceiling, might be a study for ages, for designers in these gorgeous labyrinthine ornaments. The floors of both apartments were covered with the richest carpets of the era in which the building was constructed, the age of Shah Abbas, and were as fresh as if just laid down; there needs no other proof of the purity of the climate. From one angle of the interior chamber, two low folding-doors opened into a very spacious and lofty hall, the sides of which were hung with pictures of various dimensions, most of them descriptive of convivial scenes; and the doors and panells of the room near the floor, being also emblazoned with the same merry-making subjects, fully declared the purpose of the place. But a very odd addition was made to the ornaments of the wall. Little recesses spotted its lower range, taking the shapes of bottles, flaggons, goblets, and other useful vessels, all equally indispensable, in those days, at a Persian feast. Very different from the temperance which now presides there; and how directly the reverse of the abstemiousness and its effects, that marked the board of the great Cyrus!

"Six pictures of a very large size, occupy the walls of this banquetting-chamber, from the ceiling to within eight or ten feet of the floor. Four of these represent royal entertainments, given to different ambassadors during the reigns of Shah Abbas the First, alias the Great; of his grandson, Abbas the Second; and of Shah Thamas, or Tamasp, as it is sometimes written. The two other pictures are battle pieces. Every one of these different subjects are portrayed with the most scrupulous exactness, as far as the still life could be copied. The golden vases, and other vessels in the banquetting scenes, with the musical instruments, and every detail in the dresses of the persons present, are painted with an almost Flemish precision. Wine (the peculiar bane of the Sefi race) appears the great vehicle of enjoyment at these feasts; an air of carelessness being in all the figures, and the goblets disposed with the most anticlerical profusion. The guests are also entertained with a variety of dancing-girls, whose attitude and costumes sufficiently show the second vice of the times, and explain the countries whence they come.

"The warlike pictures are defined with equal nicety; the trappings of the horses, the arms of the heroes, and even to the blood-red wounds of the combatants. One of the battles represents the troops of the valiant Shah Tamasp the First, (the son of Shah Ismail, the beginner of the Sefi dynasty) engaging the troops of the Sultan Soliman. The Persian king is depicted in the act of cleaving a grim Janissary "from head to saddle-bow;" and the weapon having nearly reached the last point of its aim, the artist has marked its dreadful journey down the body of the man, with a long red streak, following the royal blade. But, nevertheless, the indivisible Turk continued to sit bolt upright, firm in his stirrups, and as life-like in visage, as the most conquering hero in the piece.

"Ridiculous as the execution of these pictures may be in some respects, they are invaluable as registers of the manners of the times, of the general aspect of the persons they are designed to commemorate, and of the costumes of the several nations, assembled at the feasts, or engaged in the battles. Large turbans, full mustachios, and smooth-shaven chins, were then the fashion in Persia; which has now given place to the high, narrow, black cap of sheep-skin, and the long bushy beard;

the latter appendage having been a costume of the empire many centuries before.

The anecdote relates to Mirza Sheffy, the prime minister of Persia:—

His station near the sovereign gives him a kind of reflecting consequence, that makes a nod or a smile from him so full of a similar quality, that it may shed honour ad infinitum downwards; graduating dignity, according to its distance from the original fountain of favour. First one happy courtier, and then another, had received these marks of peculiar grace; and, in consequence, became the little centre of a temporary adulation from hundreds; many of whom envied the favour they sought to conciliate, even at second or third hand. Amongst the latter order of suitors was a rich, but otherwise inconsiderable individual, who had long attended Mirza Sheffy's levees, without having received the slightest notice; but chancing one day to find the minister alone for a few moments, he seized the opportunity, and thus addressed him:—

"I have had the honour of placing myself, for these many months back, in your excellency's sight, in the midst of your crowded halls, and yet have never had the happiness of receiving a single glance. But if your excellency would condescend, in the next assembly of your visitors, to rise a little on my entrance, such a distinction would be the height of my ambition; I should henceforth be held of consequence in the eyes of the khans. And for this honour I would give your excellency a consideration of one hundred tomans."

"It was an argument his excellency liked so well, he closed with the proposal, and the time for the solemn investing-dignity was arranged for the next day. The happy man took care not to make his appearance till the divan of the minister was pretty well filled. He then presented himself on the most conspicuous part of the carpet, big with ideas of the ever-growing honours of which that moment was to make him master. He looked proudly round on the rest of the khans, while Mirza Sheffy, half raising himself from his seat by his knuckles, and fixing his eyes gravely on him, to the no small astonishment of the rest of the company, exclaimed, "Is that enough?" The man was so overcome with confusion, he hurried from the room; leaving his distinction and his money alike with the minister; but taking with him the useful lesson, that bought honours are generally paid with disgrace. The laugh for once went without doubt of sincerity, with the great man; and his smiles became of still higher value, since it had been proved that he set them above price."

The numerous engravings from the pencil of the author, with which this volume is enriched, considerably enhance its value, as they are illustrative of the costume, antiquities, &c. of the interesting countries through which he travelled.

Italy and the Italians in the Nineteenth Century.

We left our traveller, last week, climbing the mountains of Savoy, and we now find him comfortably situated at Turin, the least noticed of all the Italian capitals by travellers generally, though the best-built city in the country. The streets are broad and straight, and the two principal squares magnificent. The situation of Turin is extremely pleasant, and the landscape round it bold and varied:—

"The city is built on the left or western bank of the Po, in a beautiful plain, bounded on the north and west by the Alps, at the distance of fifteen or twenty miles; to the south it opens into the fertile province of Saluzzo, and to the east, the view is agreeably terminated by a range of hills rising immediately from the right bank of the Po, and which afford, during the summer, a pleasant retreat in their verdant groves and well-cultivated gardens. As soon as you pass the bridge, you ascend to the church and convent of La Madonna del Monte, and from the terrace in front of it, you see to the greatest advantage the whole amphitheatre I have mentioned. The city of Turin is laid before you as on a map; it is small, but elegant and neat, and the country around is well cultivated; you trace the course of that noble river the Po, which takes its source from the glaciers of Mont Viso, the highest and boldest peak of the chain which divides Piedmont from Dauphiné; then turning to the north, the sight is bewildered in that formidable mass of Alps that divides Switzerland from Italy. You easily distinguish the hoary summits of Monte Rosa, the highest mountain in Europe next to Mont Blanc, rising proudly above the rest. It is a scene indeed worthy of admiration; such a variety of yellow plains, green hills, dark woody mountains, and white icy peaks: you follow nature through all her gradations from the banks of the Po to inaccessible regions beyond the clouds, from the heart of genial summer to the depth of eternal death-like winter; here are seen united the wild boldness of the Swiss, with the softer feature of the Italian landscape, the whole enhanced by a warm sun and brilliant sky. The sight of this magnificent panorama puts me in mind of a circumstance which happened here a few years ago, when the French ruled this country. A general of that nation, accompanied by his valet de chambre, the latter a true Parisian, arrived at Turin in the dead of night, and went to lodge with a friend who resided on the hill beyond the Po. Next morning La Fleur gets up, throws open the windows of the apartment, rubs his eyes, and sees before him the plain of Turin, the city, the Po, and the alps, C'est beau! cela ressemble au Parc de l'Empereur, cries out the astonished Frenchman, intending a compliment to the lovely and sublime country spread before his eyes."

Living at Turin is remarkably cheap, and provisions of all kinds are good. Their beef is the best in Italy; milk, butter, and cheese, are excellent, which is to be attributed to the rich pastures that cover the lower regions of the Alps. The rivers and lakes furnish plenty of good fish, especially exquisite trouts and carps. Poultry and eggs are plentiful, as is also game of every sort. Vegetables grow in great abundance, in the well-watered gardens in the neighbourhood of Turin. The common wine is rather poor, but the vineyards of Monferrato and Asti furnish most generous wines, red and white, which are sold at Turin as cheap as common wine is at Paris. There are many good restaurants at Turin, where dinner is to be had à la carte; besides which there are tables d'hôte at the several inns. A custom prevalent here, is that of itinerant musicians coming into the room while the company is at dinner, who play and sing balads and canzoni for a trifling remuneration: some of them sing in a good style, with much pathos, very superior to the crialleries of the French strolling musicians, whose songs, I have heard remarked by the Italians, always end in the tone of ora pro nobis in liano.

Lodgings at the inns are to be had at two francs per night; private apartments for about a louis d'or per month. One of the comforts in which Turin is superior to other Italian towns, is that every decent apartment has a fire-place. The floors are as in the rest of Italy, paved with square bricks, varnished red. There are a number of good coffee-houses, some very large, and where coffee, chocolate, and other refreshments may be had at very moderate prices."

The festival of the Nativity of the Virgin is observed with great pomp at Turin; it is a real Italian holiday:—

"A little below the church, on a small flat, there is an inn, where the joyous peasantry repaired after their devotions to refresh themselves, and enjoy the rest of the day. Temporary sheds were placed round, under which all parties sat indiscriminately at table, eating and drinking, talking and laughing. Others were spread in groups about the neighbouring meadows, and were busied in cooking the victuals they had brought with them by a fire of branches and leaves hastily collected. Parties of strolling musicians went about, receiving as their fee a share of the collation. After their frugal repast, the junior part of the assembly collected themselves in various clusters, and began dancing their national monferrata, or rather monferratina (from monferrato), a lively kind of country dance. All this scene was so animated, so pastoral, and so full of innocent and genuine gaiety, that I felt its influence operating powerfully upon me."

The conquests of the French in Italy were productive of some good consequences, as they revived in the Italians that taste for magnificent undertakings which the latter had shown in past ages, but which seemed, for many years, to have been slumbering in them. The present governments of Italy are encouraging this renewed disposition; the plans of the French are in course of being completed, and new ones of importance are formed. The King of Sardinia is constructing fine roads through different parts of his dominions; the King of Naples continues the excavations of Pompeii, and is improving the roads in the neighbourhood of his capital; and the Pope has restored, to almost their original magnificence, many of the remains of Roman architecture which adorn the city of the seven hills. Of the Italian peasantry, our author gives an interesting picture. He says,—

‘The Italian peasantry have in general shown every where a great dislike towards the French intruders; their ideas were unsophisticated by theories, and they reasoned upon facts; they had been for generations contented and quiet in their humble condition, acts of oppression were rare in the country, and they lived comfortably, particularly those of the north of Italy. They were attached to the religion of their fathers, the corruption of cities had made little progress among them, they were fond of their wives, and jealous of the honour of their daughters. But as soon as the French came, a most dreadful alteration took place. The generals and commissaries extorted money and provisions from the inhabitants, the soldiers seduced and ravished their wives and daughters, and they all joined in insulting their saints, their belief, and the ministers of their religion, and if any one dared to remonstrate, he was brought before a military commission, and shot on charge of disaffection and high treason against liberty. This is a short compendium of the behaviour of the republican armies in Italy; no wonder then, that the inhabitants revolted in many places and revenged themselves on their oppressors. Had they succeeded in driving them out of the country, their conduct, like that of the Spaniards, in later times, would have been called heroism; unfortunately they failed, and were looked upon as banditti. Carmagnola, a nice little town to the south of Turin, on the right bank of the Po, was taken and burnt by the French. Mondovì, a large place, situated farther south at the foot of the Ligurian Apennines, made a long resistance. The peasantry of the country around, a stout spirited race, rose, to the number of many thousands, and kept the French at bay for some time, but the Jacobin party in the town who were in correspondence with the enemy, contrived to distribute to the peasants cartridges made of adulterated powder, so, that when they came in contact with the enemy, their fire had no effect, and they were easily defeated and massacred as usual. The invaders then entered Mondovì, which they partly set on fire, plundering, ravaging, and murdering in every direction. There is still living one of the Jacobin leaders, whose wife was the first victim of the fury of the French soldiery; she was shot while looking out of a window for her husband, who was coming along with them. After the massacre, these lawless ruffians, joined by all the abandoned characters, male and female, that collected to share the plunder, went to dance pèle môle, and committed all kinds of abominations in the sumptuous halls of the fugitive nobility, and this for honour of the goddess of reason.’

The description of Genoa presents us with an interesting extract:—

‘Genoa la superba, for this is the appropriate epithet which was given it in the time of its splendour, and which it still deserves on account of its stately buildings and commanding situation, stands partly on the declivity of several hills rising in a semicircle round the harbour, and partly on a narrow slip of ground between them and the sea. The harbour is in the form of a half moon, about a mile and a half in length; its entrance faces the south, and is protected in part by two moles running across from the opposite extremities, but leaving between them an open space of about half a mile, through which the sea rushes tremendously when the wind blows from that quarter. Vessels, however, can lie in security in that part of the harbour which is behind the old mole. They talk now of stretching the latter farther, over several sunken rocks, so as to approach nearer to the Molo Novo, behind which is the station for vessels performing quarantine. The city, seen from the light-house on entering the gates, presents a most magnificent coup d’œil. A succession of fine buildings, more than two miles in length, lines the shore. The loftiness and elegance of the houses in general; their painted walls and white roofs; the numerous palaces and gardens, churches and convents, rising one above the other, on the steep sides of the hills that rear, from behind, their dark and barren heads crowned with formidable ramparts, forts, and batteries; a noble harbour, where thousands of vessels might lie at anchor: the whole gives a grand idea of the former riches and power of this city, once the rival of Venice and the mistress of the Mediterranean.

‘As you proceed, you arrive at the inner line of fortifications, which divides the old city from the new. You pass the gate of San Tommaso, and arrive at the Piazza dell’Acqua Verde, whence that fine line of streets begins, which is the principal boast of Genoa. These three streets, Balbi, Novissima, and Nova, are lined with two rows of splendid palaces, belonging to the nobility, among which, those of Durazzo, Balbi, Brignole, Lomellino, and Serra, are the most remarkable. The first of these has a valuable collection of fine paintings, to which strangers are always allowed free access, according to the truly liberal spirit of the Italian nobility. Servants are always stationed in the anti-rooms, ready to accompany the amateurs through the splendid treasures of apartments which contains the treasures of the fine arts. The most remarkable painting in the Durazzo collection, is that of the Magdalen washing the feet of our Saviour, by Veronese, one of the best works of that great master. There are, in another room, three pieces by Luca Giordano, one of which represents the death of Seneca. The Palazzo Durazzo is really a residence fit for a sovereign—its front is very fine. There is another palace belonging to the same family, also in Strada Balbi, which is remarkable for its magnificent marble staircase, boldly suspended, as it were, in the air. This part of the architecture of Genoese palaces, is perhaps the most remarkable, and well deserves the attention of strangers. The Palazzo Serra, in Strada Nova, has a splendid saloon, rich with lapis-lazuli and gold: it is lined with mirrors, which reach from the ceiling to the floor, and which reflecting one another, multiply the objects ad infinitum, so that the spectator is at first apt to think himself in the middle of a long vista of rooms. The ceiling is finely painted to represent the triumph of a Genoese captain of this family over the Turks. It was told that the expense of this superb saloon amounted to a million of Genoese livres, about thirty-five thousand pounds sterling. When illuminated on great occasions, it must be almost too dazzling for the eye to bear.’

The Genoese sailors are the best in the Mediterranean, and are said to resemble the British tars more than any other; they are hardy, brave, and open-hearted, and our author relates a pleasing anecdote of one of them:—

‘During the heavy gales of last January, 1820, a Genoese piasco, (a vessel with lateen sails) Schiaffino, master, was wrecked on the Roman coast near Nettuno, a young sailor, native of Camogli, near Portofino, Riviera di Levante, in his repeated endeavours to save some English females who were passengers on board, lost his life, after having succeeded in bringing several of them to shore. The Sardinian government has given a pension to his relations.’

Finding that we must extend our notice of this highly interesting volume to another number, we shall conclude, for the present, with a portrait of the Genoese females:—

‘The Genoese women are among the handsomest of Italy; indeed, this city has boast of a decided superiority with regard to female beauty. In no other place have I seen such a number of interesting countenances collected together as in the streets, churches, and places of public resort at Genoa. They have, in general, elegant figures, delicate complexions, dark hair and eyes, and pretty features, and their carriage is remarkably graceful. Their dress is also well calculated to set off their charms, it is simple and neat: a white muslin gown well fitted to the shape, and a white veil, called pezzotto, thrown tastefully over the head and shoulders, so as not to conceal, but to shade their contour, give them the appearance of so many Madonnas. This is the national dress common to all classes, only varying by the fineness and costliness of the materials. These women are remarkably clean in their persons, and superior in that to the other Italian females. Very few of them wear straw hats or bonnets; indeed, it is to be wished for the sake of beauty and taste, that they may never adopt foreign fashions which cannot suit them better than their own costume. Often have I admired in the streets of Genoa, countenances not inferior to the fine models of art left to us by the Greek sculptors, or to the enchanting productions of Raphael and Correggio. Often have they recalled to my memory—

"One of those forms which fit by, when we
Are young, and fix our eyes on every face;
And oh! the loveliness at times we see
In momentary glidings, the soft grace,
The youth, the bloom, the beauty which agree
To make a nameless being we retrace, Whose course and home we knew not, nor shall know."

Like the lost Pleiad seen no more below."

"But, alas! there is no perfection in this world. If we approach nearer these terrestrial Venuses, if we enter into conversation with them, the charm fails; we find their minds uncultivated, their ideas narrow and common, and their hearts—but no! their hearts are naturally good, and it is the deficiency of their education and the influence of bad example that dry up or corrupt the finest feelings of these lovely creatures. Their mental faculties are neglected; while under the watchful eye of their parents or guardians, they are debarred from any rational intercourse, as if ignorance were the best guardian of virtue. Marriage is, at Genoa, a matter of calculation, perhaps more than any where else; it is generally settled between the relations, who often draw up the contract before the parties have seen one another, and it is only when every thing else is arranged, and a few days previous to the marriage ceremony that the future husband is introduced to his intended partner for life. Should he find fault with her figure or manners, he may break up the match, on condition of defraying the expenses incurred, &c. But this is seldom the case; the principal object, that of interest, being once settled, the bride follows the portion as a matter of course, and is often scarcely minded. There are in this city marriage brokers, who have pocket-books filled with the names of the marriageable girls of the different classes, with notes descriptive of their figures and of their fortunes; these people go about endeavouring to arrange connections; if they succeed they get a commission of two or three per cent. upon the portion. The contents of their memorandums are often very curious."

ON METRICAL PROSE.

(FOR THE LITERARY CHRONICLE.)

In my preceding paper, I compared the four species of literary language, viz. prose, metrical prose, blank verse, and rhyme, as to the possible excellence attainable in each of them, and gave the pre-eminence to the last; indeed, demonstrated its superiority to the three other species, as indubitably (unless my judgment be unusually perverted) as if my proof were in geometric diagram or analytic symbol. Let my reader, however, recollect, that in doing this, we have, as I said, considered language metaphysically and abstractedly, i. e. not as it is in our hands, but as it might be exercised by more powerful intellects.

But considering it practically, as it is really, and possible to be in the hands of infinite agents, I am inclined to assign measured prose as that species of language in which the greatest excellence is attainable. Some might think this sufficiently proved by the instance of the Bible, which, indeed, contains the most excellent language in our world of literature, and is also in measured prose. But it must be obvious that this argument would prove the converse only of the assertion, and not the assertion itself: it will not follow, that, because the best written book extant is in measured prose, therefore measured prose must be the language of the best written book; who can say but that there may be yet another revelation of God's will, and that in mere prose, which may as far transcend the present sacred volume in eloquence, as this does the homilies of the Archbishop of Grenada or the excerpts of a British plush-breech, a worthy lieutenant of St. Paul telling out a scriptural which has drunk largely of the poppy, to his somnolent congregation. This must be determined from other considerations, unless the argument be made use of in this way, viz. that the Bible being the work of God, must needs have been clothed in supremest language—but this would prove too much; for, by what we have demonstrated in our last paper, it would then be necessarily written in rhyme; unless the prophets be supposed capable of overleaping their intellectual barriers by the inspiration of God, to foretell future events, but not overcome the difficulties of language. No, the true reason of the sacred scriptures being in this species of metrical is, that the language is not derived from heaven at all, the Bible being merely the spirit of God informing the words of men, and they chose metrical prose as the best species of composition extant among the Hebrews, and most consonant to the sublime promulgations they were about to publish, which explanation sufficiently accounts for the excellence of the language without going to Heaven for it; where our ideas are sublime our language will be so too. I would only observe, that so far as it goes, we have the opinion of the prophets, that metrical prose is superior to mere prose, or they would not have preferred it in their writings.

Indeed, I think, so far, the question of superiority is decided without any trouble; for, considered either metaphysically or practically, in the hands of a spirit or a human being, there can be but little doubt of the inferiority of mere prose to measured, though there might be some as to its inferiority to blank verse or rhyme: in fact, measured prose is mere prose, with the addition of musical cadences, which is a sensile pleasure added, and yet occasioning no difficulty in preserving the attributes of mere prose by its addition, as we see in those most argumentative and most euphonous speeches of Demosthenes and Cicero. The mathematics also of the orientals are in beautiful measured phrase, without detracting a particle from their profundity; and, if it yet be doubted of the power of uniting poetry and reasoning, look at the immortal Verulam!

Secondly, let us compare measured prose and rhyme in this practical view: I presume it will be granted me, that that species of language, in which the proportion of pleasurable qualities to difficulties in composition is greatest, should be most capable of excellence among us mortals, who are unable to overcome the latter in any considerable degree. But here, the difficulty of combining reasoning and the requisite symphony of final words in rhyme, renders this species of language, as I may say, musical nonsense, generally speaking; for the writer has no choice of preponderant quality: he must make it musical or it is not rhyme, and it is scarcely musical unless it be nonsense; this follows as consequentially as villainy to the pre-probate, and damnation for his villainy.

But here, I am aware that your mathematician will require to be told the precise meanings of the two phrases, measured prose and mere prose, before he stirs a step in the argument, or will allow me to conclude any thing about them; and when I acknowledge my inability to do this, will cry out against the uncertainty and inconclusiveness of every thing but mathematics. He will ask me, what I mean by measured? where does metre begin and plain prose end? and if he should put a muster-roll to Handel's minuet, would it then be a metrical? then concludes by sending me a-peak to the mathematics for definitional accuracy.

Now I would beg leave to ask him, does he fatten in peace as to the infallibility of his own vocabulary and definitions? is his head so high in the clouds that he cannot see his feet are in a quagmire? and what would he think of being told that he knows as little of the meaning (i. e. such a meaning as he requires of me for the above phrases) of the rudiments of his own science, as Noah's pigeon did of divinity?

He defines a right line to be 'a line which lies evenly between its extremities,' and when I object to the vagueness of the word evenly (as he to measured) as a mere begging the question, there being no other meaning for evenly, that I know of, but straight or right, he concedes himself with the answer, that the word 'right' stands for a simple idea, and raises up his hands and eyes, blessing himself on the accuracy of his mathematical conceptions.

If then it be a simple idea, I beg leave to know how we come by it,—not by reflection, for right or straight is an attribute of extension, and can no more be separated from it, than large or small, not by sight; for though the eye be a judge of the distance between two points, it is angular distance, not linear,—nor by the touch, for it is a judge of physical lines, and magnitudes only, not of mathematical.

So that the plain truth is, he has no idea at all of a mathematical right line, for it is not a simple idea, and no one has ever yet attempted to analyse it, if it be complex; neither can he give the specific difference between it and a crossed line, nor tell where rectitude ceases and deviation begins,—so that the same number and description of objections lie against his notion of a right line as my notion of metre.

Much has been said of the wonderful exactness of the mathematical sciences, and the simplicity of their foundations, which has led the cultivators of these sciences to exalt them as impregnable to objections. Now this is by no means the case, and although the matter may be somewhat irrelevant to the subject of this paper, yet, as utility and not rhetoric is my object, I will devote the remainder of this essay to the giving my readers some insight into the defects which mathematics partake of, in common with all other sciences, and which all end in deficiency of first principles. Archimedes of Syracuse, said he would counterpoise the earth if you gave him where to stand; so I little doubt but that Sidrophel could bring down a star with a pop-gun, if he could make away with gravity any how: grant me my premises or first principles, and I will prove the new moon is a clippit shilling; such as your foundation is, such must your superstructure be, and it is in vain for mathematicians to claim utter perfection for their science, when its first principles are defective.

Another definition, then, in geometry is, 'a point is that which has no parts nor magnitude;'—hence we are indebted to the mathematicians for this piece of information, viz. that God is a mathematical point, for he has neither parts nor bodily magnitude. To get rid of this difficulty, we are told 'that' means a quantity, and that a point is a species of quantity,—so the definition will stand thus, 'a point is a quantity which has neither parts nor magnitude,' i. e. a body made up of parts which has yet no parts, and a magnitude which has no magnitude; which I apprehend is rather an oblique method of defining; but if it suit a mathematician, I am sure we have no reason to be squeamish about it.

The algebraist will tell you of a quantity less than nothing, upon which I am sure he will take it kindly if I advise him of his present deification and approach to omnipotence; and that not such a scurvy kind of omnipotence as is satisfied with doing things possible to be done, but impossibilities also, for he can not only annihilate, but reduce a quantity to a size below nothing.

Again; what will my readers say of a quantity which is neither something nor nothing, nor even less than nothing? Common sense will suppose I am playing upon it by proposing such a paradox, and yet mathematicians, from Newton to a freshman, hold its existence as undeniable as their own, naming it very pertinently, an imaginary or impossible quantity, and subjecting it to the operations of real quantities; and all this without ever laughing, that I have heard of.

These are a few of the premises of infallible mathematics, and upon these with others equally irrefragable, are built these stupendous fabrics, which tower among the clouds, and so often take the reason prisoner by their magnitude, are gaped at by the ignorant and lauded by the learned, as if every step from the base to the pinnacle, were as firm and inconcussible as the throne of God.

What, then, shall it be said I wish to derogate from the excellence of mathematics, or call their sublime conclusions into question? by no means—no one can be more fully aware of their utility, their extent, and their clearness in demonstration, than I am; I merely assert that their first principles are inaccurate, more inaccurate than those of many other species of reasoning.

It remains that we compare metrical prose with blank verse, which shall form the subject of my next paper.

RESOL.

GOLDSMITH AND THE FRIAR OF ORDERS GREY.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—While reading over the Friar of Orders Grey, a celebrated ballad supposed to be the production of Beaumont and Fletcher, I could not divest myself of the idea that Goldsmith must have had this poem in his mind when he wrote the Vicar of Wakefield, and which is particularly apparent in these verses of Edwin and Angelina.

The friar says,—

'Within those holy cloisters long
He languish'd, and he died
Lamenting of a lady's love,
And 'plaining of her pride.'

Angelina says,—

'Till quite dejected with my secret
He left me to my pangs,
And sought a solitude fiction;
In secret, where he died.'

The Friar,—

'But first, upon my true-love's grave
My weary limbs I'll lay,
And thrice I'll kiss the green grass,
That wraps his treach'rous clay.'

And art thou dead? thou much-lov'd youth!
And didst thou die for me?
Then, farewell home! for ever more
A pilgrim I will be.

Angelina:—

'But mine the folly, mine the fault,
And well my life shall pay;
I'll seek the selvins he sought,
And stretch me where he lay.
And there, forlorn, despairing, hid,
I'll lay me down and die;
'Twas so for me that Edwyn did,
And so for him will I.'

Friar:—

'Yet stay, fair lady! turn again,
And dry those pearly tears;
For see, beneath this gown of grey,
Thy own true love appears!'

Edwin:—

'Turn Angelina! ever dear,—
My chamber I turn to see;
Thy own, thy long-lost Edwin here,
Restored to love and thee.'

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—In the last number but one of Blackwood's Magazine,—that dynasty of periodicals,—is commenced a series of letters, under the title of the 'Fisherman's Budget,' to which I wish to call the attention of your readers, on account merely of one particular circumstance. The 'Budget' is introduced, according to the approved method in all such cases, with a fictitious narrative, wherein the discovery of this epistolary treasure is said to have taken place on the Welsh coast, by 'the Rev. Owen Owen Balderdash, M. A. and Vicar of Caengylliwalligul.' Now, what I would observe is, that the old-landish name of this parish has nothing whatever in common with the general structure of Welsh words; but, on the contrary, such a combination of letters is quite foreign to the language; and, to crown the whole, the letter z does not exist in Welsh either in form or in sound. It has, indeed, been employed by Mr. Owen in his dictionary to denote the double p, but has not been adopted by any subsequent writer, and consequently never occurs in the ordinary orthography. The name of Caengylliwalligul is, therefore, as much out of character on this occasion, as if a writer on the manners of Italy were to designate a place in that country by the name of Wycombe-in-the-Wolds, or by any other name equally at variance with the softness and mellifluousness of the Italian tongue. Indeed, such a name would have the advantage over that, so preposterously adopted in Blackwood's work, inasmuch as it has some meaning, whereas the one under consideration is as deficient in this respect as in every other. And here I would remark, that all names of places in Wales are as significant as any other words in the language.

The writer of the 'Budget' is also equally unfortunate in the choice of his hero's appellation; for I can venture to aver, that, from the days of Adam to the present, neither the name of Balderdash, nor any thing like it, was ever heard amongst the Welsh mountaineers.

Nor has our learned Budgeteer been more happy in his knowledge of Welsh history. For he talks of an ancient mansion, the residence of the famous Owain Glyndwr, being near the banks of the Conwy, whereas it is well known that he never resided within fifty miles of the spot.

Surely, Mr. Editor, you will allow, that, when we pretend to pourtray the characteristics of any country, we ought to have some previous knowledge upon the subject—some trivial acquaintance with its history and other peculiarities. But here is a writer, hazarding an appearance before the world, in utter ignorance of what he is writing about, merely because he has the presumption to suppose every one else to be as ill-informed as himself. Would such literary quackery be, for a moment, tolerated, with reference to Italy, Germany, France, or even Scotland itself? Why then is it to be endured with respect to Wales?

I cannot conclude without offering a parting word of advice to the conductors of this dandy Magazine, which is, that when they venture again out of the 'land o' cakes,' they will have the good sense to make some decent provision for their journey, and not make their appearance amongst strangers with such a beggarly want of necessary equipments. ORDOVEK.

London, Aug. 7th, 1821.

P. S. In my last communication, (No. 115, p. 437, col. 1.) in the Greek quotation, the word φωτος was misprinted φωτος.—From CAMBRIDGE's silence, I take it for granted, that his sketch of 'Marian' is, as I suspected.

CORONATION ANECDOTE.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—In your last Literary Chronicle, under the article of 'Macdonnell of Glengarry,' you allude to the circumstance of a lady having accidentally dropped her glove at the coronation of his late Majesty George the Third,—that this accident was perverted into a defiance to the champion's challenge, and the lady metamorphosed into the Pretender in petticoats, &c.

In turning over the pages of a very entertaining and excellent work, to which I was a subscriber some years since, intitled 'Clavis Calendaris, or a Compendious Analysis of the Calendar, by John Brady,' I find the following similar, but more curious, anecdote related:—

'A ludicrous circumstance occurred at the coronation of King William and Queen Mary. Charles Dymock, Esq. who then exercised the right of being Champion, cast his gauntlet on the pavement in the usual form, and the challenge was proclaimed, when an old woman, who had entered the Hall on crutches, immediately took it up, and quitted the spot with extraordinary agility, leaving her crutches behind her, and a female glove, with a challenge in it to meet the Champion the next day in Hyde Park! Accordingly, the old woman, or, as is generally supposed, a good swordsman in that disguise, attended at the hour and place named in the challenge; but the Champion did not make his appearance, nor does it appear whether any measures were taken to discover who had passed so unseemly a joke.'

At a time when every anecdote connected with the coronation is extremely interesting, you will probably find this extract sufficiently so to merit insertion in your columns. I am, sir,

Your most obedient servant,
6th Aug. 1821. J. H. A.

Biography.

HER LATE MAJESTY

QUEEN CAROLINE.

If the most illustrious birth or the highest destiny could in themselves confer happiness, then had her late Majesty been the happiest of mortals; but, alas! the experience of many years had taught her how little the world's treasures or the world's honours could alleviate the sorrows of a wounded heart, and she might justly exclaim,—

Greatness, most envied when least understood,
Thou art no real but a seeming good;
Sick at the heart, thou in the face look'st well!

By thy exalted state we only grieve
To be more wretched than the vulgar can.'

The family of Brunswick, of the reunited branches of which her late Majeaty was the immediate descendant and representative, possesses such well founded claims to antiquity and importance, that it has engaged a more than ordinary share of the attention of genealogists and historians. An English subject, as Gibbon observes, might be justly proud, in investigating the origin and history of a family which, after an alliance with the daughter of our King, has been called by the voice of a free people to the legal inheritance of a crown; but we shall only observe that the family of Brunswick is one of the most distinguished houses in Germany, and that, at a period when families which now rank high, were but feudal chiefs, the house of Brunswick were sovereigns and independent princes. Without, however, seeking to give additional honours to her late Majesty from an illustrious ancestry, it may be enough to state that she was the niece of our late venerable sovereign; that her father was that brave Duke of Brunswick, who was slain but not conquered, in resisting the power of Bonaparte, when cotemporary princes were tamely submitting to his way and profiting by their subserviency; and that she was the sister of that gallant Duke, who, bearing on his sword his parent's and his country's wrongs, rushed first in the onset against Napoleon when he returned from Elba, and fell gloriously at the battle of Ligny. This prince, atong with the indignities that his father had suffered, clothed his little army in mourning and swore that they should never wear any other uniform until those wrongs were avenged.

Her late Majesty, Caroline Amelia Elizabeth, was the daughter of Charles Ferdinand, Duke of Brunswick, by Augusta, daughter of Frederick, Prince of Wales, and sister to his late Majesty. She was born at Brunswick on the 17th of May, 1768, and was remarkable, from her earliest youth, for a vivacity of disposition and for that heroic spirit which has never been confined to the male branches of the House of Brunswick. Her father's court was one of the gayest, and, at the same time, the most polished in Germany; and although the young princess paid due attention to her education, yet she participated freely in the pleasures of the court, and displayed a cheerfulness of disposition which sometimes, in after life, subjected her to a suspicion of levity, although those who were best acquainted with her, knew it was nothing more than that innocent gaiety which, at a continental court, might be indulged without the slightest imputation.

When it was deemed advisable at the British court, as well to restrain the youthful follies of the heir apparent, as to perpetuate the succession to the crown in the direct line, that the Prince of Wales should enter into a matrimonial union, the young princess of Brunswick was looked to as the most eligible match: she was descended from the same stock, was nearly allied to the crown, and was of the same religion as the establishment of England. The Prince of Wales, it was generally believed, was not very anxious to marry; but policy as well as the wishes of his parent dictated an acquiescence. The King was anxious to know whether his son had any predilections, and, to ascertain this point, got a nobleman who had not long before been at Brunswick, to introduce the subject to his Royal Highness. The Prince inquired respecting the person of the young princess, and was told she very much resembled his sister the Princess Mary. This was the strongest recommendation possible, as she was not only remarkably beautiful, but, of all his sisters, was the one to whom he was most attached. His Royal Highness thus readily agreeing to the match, immediate arrangements were made for carrying it into effect. The Earl of Malmesbury, accompanied by Mrs. Harcourt and other personages, was despatched to Brunswick, in the Jupiter, and returned on the 5th of April, 1795, with the royal bride. The Princess landed at Greenwich Hospital, where she was received by Sir Hugh Palliser, the Governor and other officers, and conducted to the governor's house. Lady Jersey arrived about an hour after the Princess landed.

It is impossible to conceive the bustle occasioned at Greenwich by the arrival of the Princess. The congregation at the Hospital Chapel left it, before the service was half over; and even the pulpit was forsaken for a sight of her Highness. After partaking of some refreshment and changing her dress, the Princess left the governor's house and got into one of the King's coaches drawn by six horses, and set off to town. In this coach were also Lady Jersey and Mrs. Harcourt. Other coaches, with Lord Malmesbury, Colonel Greville, &c. and two women servants, the only German attendants she had brought, followed. The Princess's carriage was escorted on each side by a party of the Prince of Wales's own regiment of light dragoons; and, besides this escort, the road was lined at short distances by troops of the heavy dragoons, who were stationed from Greenwich all the way to the Horse Guards. There were, besides, hundreds of horsemen who followed her to town. All along the road, which was crowded, the people cheered the Princess with loud expressions of love and loyalty, and she, in return, very graciously bowed and smiled at them as she passed along. At three o'clock, her Highness alighted at St. James, and was conducted to the apartments prepared for her reception, which look into Cleveland Row. After a short time, the Princess appeared at the windows, which were thrown up; the people huzzed and she curtied; and this continued some minutes, until the Prince of Wales arrived from Carlton House: the first interview between two persons destined for an immediate union may be better conceived than expressed; it is said to have been very affectionate, and to have given hopes that the union would have been a happy one—hopes which unfortunately were so early blasted for ever. At a little before five o'clock the Prince and Princess sat down to dinner.

The people continuing to huzza before the palace, his Royal Highness, after dinner, appeared at the window, and thanked them for this mark of their loyalty and attention to the Princess, but hoped they would excuse her appearance then, as it might give her cold. This satisfied the crowd, who gave his Royal Highness three cheers. In the evening, when the populace had become rather noisy in their expressions of loyalty and attachment, before the Prince's apartments, in Cleveland Row, her Royal Highness appeared at the window, and in a voice of tenderness and grateful affection, thus addressed them: 'Believe me, I feel very happy and delighted to see the good and brave English people—the best nation upon earth.' The Prince afterwards addressed the people in a very condescending manner, and received the tribute of no vocal applause.

On the evening of the 8th of April, the solemnity of the marriage of the Prince and the Princess was performed in the Chapel Royal, by the Archbishop of Canterbury. The procession was of the most splendid description. The bride, in her nuptial habit, with a coronet, was led by the Duke of Clarence, and her train was borne by four unmarried daughters of Dukes and Earls. On entering the chapel, her Highness was conducted to the seat prepared for her, near her Majesty's chair of state. The bridegroom wore his collar of the order of the Garter, and he was supported by two unmarried Dukes, Bedford and Roxburgh. The procession of their Majesties followed; it included the whole of the princes and princesses of the blood royal.

Upon entering the chapel, the several persons in the procession were conducted to the places appointed for them; and, at the conclusion of the marriage service, their Majesties retired to their chairs of state under the canopy, while the anthem was performing. On the return of the procession, the king, the queen, the bridegroom, and bride, with the rest of the royal family and the great officers of state, proceeded to the Levee Chamber, where the registry of the marriage was attested with the usual formalities. After this, the procession continued into the lesser drawing-room, thence to the great Council Chamber, where the officers of state, the nobility, foreign ministers, and other persons of distinction, paid their compliments on the occasion.

The evening concluded with very splendid illuminations and other public demonstrations of joy throughout London and Westminster.

No sooner was the marriage consummated, than Parliament, with its accustomed liberality, made ample provision for the illustrious pair, by settling on the Prince of Wales an annual revenue of 125,000*l.* together with the rents of the Duchy of Cornwall. Out of this income, 73,000*l.* were appropriated to the discharge of the debts of the Prince previously contracted. The jointure of the Princess was fixed at 50,000*l.* a year.

There is, perhaps, no situation in life less envious than that of princes, who, from motives of policy, are doomed to enter into the most solemn of all obligations, and to consent to a union in which the heart does not participate. It is not, then to be wondered at, that a few royal marriages are really happy; yet although the affections may be strangled, it is not surely too much to expect that those who have consented to the union should so far respect the delicacies of society as not entirely to disregard it: and although the Prince and Princess of Wales might never have loved each other, yet, as their appearance in public was only essential on days of state ceremony, they might have lived on such terms as need scarcely have betrayed it. This, however, unfortunately, was not the case, and, within a few short months of the marriage, serious misunderstandings were said to have occurred between the royal pair; nor did that greatest of all bonds of union, the birth of a child, tend to reconcile them, although the public looked forward to the event with eagerness.

It was on the 7th of January, 1796, that the late much lamented Princess Charlotte was born, to the great joy of their majesties and of the nation. A few days afterwards, an address of congratulation to the Prince of Wales on the event, was voted by the city of London, but his Royal Highness declined to receive it, on the ground that, having been under the necessity of dismissing his establishment, he could not entertain the deputation in a manner suitable to his rank and with that respect which was due to the city of London.

Original Poetry.

EXTEMPORE LINES.

Written on hearing of the Melancholy Death of Her Majesty.

Ou! mourn in the sadness of woe,
Lay your harps on the willows to weep,
Each bosom with anguish o'erflow,
And sorrow be lasting and deep!
Bid Pity in mourning appear,
All nature look and at the sight;
Let Morning be dimm'd with a tear,
And darker the sables of night!
Let Slander its envious breath
Be mute, and its malice give o'er;
Its object is quiet in death,
And food for its rancour no more!

Ye reptiles who wronged her now cease,
Tho' she felt not the force of your sting;
In heaven she resteth in peace,
Where your shafts have no power of wing!
Her soul, in the fulness of joy,
Rejoiceth the babe of her breast,—
Sweet solace that knows no alloy,
Finds peace on her bosom of rest!
Where God, in his mercy, all fears
That weigh'd the lone wanderer down,
Shall dry from her eye-lids the tears
Repay'd by an heavenly crown!

SONNET.

Written in Darley Grove, near Derby.

Hark! let me pause beside the tranquil stream,
While many Derwent's silver waters flow;
Thou, Contemplation, thy mild gifts bestow,

While from the muses darts a radiant beam:
How sweet, how grateful the poetic dream,
When Nature, led by Cultivation's hand,
Improves, enriches a surrounding land,
And Industry and Plenty grace the theme—
Oft hast thou heard, ye Dryads, of this grove,
The lovers' vows, the tender maidens' sighs;
O may they never whisper here of love,
Whose heart is recent and whose word belies!

May no such traitor in this grove appear,
But love and innocence be ever sacred here!

STANZAS

On hearing an Itinerant Musician, whose Voice and Style reminded the Author of Miss Copeland, of the Surrey Theatre.

'THAT strain again—it had a dying fall,
And ever thus no Copeland touch'd the chord,
Would fancy warm the memory recall
Of pure delight her thrilling tones afford.

That voice! ah, surely it can never be!

Yes,—soul, the sweet delusion still enjoy—
Tis Copeland's voice awakes my sympathy,
As erst enchanting Richard's minstrel boy;

Or pouring forth Madge's heart-broken strains,
She bids our tears in plentiful streams Flow!

Ah! who would miss the pleasure of such pain,
Whose hearts the tender balm of pity know!

Thus let me dream the silent hours away—
Thus let me snatch a visionary bliss—
For, oh! if aught can a world of woe repay,
It surely must be this.

APOSTROPHE TO GRANDMAA'S NOSE.

DELIGHTFUL organ of the human frame!

Aonian hail! through whose fine arches stray
The breathings of sweet dreams: to bear thee
play,

Methinks thou art an instrument of fame,
Excelling creaking hinges,—chimneys' sounds,
The oboe's upper notes,—the bagpipe's groans.

The clarion's voice,—or raven's deeper tones:
Or trees, when Boreas goes his northern rounds!
O! when the midnight scene is dark and chill,
And curtains close us in our charmed bed,

What intonations thy large nostrils fill!
I own their charm,—'e'en now I feel a thrill
That keeps me watchful as a nurse, instead Of sleep—I count the passing moments—my will,

Cecilia! yields to thee, till night has fled.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—The Coronation has proved as attractive as we anticipated, and crowded audiences have nightly attested their approbation, and filled the coffers of the treasury. The liberal and splendid manner in which Mr. Elliston has done honour to an important event, and at the same time contributed extensively to the gratification of the public, is, we trust, an earnest of better days and better doings than we have hitherto witnessed at this house.

COVENT GARDEN.—This theatre

closed an unusually long and, we believe, a successful season on Tuesday, with Shakespeare's Henry IV., which, it appears, has been played not less than twenty-seven times. The house re-opens on the 21st of September; leaving a season of little more than six weeks for the summer theatres. The following farewell address was spoken by Mr. Fawcett:—

'LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—I present myself to perform an unpleasant part of my duty,—that of taking leave of you; but I derive consolation from the hope that the separation will be of short duration. A retrospective glance at our campaign affords matter for gratitude and exultation, for you have generously patronized us by your approval, and our most gracious monarch has twice honoured us by the sanction of his name and presence. Most of our new productions have been successful. For the lovers of music, opera, in the earlier part of the season, took the lead, and held a conspicuous place. To please our juvenile friends at Christmas and Easter, our harlequin pantomime and melo-drama were happy in the extreme. Amongst plays of a classical and refined cast, three new and successful tragedies, in one season, is a proof that modern authors are not neglected by us, nor unrewarded by you. But, to conclude our labours on the 7th of August, with one of the great works of our immortal bard, got up in such a manner as to occasion its repetition twenty-seven times (to the most crowded and splendid audiences ever congregated within the walls of a theatre), furnishes materials for dramatic history, and affords me the pleasing opportunity of now offering you the most sincere and grateful thanks of our proprietors. Until the 27th of September next we close; and I can with truth declare, no day in the interim will be passed without an effort to re-open with (if possible) increased effect. The performers, ladies and gentlemen, and the humble individual who has the honour to address you, beg to add their thanks; and we all, for the present, most respectfully bid you farewell.'

HAYMARKET.—A new comedy, from the most prolific and ingenious living dramatist, Mr. Thomas Dibdin, was produced at this theatre on Saturday night with the most complete success. It was intitled Rise and Fall, and the following is a sketch of the plot:—

Sir Omium Traffic (Mr. Williams), a rich and adventurous speculator, arrives with his niece, Miss Traffic (Mrs. Tayleure), at his splendid villa, in the highest style of mercantile magnificence, and is requested to patronize the intended marriage of Rose (Mrs. Chatterley), their head gardener's daughter, with Sensitive (Mr. Jones), a worthy and well-educated young man, in reduced circumstances, through the misfortunes of a deceased parent. The wealthy baronet and his niece treat their dependants with a considerable degree of hauteur, and object to a marriage not originally arranged under their auspices, when they receive an electrical shock in the news of a continental failure involving them in sudden poverty, and the necessity of selling their estates. On the other hand, the unassuming village schoolmaster, Sensitive, becomes as unexpectedly the possessor of an immense income, which enables him to purchase the baronet's domain; and a number of whimsical incidents are elicited from the rise of one family and fall of the other. Sensitive, in spite of every temptation laid out for him, remains true to the humble Rose, and promises to assist his friend Trampley (Mr. Terry), an eccentric literary wanderer, in the service of the periodical press, with a large sum of money, when a codicil is discovered to the will of his benefactor, Sir Robert (Mr. Younger), which restricts him from marrying for three years, or from 'tending any sum above five pounds. While perplexed with these unlooked-for drawbacks, it is discovered that the testator is yet living, having been shipwrecked and supposed lost, but preserved, providentially, on his passage from the Indies; and the failure of Sir Omium's agent turns out to be a fabrication, made with an intention to cure him of a dangerous partiality for hazardous speculation. Sensitive, however, is equally well provided for during his patron's life, married his dear Rose, and all parties are rendered contented with each other.

This is one of those light three act pieces peculiar to this house, which, hovering between farce and comedy, partakes of the best features of both without any invasion of the strict rules of either; the story is developed with considerable art; the incidents arise easily and naturally, and the equivogue is carried on without any sacrifice of probability either in the conduct or expressions of the characters that are involved in it. The dialogue is maintained throughout in the happiest manner, it is the elevated conversation of true comedy, enlivened by flashes of genuine wit and humour. The acting did justice to the conception of the author. Jones, on whom the principal weight of the piece rested, and we know no one better able to bear a load of this description, played with that spirit, vivacity, and natural ease which have ranked him among the first comedians of the day. Terry, in the character of a literary adventurer who writes for the newspapers, exercised much and deserved applause. Oxberry, in a very grotesque dress, made a good deal of the lawyer; and De Camp made the best French valet we ever saw on the stage. This character conveyed an excellent moral and showed how little a man can depend upon professions of friendship when they are forsaken by fortune. Mrs. Chatterley played with the prettiest rustic simplicity, and Mr. Tayleure infused a good deal of humour into the character of the gardener. The scenery was very beautiful; and the piece met with the most triumphant success, with the best audience of the season. It was announced for repetition every evening, amid the loudest cheers.

ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.—An interlude, intitled Two Wives, or a Husband, was produced on Tuesday. The plot consists merely of the endeavours of the parents of a young lady, to work a reformation in her cruel and morose husband; this task is undertaken by their servant (Harley), and he accomplishes it by feigning that the former wife of the tyrant, who was supposed to have been drowned, was still living, and about to prosecute him for bigamy. The piece is lively, and Harley sings a laughable song, and bustles through four different characters; but these mono-dramas have had their day, and we do not think this will be long on the stage, although it is well played, and was received with every mark of complete success.

Literature and Science.

Pyroligneous Acid.—The value of the vinegar of wood, lately successfully used for the purpose of preserving meat for a great length of time, even in warm climates, has been proved by M. J. Stanley, M. D. as follows:

'Having previously made several experiments with the acid, which were favourable, on the 6th of October, 1819, I prepared two pieces of fresh meat (beef) with the pyroligneous acid, applying it lightly over their surfaces by means of a small brush. After hanging up in my kitchen till the 12th of November following, I gave one of the specimens to the captain of a vessel bound for the West Indies, with directions to observe and note any change that might take place during his voyage. In the month of Oct. 1820, he restored me this specimen. On comparing it with that left at home, I could perceive no sensible difference. On the 21st of December following, I caused both to be thoroughly boiled, and when served up they were declared by several gentlemen who tasted them with me, to be perfectly fresh and sweet, and, with the addition of salt and vegetables, a palatable and wholesome dish.

Ice.—M. Hemphane, of Brussels, has shown, that ice for summer use should be taken from the river on a very cold day, and be exposed on the following night to the open air, till its temperature is in equilibrio with the cold of the atmosphere. It should be then placed in the ice-house, about six o'clock in the morning when the air becomes warmer. In order to prove the advantages of this method, he supposes that two ice-houses have been filled with ice, one with ice at 32°, and the other with ice at 14°. When a sixth part of the ice at 32° is melted the ice at 14° will be untouched, but its temperature will have risen to 32°. One sixth part of the whole, therefore, has been saved by laying it up at a low temperature.

Egyptian Antiquities.—M. Caillaud, who accompanied the expedition of Ismael Bey to Dongolah, remained some time at Thebes, where he discovered a mummy coeval with the time of the Greeks. On the head of the embalmed personage, is a gilt crown, in the form of a lotus. The body is wrapped up in bandelets, after the Egyptian manner. On the case or sarcophagus, which envelopes the mummy, inscriptions are visible, some in Greek, and others in hieroglyphics. On the right side, there appears tied with fillets, a manuscript on papyrus, in the Greek language. The linen that covers the mummy is overspread with Egyptian subjects and hieroglyphic signs. In the interior of the case, the signs of the zodiac are represented. This valuable monument is in excellent preservation, though the design, the ornaments, and the colours are not so perfect as in some more ancient works. It appears from hence that the Egyptians attained, under the Greeks, an acquaintance with hieroglyphics. The famous stone of Rosetta had already proved this, as it regards the epoch of Ptolemy Epiphanes; and certain inscriptions recently found at the feet of the Sphinx, in the excavations of Capt. Cavaglia warrant the opinion that the art of their writing had been preserved to a certain time under the Romans.

In some recent excavations, by the Arabs, at Thebes, a tomb was opened, wherein were ten or twelve cases of mummies, three of which had Greek inscriptions by the side of hieroglyphics!

The annexed is a translation of one of them:—'Tomb of Typhon, son of Heracles Soter and of Seraposis. He was born on the second day of Athur, in the 5th year of our Lord Adrian. He died on the 20th of the month Meebir, in the 11th year of the same Lord, at the age of six years, two months, and twenty days. He was buried on the 12th of Athur, in the 12th of Adrian.'

This inscription must have lasted 1631 years, Adrian having commenced his reign in the year 117 of the Christian Era.

M. Caillaud has, moreover, found in the catacombs of Thebes, a number of different objects that shed a new light on the manners and customs of the Egyptians, such as furniture, apparel for the legs and feet, ornaments for the toilet, and even ancient bread in good preservation.

It was not Dr. Julep's skill
That kill'd me: no, but being ill,
I thought I saw him by my side—
That was enough for me—I died.

A lawyer, noted for a closer attention to his own interest than that of his clients, had adopted for his motto, 'Successus aut spem,' which a wag thus rendered into English: 'I have cheated five hundred, and hope to cheat five hundred more.'

A boy, about ten years of age, was lately asked by Mr. H. who made him. 'Moses,' replied the boy. 'Are you not mistaken?' said Mr. H. 'No, sir. Will you tell me who made you?' 'Aaron.' 'What,' said the boy, 'are you that cursed calf that Aaron made?'

At the marriage of Monsieur, the Count d'Artois, the city of Paris agreed to distribute marriage portions. A smart little girl, of sixteen, named Lise Noirin, having presented herself to inscribe her name on the list, was asked who was her lover?—'O!' said she, with great simplicity, 'I have no lover; I thought the city furnished every thing.'—This answer created much mirth; and in the event a husband was found for her.

Madame de Staël.—This celebrated author and strong-minded woman was not free from singular superstitions. In her last illness, finding she could not recover, she became impatient, and took many singular whims into her head, one of which was, that she could not die comfortably, save in the bed of her intimate friend, Madame Gay, (the author of two of the best French novels of the present day, and several successful dramatic pieces.) Madame G. instantly consented to it, and Madame de Staël was conveyed on a mattress to her house, and the instant she was put into Madame G.'s own bed, she said, 'now, my dear Sophie, I shall die in peace—God bless you.'

Nature appears in Switzerland in some of its most awful and majestic forms.—The stupendous summits of the Alps, clothed in eternal snow, the glaciers or seas of ice, intersected with numerous fissures, the tremendous precipices, the descending torrents, and dashing cataracts, are objects singularly terrific and sublime. Sometimes masses of snow and ice, loosened from these mountains, are suddenly precipitated into the valleys below, sweeping away flocks and villages in their course, and even the mountains themselves sometimes burst asunder, and overwhelm thousands of people by their fall:—

From steep to steep loud thundering down they come.

A wintry waste in dire commotion all;
And herds and flocks, and travellers and swains,
And sometimes whole brigades of marching troops,

Or hamlets, sleeping in the dead of night,
Are deep-beneath the smothering ruin whelm'd.

Alady once complained that a gentleman, during the whole of divine service, kept his eyes constantly fixed on her face. 'Pray, madam,' said the person to whom the complaint was made, 'where were your own eyes all this time?'

The 19th of July is memorable in more respects than the coronation of our present sovereign. 1. On that day, 1338, Edward defeated the Scots, with great slaughter, at Halidown Hill, near Berwick-upon-Tweed. On that day, 1554, Philip II. King of Spain, landed at Southampton, and was married to the sanguinary Mary, at Winchester, on the 25th of the same month—a union to which a great part of the nation had, with good cause, the utmost aversion. 3. On that day, 1575, began a most magnificent entertainment, given to Queen Elizabeth by the Earl of Leicester, in Kenilworth Castle, Warwickshire, which was extraordinary for expense and magnificence. The daily expense is said to have been, even at that time, 1000l. to the earl. 'Surely,' observes Hume, 'one may say of such a guest, what Cicero said to Atticus, on occasion of a visit paid him by Cæsar— "If she relieved the people from oppressions, her visits were a great oppression to the nobility." 4. On that day, 1598, the Spanish Armada arrived in the English channel; but was soon after compelled to retreat.

Review of New Books.

Journal of a Residence in the Burmah Empire, and more particularly at the Court of Amarapoorah. By Captain Hiram Cox, of the Honourable East India Company's Bengal Native Infantry. 8vo. pp. 431. London, 1821.

THE Burmah empire, which comprises the countries of Ava, Arracan, Siam, and Pegu, is situated on the eastern side of the Bay of Bengal. It is nearly one thousand miles in length and six hundred in breadth, and it contains a population of upwards of seven millions. The journal of Captain Cox, which contains a full description of this country, hitherto so imperfectly known to Europeans, was written during a residence there, in 1796. His premature death, at the age of thirty-nine years, in the midst of an employment afterwards, in the province of Arracan, that required all his time and attention, prevented him from making any addition to his journal, and even from arranging what he had already written. That task has since devolved on his son, who has added nothing, and only omitted such minor details as were made for the gratification of the writer, and were not of public interest.

The journal comprises a period of thirteen months from the 8th of October, 1796, when Captain Cox sailed up the Rangoon River, to the 1st of November, 1797. In the expedition to Amarapoorah, he was absent eleven months. As the author appears to have paid close attention to the manners and customs of this peculiar people, and as he is rather felicitous in his talent at description, he has, without the slightest effort, or appearance of book-making, furnished us with a very interesting volume, which is, at the same time, a valuable contribution towards a complete history of Oriental customs. On the 14th of November, he saw a procession of the natives to the principal Pagoda:—

‘There,’ says he, ‘I had carpets spread, and chairs placed for myself and Mr. V.C. III.

Burnet, and commanded a perfect view of the men and women going and returning. The crowd of both sexes was very great from sun-rise till ten o'clock, every one carrying, or rather offering, according to their abilities or zeal. Some of them bore pageants in the form of trees, the branches loaded with clothes, betel, and other necessities for the priests; others, elegantly constructed pyramids of various forms on the backs of paper-elephants, crocodiles, or giants. These pyramids were very neatly made of coloured paper and wax, formed into fret-work containing fire-works—others fire-works, cloth, or fruit. The officers of government, and those who could afford the expense, were preceded by the country musicians; all were dressed in their gala-suits, and in the silks manufactured in the country, which, for texture and vivid colours, would be esteemed even in polished circles. The manners of the whole reflected credit upon them as a nation: no jostling or ill-humour was seen, all were gay and decorous. The dress of the women impresses strangers with an idea of their being immodest; but, in my opinion, they are quite the reverse: frank, but innocent; affectionate wives and tender mothers.’

A singular mode of trial, called rather improperly a trial by ordeal, took place a few days after, to ascertain the truth of an accusation of adultery against a native:—

‘The defendant denying the charge, the principals, witnesses, and court, adjourned to a small pagoda without the walls of the town, when all the parties were solemnly sworn according to the rites of the Burmah faith, the depositions of the witnesses taken down, and the deity invoked by the priest to judge between the parties. A certain quantity of wax was weighed in two equal portions, and formed into two candles, which were lighted at the same instant. One was held by the plaintiff, the other by the defendant; and the holder of the candle which first burnt out, was adjudged to have sworn falsely, and of course lost the cause, and would be sentenced to pay the costs of the suit, amounting to four hundred ticals, and damages three hundred ticals. In this case the defendant's candle burnt out first, when the people gave a shout, and the plaintiff's friends, having previously prepared a band of music and dancers, they exhibited before the people. This much only I have been able to authenticate; whether the woman is liable to be repudiated, or whether there are any variations in the fines, I have not as yet ascertained.’

When Captain Cox, in proceeding up the river, came to Raynaungong, or as it is pronounced by the natives Yanaunghong, he stopped to visit the wells of Naptha, or earth oil, which are about three miles from the river. They are scattered irregularly, at no great distance from each other, some not more than thirty or forty yards. At the particular place he visited, he was informed, that there were one hundred and eighty wells, and four or five miles to the north-east, there were three hundred and forty more:—

‘In making a well, the hill is cut down, so as to form a square table of fourteen or twenty feet for the crown of the well, and from this table a road is formed by scraping away an inclined plane for the drawers to descend, in raising the excavated earth from the well, and subsequently the oil. The shaft is sunk of a square form, and lined, as the miner proceeds, with squares of cassia wood staves; these staves are about six feet long, six inches broad, and two thick, and are rudely jointed and pinned at right angles to each other, forming a square frame about four and a half feet in the clear for the uppermost ones, but more contracted below. When a miner has pierced six or more feet of the shaft, a series of these square frames are piled on each other, and regularly added to at top; the whole gradually sinking as he deepens the shaft, and securing him against the falling in of the sides. The soil or strata to be pierced is, first, a light sandy loam, intermixed with fragments of quartz, silice, &c. Secondly, a friable sand-stone easily wrought, with thin horizontal strata of a concrete of marial ore, talc*, and indurated argil, at from ten or fifteen feet from the surface, and also from each other, as there are several of these veins in the great body of free-stone. Thirdly, at twenty cubits, more or less, from the surface, and immediately below the free-stone, a pale blue argillaceous earth (schista) appears, impregnated with the petroleum, and smelling strongly of it. This, they say, is very difficult to work, and grows harder as they get deeper.

* The talc has this singularity; it is de-lucated, its lamina being perpendicular to the horizontal lamina of the argil on which it is seated.’

er, ending in schist and slate, such as is found covering veins of coal in Eufoupe. Below this schist, at the depth of one hundred and thirty cubits, is coal. I procured some (intermixed with sulphur and pyrites), which had been taken from a well, deepened a few days before my arrival; but deemed amongst them a rarity, as they are seldom obliged to proceed to such a depth. They were piercing a new well when I was there; had got to the depth of eighty cubits, and expected oil at ten or twenty cubits more.

'The machinery used in drawing up the rubbish, and afterwards the oil from the well, is an axle crossing the centre of the well, resting on two rude forked stanchions, with a revolving barrel on its centre, like the nave of a wheel, in which is a score for receiving the draw-rope; the bucket is of wicker work, covered with dammer; and the labour of the drawers, consisting in general of three men, is facilitated by the descent of the inclined plane, as water is drawn from deep wells in Hindostan. To receive the oil, one man is stationed at the brink of the well, who empties the bucket into a channel made on the surface of the earth, leading to a sunken jar, from whence it is laded into smaller ones, and immediately carried down to the river, either by coolies or on hackeries*. When a well grows dry, they deepen it. They say, none are abandoned for barrenness. Even the death of a miner from mephitetic air does not deter others from persisting in deepening them when dry. Two days before my arrival, a man was suffocated in one of the wells; yet they afterwards renewed their attempts without further accident. I recommended trying the air with a candle, &c. with seemingly little effect.

'The oil is drawn pure from the wells in the liquid state, as used without variation; but in the cold season it congeals in the open air, and always loses something of its fluidity; the temperature of the wells preserving it in a liquid state fit to be drawn. A man, who was lowered into a well one hundred and ten cubits, in my presence, and immediately drawn up, perspired copiously at every pore: unfortunately, I had no other means of trying the temperature. The oil is of a dingy green, and odoriferous: it is used for lamps, and, boiled with a little dammer (a resin of the country) for paying the timbers of houses, and the bottoms of boats, &c. which it preserves from decay and vermin. Its medicinal properties known to the natives, cause it to be employed as a lotion in cutaneous eruptions, and as an embrocation in bruises and rheumatic affections.'

The property of these wells is in the owners of the soil natives of the country, and descends to the heir general, as a kind of entailed estate. The cost of sinking a new well is 2500 sicca rupees, and the annual average, net profit, is 1250 sicca rupees. The average produce of each well is about 1824 lbs. avoirdupois per day. Each well is worked by four men, who have one-sixth of the produce for their labour:—

'From the wells the oil is carried in small jars, by coolies or on carts, to the river; where it is delivered to the merchant exporter, at two ticals per hundred vis; the value being enhanced three-eighths by the expense and risk of portage; therefore, the gross value or profit to the country of the whole, deducting five per cent. for wastage, may be stated at 1,081,800 ticals, or 1,362,525 sicca rupees per annum, yielding a direct revenue to the king of 136,232 sicca rupees per annum, and perhaps thrice as much more before it reaches the consumer; besides the benefit the whole country must derive from the productive industry called into action, by the constant employment of so large a capital on so gross an article. There were between seventy and eighty boats, average burthen sixty tons each, loading oil at the several wharfs, and others constantly coming and going while I was there. A number of boats and men also find constant employment in providing the pots, &c. for the oil; and the extent of this single branch of internal commerce, (for almost the whole is consumed in the country,) will serve to give some insight into the internal commerce and resources of the country. At the wells, the price of the oil is seven annas seven pice, per 112lbs. avoirdupois; at the port of Ranghoo it is sold at the rate of three sicca rupees, three annas, and six pice, per 112lbs., or per hoghead of sixty-three gallons, (weighing 504lbs.) fourteen rupees, seven annas, nine pice, exclusive of the cask; or per Bengal bazar maund, two rupees, five annas, eight pice; whereas the mustard-seed and other vegetable oils sell, at Ranghoo, at eleven rupees per bazar maund.

'To conclude, this oil is a genuine petroleum, possessing all the properties of coal-tar, being, in fact, the self-same thing; the only difference is, that Nature elaborates in the bowels of the earth, that for the Burmahans, for which European nations are obliged to the ingenuity of Lord Dundonald.'

On the 24th of January, Captain Cox reached the city of Amarapoora, which, including the suburbs, extends four miles along the south-eastern bank of the river, and teems with religious buildings of various shapes. On the 1st of February, he got to Mheghoon, the residence of the sovereign. It is an assemblage of bamboo huts, with a few wooden houses, straggling along the western bank of the river for about two miles, under a range of high barren hills:—

'About the centre of what is called the city, is a wooden palace of his majesty's, externally of a mean appearance; and along the bank near it were ranged about ten large accommodation boats for the royal family. They have houses erected on them, with gilt mouldings and ornaments, also two large ones, with high pagodas on them for his majesty's and the queen's particular use; but I defer giving a more minute description of them until some future opportunity offers of closer inspection. A little beyond his majesty's palace is the site of the intended pagoda; at present, they are advanced but little above the foundation; and, as the dimensions are very great, it will require some years to finish it. His majesty holds his court at present in a large one-poled tent, on a sand-bank, in the river opposite, but nearly three-fourths of a mile east of the pagoda, where he remains while dispensing charity to the priesthood. Besides his tent, he has a temporary bamboo-palace, and the bank is covered with the huts of his particular attendants.'

After some difficulty in arranging the forms in which Captain Cox was to be admitted, he had an audience of the king, on the 8th of February, in his tent, of which he gives the following account:—

'The grand audience-tent is circular, about three hundred feet in diameter, supported in the centre by a stout mast, about sixty feet high, the pinnacle rising above the top of the tent, perhaps twelve feet more, and gilt. The sides supported by an arcade of one hundred arches; the piers of wood about fifteen feet high; the arches formed of bamboo work; the wall-plate which supports the back of the tent was of bamboo; stout ropes are extended in the inside from the centre pole to each pier, and then carried out to posts fifteen or twenty feet beyond, and made fast. These support the fly of the tent, which was made of single dungaree, (a coarse thick cotton fabric, common in India,) in the sea phrase, neither wind nor weather tight. Round the base of the centre pole, was built a pedestal about ten feet square, and fifteen high, whether of wood or masonry I had no opportunity of observing. Round it was a circular open railing about six feet high; and within the inclosure several large square glass lanterns were hung, and looking-glasses arranged, with other trifles of the same kind. The throne, which came close to the outer edge of the tent, was an octagon of wood, like a large pulpit; each face was about ten feet; the floor elevated about six feet above the level of the tent; the sides open to the south and east, the west and north sides screened by a curtain; the floor was carpeted, and a raised bench covered with velvet cushions laced with gold, was placed near the centre, a little advanced to the front. Below, within the circle of the tent, was a raised seat, like a clerk's reading desk, covered with green velvet, edged and trimmed with broad gold lace, with large red velvet cushions on it, trimmed in the same manner. To the right and left of the throne on the ground, just within the arcade of the tent, were ranged twenty of the King's body-guard, in satin gowns trimmed with gold lace, with treble scalloped capes and cuffs, and gilt hats like Malbrino's helmet. Nearer the throne, to the right or west side, were seated in a line with the body-guards, six eunuchs of the palace, native Mahomedans, in white jammams and coloured silk lunges, with white handkerchiefs round their heads. The princes of the blood, the chobwas,* and all the courtiers of superior rank, were dressed in red velvet gowns, like that worn by the mahoon; the caps of the pfinces and chobwas, varying according to their rank; which is further denoted by the gold chains they wear. The inferior courtiers' dress and caps were made of satin trimmed with narrow gold lace, but in form the same as the viceroys'.

After I had been seated about twenty minutes, a man, dressed in white, came into the enclosed place within the throne from the rear, as if to arrange the cushions on it, and, immediately after he had retired; his Majesty entered, and seated himself on the throne. He was dressed in white muslin with a gold border, and had on a crown shaped something like a mitre, about fifteen inches in height, but how ornamented I was too distant to observe. In his hand he had a small cowie, made of peacocks' quills, with which he fanned away the flies; no one remained in the pulpit with him. He appeared rather lusty, his countenance open, and complexion rather fairer than the Burmahans in general, with a thin grey beard, and altogether like a Chinese of the southern part of the empire. When seated, he asked in a clear and audible voice, which was the resident? Then, who was the gentleman next me? He then asked, whether my epaulets and cockade were insignia of my rank? Who were the persons attending in my suit? What was in the chests? What the use of the large blocks of timber, &c.? He was then pleased to say, that he understood I was a sensible and polite gentleman; upon which I placed my hand on my breast, and bowed my head. He immediately said, "Ah! that is the manner in which the Europeans salute their sovereigns. The hand placed on the breast, means that their respect flows from the heart." To which the viceroys replied in the affirmative. The sardogan, first prostrating himself three times, then read from a tassar leaf, in a singing tone, an account of the presents. After sitting about twenty minutes, the King, addressing himself to the viceroys, said, "the weather is very warm; I must retire, take care of him." He then rose from the throne, and retired to his palace in the rear.

Of one of his palaces we have the following description. The author is first speaking of the steps ascending to the pagoda from the river front:—

"These steps consist of three flights, about thirty feet broad at the lowest step, and twenty at the highest; of ordinary brickwork masonry, with a low parapet wall on each side, and led to the first terrace, about fifteen feet above the ordinary level of the river in the rains. The revetement of the river-face of this terrace was of stones, wrought to an equal surface on their exterior superficies; but rough and irregular on their interior, laid in common mortar, made of stone pounded, or lime and sand. At the lowest step we were requested to take off our shoes, which we immediately did; all our servants were allowed to attend us, and I was allowed to take my Hingcoostanee punkah. We were not at any time desired to take off our hats. Immediately within the verge of the first terrace, on either side of the steps, are erecting two colossal figures of lions, or rather sphinxes, in positions rather couchant than rampant. They are of brick masonry, and seated on pedestals of the same materials; the surface of the pedestals are about two cubits above the level of the terrace, and the height of the figures, from the surface of the table to the crown of their heads, is fifty-eight cubits; making altogether, sixty Burmian cubits, of nineteen inches each, or ninety-five English feet. The body and limbs are of proportionate magnitude, according to the Burmian ideas of sculpture; the eyes and teeth are of alabaster, the eye-ball, which we had an opportunity of measuring, was thirteen feet in circumference. The northernmost figure is finished to the plastering and ornamental parts, the sockets for the eye-balls are left vacant, and to place the eye balls in them will require some exertions of mechanical ingenuity, which I should like to see. There are six terraces rising above each other, their parapet walls equidistant, and revetements of the faces of each of good brick masonry, with stone spouts ornamented with sculptured alligators' heads, to carry off the water. Above there is a seventh terrace, on which is the plinth of the pagoda, and the eighth terrace is formed by the upper surface of the plinth. The seven lower terraces have not been wholly formed by art, but advantage taken of a little mound, the sides of which have been cut down, and then retaced with masonry; the levels of the terraces so far, being left of the common soil, a sandy loam mixed with shingly stones. Upon the seventh terrace rises the exposed part of the base or plinth of the intended structure; the foundation of which is sunk of solid masonry still lower; how much I have not been able to ascertain. Within the plinth a hollow chamber is left, forming a quadrangle, whose extent is sixty-one feet six inches,* its depth eleven feet, and the walls being twelve feet eleven inches thick, make the exterior surface a square of eighty-seven feet four inches. The interior of this chamber is plastered with white chunnam, and decorated with painted borders and pannelled compartments, with trees and flower-pots in them. There are also rows of columns twenty-nine inches square, and pilasters, to support the leaden beams and terrace, with which the whole is to be covered when the dedicated treasures are deposited there; with a number of quadrangular compartments, large and small, from ten feet to four feet five inches square, to contain them; the smaller ones being lined with plates of lead, three-fourths of an inch thick. The innumerable quadrangles are intended for the preservation of the treasures dedicated by his Majesty, while the span around them is devoted to the oblations of his courtiers. Opposite each of the smaller compartments, whose depth is equal to that of the larger ones, and which appeared like so many wells, was placed on small Bengal carpets, little hollow temples, three feet square, with pyramidal roofs ornamented in the Burmian style; the interior frame being of painted wood, covered with thin plates of silver, alloyed to about fifty per cent. standard; in height, from the base to the pinnacle, seven feet, the eaves ornamented with strings of red coral, about six beads in each, terminated with heart-shaped pieces of common window-glass. Round the solid part of the building and upon the terrace, were arranged piles of leaden beams, about five inches square, and of sufficient length to cover the respective chambers, with plates of lead of the same length, fourteen inches broad, and three-fourths of an inch thick, for the coverings; and besides these, a number of slates, of a schistous granite, were arranged in readiness to cover the whole. We were told that there was another set of chambers of the same dimensions and structure, charged with treasure, below these: how true this I cannot pretend to determine. The invention of lining the chambers with lead for the preservation of the treasures, is an honour claimed by his present Majesty, who has great skill in these matters. That the design has a divine sanction we had ocular demonstration, three piles of leaden plates, gilt with gold-leaf being shown us, which had been brought and arranged, where we saw them, at night, by angels. Our conductors assured us that the building was surrounded at night by watchful guards, so that no human agents could have transported such weighty materials unobserved; it is, therefore, justly considered and believed as a miracle of divine favour. All this I was particularly desired to note down in my pocket-book, which I did on the spot, and added to it an observation of my own, that a good deal of melted wax, such as is used by the Burmahs for candles, had been dropped on the slabs; I, therefore, suppose the night must have been dark, and that the angels worked by candle-light. From the level of this terrace, a conical spire of solid masonry is intended to be erected, the weight of which I am afraid will prove too great for the leaden beams; but it would be a dangerous piece of impertinence for a stranger to offer any advice on these sacred matters, otherwise I could easily secure the safety of the superstructure, by shewing them how to turn arches over the hollow chambers.

During Captain Cox's stay, he was entertained with country-daunces, music, and fire-works:—

'The Burmhan fire-works consist chiefly of large crackers, made in joints of bamboo, and a kind of Catherine-wheels, that are fired off horizontally, and, when well made, are projected by the impulsive force of the powder, perpendicularly in the air, to a considerable height, whirling round with great impetuosity and noise, both in their ascent and descent; but for one that succeeds a dozen fail, so bad is the powder, and so little are they acquainted with the rules of composition. Some of these wheels are said to contain two thousand viss, or seven thousand pounds of powder,—perhaps this account is exaggerated. In size, as near as I could judge from the distance, the largest seemed to me about thirty feet in the transverse diameter, and six feet in height, and, when fired, formed an immense column of smoke. Each courtier had his fire-works separately arranged, and surrounded by his followers, with small distinguishing flags, so as to enable his Majesty to know whose fire-works succeeded best. They began with those of the lowest rank; and, when one set was finished, the party to whom they belonged brought the remains of the cases, with their flags and music, and danced before his Majesty, who, I understand, on these occasions gives them some trifling presents, as marks of his royal favour. These fire-works are exhibited by day, for fear of accidents, yet, notwithstanding, many are scorched and wounded by sudden explosions, and the falling of fiery fragments; on the whole, it is a rude, barbarous, and insipid exhibition; a waste of labour and materials, unaided by any efforts of ingenuity, and unrelieved by variety, so necessary to satisfy the fastidiousness of European criticism.'

On the 18th of March the King left his capital:—

'His Majesty set off about eight a. m. in the smallest of his boats of state, accompanied by eleven boats of his queens and concubines, eighteen covered boats belonging to his ministers and courtiers, and about seventy war-boats; several of them gilt, including those that towed his own, the queens', and ministers' boats. Each, on an average, might contain about fifty men. On shore, he proceeded with twenty-nine elephants, with different kinds of howdahs on them, followed by his body-guard, fling off promiscuously, dressed in the common habit of the country, with two bundles; and their muskets lashed to them, carried by each on a bamboo. About one o'clock the new carriage followed his Majesty, in a boat, towed by two war-boats; after it a boat of horses, and behind these his former state-carriage.'

(To be continued.)

Don Juan, Cantos III., IV., and V.,
(Concluded from p. 497.)

AFTER the death of Haidée, with an account of which we concluded last week, Don Juan, who had been 'wounded and fettered,' was destined for the slave market, at Constantinople.—Among other captives, he met with a company of singers, who, going to Sicily, were taken by a pirate. One of the principal of these describes his own merits to Don Juan rather facetiously:—

'I would not become myself to dwell upon My own merits, and though young—I see,
sir—You
Have got a travel'd air, which shows you one
To whom the opera is by no means new You've heard of Raucocanti!—I'm the man;
The time may come when you may hear me
too;
You was not last year at the fair of Lugo,
But next, when I'm engaged to sing there—do you."

Raucocanti's recital is interrupted by the pirate crew, announcing their destination:—

'They heard next day—that in the Dardanelles, Waiting for his sublimity's firman,
The most imperative of sovereign spells,
Which every body does without who can,
More to secure them in their naval cells,
Lady to lady, well as man to man,
Were to be chain'd and lotted out per couple,
For the slave market of Constantinople.

'It seems when this allotment was made out,
There chanced to be an odd male, and odd female,

Who (after some discussion and some doubt,
If the soprano might be doom'd to be male,
They placed him o'er the women as a scout)
Were hink'd together, and it happen'd the male

Was Juan, who,—an awkward thing at his age,
Pair'd off with a Bacchante blooming visage.

'With Raucocanti luckily was chain'd
The tenor; these two hated with a hate
Found only on the stage, and each more pain'd
With this his tuneless neighbour than his fate;

Sad strife arose, for they were so cross-grain'd,
Instead of bearing up without debate,
That each pull'd different ways with many an oath,

"Arcades ambo," id est—blackguards both.'

The poet is proceeding to describe how Don Juan withstood temptation, but restrains himself with an episode, rather in defence of himself than his hero:—

'Here I might enter on a chaste description,
Having withstood temptation in my youth,
But hear that several people take exception

At the first two books having too much truth;
Therefore I'll make Don Juan leave the ship soon,

Because the publisher declares, in sooth,
Through needies' eyes it easier for the camel is
To pass, than those two cantos into families.

'Tis all the same to me; I'm fond of yielding.
And therefore leave them to the purer page
Of Smollett, Prior, Ariosto, Fielding,
Who say strange things for so correct an age;

I once had great alacrity in wielding
My pen, and liked poetic war to wage,
And recollect the time when all this cant
Would have provoked remarks which now it shan't.

'As boys love rows, my boyhood liked a squabble;
But at this hour I wish to part in peace,
Leaving such to the literary rabble,
Whether my verse's fame be doom'd to cease,

While the right hand which wrote it still is able,

Or of some centuries to take a lease;
The grass upon my grave will grow as long,
And sigh to midnight winds, but not to song.

'Of poets who come down to us through discourse,

Of time and tongues, the foster-babes of Fame,

Life seems the smallest portion of existence;
Where twenty ages gather o'er a name;
'Tis as a snowball which derives assistance
From every flake, and yet rolls on the same,
Even till an iceberg it may chance to grow,
But after all 'tis nothing but cold snow.

'And so great names are nothing more than nominal,

And love of glory's but an airy lust,
Too often in its fury overcoming all—
Who would as 'twere identify their dust
From out the wide destruction, which, embom-

ing all,
Leaves nothing till the coming of the just—
Save change; I've stood upon Achilles' tomb,
And heard Troy doubted; time will doubt of Rome.

'The very generations of the dead
Are swept away, and tomb inherits tomb,
Until the memory of an age is fled,
And, buried, sinks beneath its offspring's doom:

Where are the epitaphs our fathers read?
Save a few glean'd from the sepulchral gloom
Which once-named myriads nameless lie beneath,

And lose their own in universal death.'

But to return to the story.—The captives are landed at the market, and all readily sold; and, in giving an account of the prices they fetched, the author has an ungenerous fling at Mr. Wilberforce, who, we are told, has made the prices of Negroes—

twice
'What 'twas ere abolition.'

There is something very whimsical in the description of the market:—

' Like a back-gammon board the place was dotted With whites and blacks, in groups on show
For sale,
Though rather more irregularly spotted:
Some bought the jet, while others chose the pale.'

Don Juan and a fellow captive, with whom he had formed an acquaintance, were purchased by an old man, who took them home to a splendid palace, which is described very minutely. The captives are intreated to undergo 'an ancient rite' to make them true believers, but they spurn the idea. Don Juan, after much remonstrance, is dressed in the suit of a princess. He is then led from room to room,—

'Through glittering galleries, and o'er marble floors,

Till a gigantic portal through the gloom,
Haughty and huge, along the distance towers;
'And waited far arose a rich perfume:
It seemed as though they came upon a shrine,
For all was vast, still, fragrant, and divine.

'The giant door was broad, and bright, and high,
Of gilded bronze, and carved in curious guise;

Warriors thereon were battling furiously;
Here stalks the victor, there the vanquished
lies;

Their captives led in triumph droop the eye,
And in perspective many a squadron flies:
It seems the work of times before the line
Of Rome transplanted fell with Constantine.

'This massy portal stood at the wide close
Of a huge hall, and on its either side
Two little dwarfs, the least you could suppose,
Were sat, like ugly imps, as if allied
In mockery to the enormous gate which rose
O'er them in almost pyramidal pride:
The gate so splendid was in all its features,
You never thought about those little creatures,

'Until you nearly trod on them, and then
You started back in horror to survey
The wood'ron hideousness of those small men, Whose colour was not black, nor white, nor gray,

But an extraneous mixture, which no pen
'Can trace, altho' perhaps the pencil may;
They were mis-shapen pigmies, deaf and dumb—

Monsters, who cost a no less monstrous sum.

'Their duty was—for they were strong, and though
They looked so little, did strong things at times—

To open this door, which they could really do,
The hinges being as smooth as Roger's rhymes;

And now and then with tough strings of the bow,

As is the custom of those eastern climes,
To give some rebel Pacha a cravat;
For mantes are generally used for that.'

Don Juan is then conducted into a room, more splendid than any through which he had passed:—

'In this imperial hall, at distance lay,
Under a canopy, and there reclined
Quiet in a confidential queenly way,
A lady; Baba stopped, and kneeling signed

To Juan, who, though not much used to pray, Kneel down by instinct, wondering in his mind

What all this meant; while Baba bowed and bended

His head, until the ceremony ended.

'The lady rising up with such an air
As Venus rose with from the wave, on them
Bent like an antelope, a Paphian pair
Of eyes, which put out each surrounding green;

And, as if up an arm as moonlight fair,
She signed to Baba, who first kissed her hem
Of her deep-purple robe, and speaking low,
Pointed to Juan, who remained below.

'Her presence was as lofty as her state;
Her beauty of that overpowering kind,
Whose force description only would abuse,
I'd rather leave it much to your own mind,
Than lessen it by what I could relate

Of forms and features; it would strike you blind

Could I do justice to the full detail;
So, luckily for both, my phrases fail.'

Don Juan is called upon to kneel and kiss the lady's foot, but he refused, and declared—

'He could not stoop
To any shoe, unless it shod the Pope.'

He is then commanded to kiss her hand, which he readily obeyed. She was a Sultan's bride, who having seen Don Juan in his way to sale, had ordered his purchase. When all the attendants had been dismissed, the sultana inquired of her hero, 'Christian, can't thou love?' He at first answered only with tears, for the memory of Haidée came over his mind, but when pressed more closely, if not by words at least by indications, which could not be misunderstood, he replied,—

'"Thou ask'st if I can love? be this the proof
How much I love lov'd—that I love not thee!"

In this vile garb, the distaff's web and wool
Were fitter for me: love is for the free!
I am not dazzled by this splendid roof.

Whate'er thy power, and great it seems to be,
Heads bow, knees bend, eyes watch around a
throne,

And hands obey—our hearts are still our own.'

'This was a truth to us extremely true,
Not so to her, who ne'er had heard such things;
She deemed her least command must yield delight,

Earth being only made for queens and kings.
If hearts lay on the left side or the right
She hardly knew, to such perfection brings Legitimacy its born votaries, when Aware of their due royal rights o'er men.

'Besides, as has been said, she was so fair
As even in a much humbler lot had made
A kingdom or confusion any where;
And also, as may be presumed, she laid
Some stress upon those charms, which seldom

By the possessors thrown into the shade;
She thought her's gave a double "right divine."

And half of that opinion's also mine.'

This put the princess into a terrible rage, for until then she had never known a checked desire:—

'Her rage was but a minute's, and 'twas well—
A moment's more had slain her; but the while

It lasted 'twas like a short glimpse of hell:
Naught's more sublime than energetic bile,
Though horrible to see yet grand to tell:
Like ocean war'ring 'gainst a rocky isle:
And the deep passions flashing through her form,

Made her a beautiful embodied storm.
'A vulgar tempest 'twere to a Typhoon,
To match a common fury with her rage,
And yet she did not want to reach the main,
Like moderate Hotspur on the immortal
page;

Her anger pitched into a lower tune,
Perhaps the fault of her soft sex and age—
Her wish was but to "kill, kill, kill," like Lear's,
And then her thirst of blood was quenched in tears.

'A storm it raged, and like the storm it pass'd, Pass'd without words—in fact she could not speak;
And then her sex's shame broke in at last,
A sentiment till then in her but weak,
But now it flow'd in natural and fast,

As water through an unexpected leak,
For she felt humbled—and humiliation
Is sometimes good for people in her station.
'It teaches them that they are flesh and blood,
It also gently hints to them that others,
Although of clay, are yet not quite of mud;
That urns and pipkins are but fragile brothers,

And works of the same pottery, bad or good,
Though not all born of the same sires and mothers;
It teaches—heaven knows only what it teaches,
But sometimes it may mend, and often reaches.

'Her first thought was to cut off Juan's head;
Her second, to extort only—his acquaintance;
Her third, to ask him where he had been bred;
Her fourth, to rally him into repentance;
Her fifth, to call her maids and go to bed;
Her sixth, to stab herself; her seventh, to sentence

The lash to Baba:—but her grand resource
Was to sit down again, and cry of course
'She thought to stab herself, but then she had The dagger close at hand, which made it awkward;

For eastern stays are little made to pad,
So that a poniard pierces if 'tis stuck hard:
She thought of killing Juan—but, poor lad!
Though he deserved it well for being so backward,

The cutting off his head was not the art
Most likely to stain her aim—his heart.
'Juan was moved; he had made up his mind
To be impaled, or quartered as a dish
For dogs, or to be slain with pangs refined,
Or thrown to lions, or made bait for fish,
And thus heroically stout resigned,

Rather than sin—except to his own wish;
But all his great preparatives for dying
Dissolved like snow before a woman crying.
'As through his palms Bob Acres' valour owed,

So Juan's virtue ebbed, I know not how;
And first he wondered why he had refused;
And then, if matters could be made up now;
And next his savage virtue he accused,
Just as a friar may accuse his vow,

Of as a dame repents her of her oath,
Which mostly ends, in some small breach of both.

'So he began to stammer some excuses;

But words are not enough in such a matter,
Although you borrow all that e'er the muses
Have sung, or even a dandy's dandiest clatter,

Or all the figures Castlereagh abuses;

Just as a languid smile began to flatter
His peace was making, but before he ventured Further, old Baba rather briskly entered;—

A fortunate interruption for Don Juan's virtue and our poet's character.

Baba came to announce that the sul-tan was coming: and, with a description of his person and his entry into the ha-rem, when he particularly noticed Don Juan as a pretty Christian girl, the fifth canto concludes, and we are promised that if it meets with due ap-plause, the 'sixth shall have a touch of the sublime.' A touch of something better than the present three cantos will certainly be necessary to preserve his lordship's character from sinking.

On the whole, we think the last three cantos a great falling off from the first two, but they certainly are not so ob-jectionable in a moral point of view. But although Lord Byron's poetry may with some be an extenuation for its immorality, yet we are sure he must alter much before his morals return the compliment, and be an apology for his rhymes. The poem, though hav-ing the imprint of a man of genius, is written carelessly, and the story is al-most devoid of interest.

EMIGRATION TO CANADA.

1. Facts and Observations respecting Canada and the United States of America; affording a Comparative View of the Inducements to Emigration presented in those Countries. To which is added, an Appendix of Practical Instructions to Emigrant Settlers in the British Colonies. By Charles F. Grece, Member of the Montreal and Quebec Agricultural Societies, &c. 8vo, pp. 172. London, 1819.
2. Sketch of a Plan, for Settling in Upper Canada, a Portion of the Un-employed Labourers in England. By a Settler. 8vo, pp. 25. Loudon, 1821.

THE mania for emigration, which, about two years ago, was so prevalent, appears now to have, in some degree, subsided; but had this not been the case, the subject has been so amply dis-cussed in our pages, that we should not deem it necessary to preface our no-tice of the two books now before us with any observations on emigration generally. We have, when writing on this subject, more than once expressed our partiality to emigration to Canada, not only from a wish to enrich our own colonies with our native genius and in-dustry, but from a conviction that, all the circumstances considered, Canada is preferable to the United States for an English settler. In this opinion we are considerably strengthened by the plain unvarnished 'facts and ob-servations' of Mr. Grece, who treats the subject fairly and impartially. An ac-quaintance with Canada for sixteen years, and an intimate knowledge of agriculture and of that practical hus-bandry best suited to the colony, are strong recommendations of his work to emigrants, to whom it will prove a most valuable guide.

Mr. Grece is a Canadian, and we do not wonder at his recommending his own country in preference to the United States for emigration, but the facts he adduces are sufficient to bear him out in his partiality without a national feeling: the influx of settlers from the United States to America might almost settle the point, for it is a fact that the population in the townships of Lower Canada is composed of two-thirds Americans.

Mr. Grece commences his work with an exposure of the fallacious statements of Mr. Birkbeck respecting his settle-ment in the Illinois. He says,—

'With respect to the Illinois territory, it may be observed, that the climate cannot possibly be either so healthful to an European constitution, or so generally favour-able to cultivation. Mr. Birkbeck ap-pears to have laboured as much to with-hold, as to convey information; and that not only with respect to the difficulties he had to encounter in travelling to the place he fixed upon, but also with respect to the place itself. He has not told us, that the climate of the Wabash country is such as to prevent the most laborious parts of agricultural employments from being per-formed by Europeans, on account of its heat; he has not told us that the system of slavery must be adopted there, if cul-tivation be to be carried on to any great extent. There is something very dis-ingenious in all this. Mr. Birkbeck must have known very well, that the labour of ploughing, harrowing, hoeing, sowing, reaping, housing, &c. could not be well performed by those who have been ac-customed to the air and climate of Great Britain.

'How great has been the astonishment of many to find, that this same English prairie is indebted to the sweat, the toil, the groans, the heart-breaking pangs of slavery! Indeed, there is good reason to believe, that the western territory will for ever be subject to that species of labour; the heat of the climate being too great for white men's constitutions. In the months of July and August, the heat is absolutely intolerable.'

He then gives a topographical ac-count of the Canadas, and points out their advantages to the settler at some length. He says,—

'Farms of one hundred acres, with a small log-house, and a barn, thirty acres of the land being previously prepared for cultivation, may be bought for from 150l. to 200l. In the townships, which are very extensive, and in many parts not more than fifty or eighty miles from the city of Montreal, the great emporium of the Canadas, farms may be bought on the above terms.

'Land in a state of nature may be bought for from ten shillings to two pounds per acre, at a credit of from five to ten years, paying six per cent. interest to the owner. This land, to be cleared and made fit for sowing, will cost about three or four pounds per acre more, in the Lower Province; in the Upper Province, about six pounds per acre; labour not being so plentiful there.

'There are, at present, many opportu-nities of getting farms, at no great dis-tance from Montreal, where is received the produce of the most remote settle-ments of Upper Canada, as well as that of the rich and fertile district of which it bears the name. Nor is there, at this time, any difficulty in obtaining farms in the district of the Three Rivers, or of that of Quebec; but as the district of Mon-treal possesses a more congenial climate, lying in a more southerly direction, I would, by all means, recommend emigra-tion to those parts.

'In upper Canada, plenty of land may be had at from two to four dollars per acre, in a state of nature, and, with some clearing, for a moderate consideration.'

'From what I have here briefly stated, I trust an adequate idea of the value of land in Canada may be collected. The next thing is to consider the average ex-pense attending its cultivation. This will include a view of many articles of expen-diture, not solely agricultural, but which necessarily, in a partial manner, enter into all calculations of this nature. The usual price of labour on farms, is from one shil-ling and eight-pence to two shillings and six-pence per day, with board; if without board, four shillings and two-pence. An annual farming servant, besides board and lodging, has from 15l. to 24l. wages per annum; and a woman servant of all-work, from 6l. to 12l. per annum.'

The minor details, as to the expenses of managing farms, as well as the prices of produce, we pass over, only observ-ing that they are all highly favourable to the emigrant. Although American settlers are very numerous in Canada, yet they are not very favourably received, and emigrants from Great Britain are the most desirable:—

* These, whether in the several capacities of farmers, tradesmen, shopkeepers, labourers, or mechanics, need not despair of meeting with encouragement in these provinces. Blacksmiths, besides board, receive 5s. wages per day; masons, bricklayers, plasterers, carpenters, wheelwrights, and shoemakers, generally board themselves, and receive 10s. wages per day.

* Those who go out with a view to get work as labourers, will do well to leave England in April, as they will thereby arrive at a time when work is plentiful. If they leave Europe in July or August, they will arrive too late to obtain a permanent situation for the winter. In that case they will act prudently to take money sufficient to supply them for some months. Those whose object is to enter into agricultural pursuits, arrive, of course, too late to enable them to obtain a crop the first year. They must, therefore, come provided for such a delay.

* Many persons who go out from England, find themselves disappointed from a want of previous adequate investigation of the difficulties they must naturally encounter in such an undertaking; and they increase those difficulties greatly by not making an early decision, but hesitating and halting, till delay has consumed a great part of that property which was requisite to their comfortable establishment on their arrival. Others are disheartened at the commencement of their new undertaking, because they have not made themselves previously acquainted with the business which they are to subvert by, on their arrival on these shores. Persons should not emigrate to America for the purpose of learning how to become farmers, unless they can, in the very first instance, command a sufficient capital to maintain them, and those whom they may find it necessary to call to their aid, till they have acquired that knowledge, and realized the substantial fruits of it. This must necessarily be a work of considerable time.

The Appendix contains much valuable information for the emigrant, on the subject of husbandry, which he will do well to consult, as well as the whole volume, in which the subject is treated briefly but ably.

We have hitherto been speaking of the Canadas generally; but the pamphlet which we have placed second at the head of this article, recommends Upper Canada in preference, although its value, the author thinks, is 'inexcessably under-rated in England.' The plan of the author is somewhat romantic. He recommends to parishes to subscribe a sufficient sum to transfer the poor who are chargeable on them to Canada, where they will not only soon be able to support themselves, but also to repay the capital expended with interest. He calculates, that to settle a hundred families (five hundred persons), will require 20,000l. which would be repaid in ten years. As the scheme has nothing feasible in it, and there is no danger of its ever being attempted to be carried into execution; it is unnecessary to shew its fallacy; but of all the plans for alleviating distress and relieving the unemployed labourers of England, it is the most preposterous.

Italy and the Italians in the Nineteenth Century.

(Concluded from p. 503.)

Our traveller, after quitting Genoa, of which we gave an account in our last, re-visited Naples, and gleaned some new information worthy of communicating to his readers; and from which we shall first quote his account of the manner of spending Christmas at Naples:—

* On Christmas eve, the city of Naples resembles a town taken by storm. A quantity of rockets of various descriptions, some weighing above a pound, are thrown out of the windows as a sign of rejoicing, to the great annoyance of the passengers. A continual noise is kept up in this manner till day break. Such irregularity in a civilized country is a matter of surprise to foreigners: but the natives seem remarkably fond of boisterous diversions, and at every festival of any particular saint, a considerable sum is laid out in fire-works. Government having the monopoly of gunpowder, derives a considerable revenue from it.

* During the nine days preceding Christmas, an evening service is performed in the churches in commemoration of the nativity of Christ, and which is known by the name of la Norena di Natale; that of the royal chapel in the palace, is distinguished by excellent singing. On this occasion I saw the king and many of the nobility attend with much devotion. His majesty is known to be a regular observer of the practices of religious worship.

* A number of shepherds, from the mountains of Abruzzi, and from the neighbouring Apennine regions, come to the capital regularly every year, two or three weeks before Christmas, and go about the streets playing on their bagpipes, announcing the approaching festivity. Most of the Neapolitan families engage some of these itinerant musicians to play at their houses for a quarter of an hour on each day of the Norena, for a trifling remuneration; the wild appearance of these mountaineers, their uncouth dress, the simplicity of their manners, and the shrill notes of their pipes, attract the attention of the traveller. At the same epoch, groups of Calabrese peasants from the opposite part of the kingdom repair to Naples with their harps, which are their national instruments.

* It is customary here, as well as in other parts of Italy, at Christmas time, to construct in the churches and in several private houses, representations of the birth-place of our Saviour, with appropriate figures, and which are known by the name of presepio. Some of them are arranged with great skill, and exhibit a variety of scenery, in which the rule of perspective are very well preserved. The natural taste of the Italians for the fine arts is particularly remarkable on these occasions. The stable in which Christ was born, and from which the name of presepio is taken, forms, of course, the prominent feature of the scene, and the landscape around it is a fanciful assemblage of groves and meadows, streams and cascades, cottages and grottoes, long avenues and distant mountains. These models are made of a variety of materials, such as cork, wood, turf, &c. the figures are made of clay, very naturally painted, and in various costumes; shepherds with their flocks and cattle, travellers, soldiers, &c. The details are generally elegant and picturesque, but the whole often exhibits an odd mixture of inconsistencies. I have seen a presepio in the house of a lawyer, in the street of Forcelle, constructed on a large scale and in a magnificent style, containing several hundred figures, which has cost the owner some thousands of ducats, and in which the Virgin Mary appeared standing, dressed as a queen, under a beautiful Grecian portico, receiving the homage of kings accompanied by a brilliant retinue, while the guards, with their spears, kept the intruding multitude at a respectful distance. The Ottoman crescent and the imperial eagle of Austria appeared on the banners of their majesties. Some of the presepi are constructed on terraces in the open air, and others in apartments, and shewn by candle-light. Free admission is given gratis, according to the liberal custom of the Italian gentry.

The Neapolitans are very superstitious, and are much addicted to the belief of witchcraft and of other supernatural powers:—

* A science, says the author, 'upon which I have heard frequent dissertations, is la magia bianca, a kind of lawful intercourse with invisible spirits, by which adepts obtain a knowledge of the most secret things: they have cabalistical calculations through which they pretend to find out the prize numbers that will be drawn at the next lottery. These people are chiefly monks and priests, who live very retired, are difficult of access, and speak by enigmas. I have frequently heard wonderful accounts of people winning great prizes through their means, the circumstances of which, and the authority I had them from, would almost shake my incredulity. Some of the most celebrated among these seers, have been at different times exiled by the police as obnoxious persons. A belief in the secret science of these people is very generally spread among all classes of Neapolitans and of Sicilians, however incredulous in other respects. A German professor of music travelling lately through Sicily, arrived at Catania, where he had some respectable introductions and was received very kindly. Nature, however, had bestowed upon him an odd forbidding aspect; there was something mysterious in his deportment, and he appeared fond of study and retirement; all these circumstances persuaded some of his new Sicilian acquaintances that he was a fit person to apply to for numbers of the lottery; they therefore lured him one day into some sequestered mansion, and when they had him seated, they brought pen, ink, and paper before him, telling him resolutely, at the same time, that they would not allow him to go before he gave them a good terno, i. e. three prize numbers for the next lottery. The astonished German stared, smiled, argued, and remonstrated, but to no purpose; fearing the worst, he was obliged to act unwillingly the part of an impostor; with much gravity he wrote down three numbers at random, and hastened immediately after to leave the place secretly before the result of the lottery could be known.

The present government of Naples, though arbitrary, is said to be mild; the greatest subject of complaint being in this as in all countries in Europe—oppressive taxation—an evil first introduced in Italy by the French, but not diminished after the restoration. The public opinion is generally favourable with regard to the reigning family, and the hereditary princes are much respected and beloved. Of Murat's character, the author forms a correct estimate:—

‘Joseph Murat, a man of whom the eventful career and the tragical end form a distinguished feature in the history of the last war; Murat has left behind him a name, which serves still in this country as a rallying point for many. He had the qualities of a soldier of fortune: he was brave, frank, and naturally disposed to generosity; uneducated, but possessed of good sense and penetration; he was vain of his person, fond of show, magnificence, and pleasure, but yet he preserved the manliness of a warrior. Such a man could not fail to recommend himself to the Neapolitans, a people easily dazzled by external appearance and brilliant endowments. Appointed to the throne of Naples just after the short but tyrannical reign of Joseph Buonaparte and of his detested minister Salicetti, Murat appeared as a deliverer. He flattered the prejudices of the people, listened to their grievances even in the middle of the streets, he showed mercy to many of the discontented who had openly committed themselves, he pursued a moderate and conciliatory system in the refractory provinces; he had a fine army, a brilliant retinue, and an expensive household; in short, had he been independent of his brother-in-law Napoleon, he might have been the regenerator of this country. As it was, he certainly corrected many abuses, he encouraged civilization and industry, and effected considerable ameliorations in the different branches of internal administration; but his measures were partial, he was fettered and cramped, and his general system of government being subservient to that of Napoleon, was arbitrary and violent. A French military resident was stationed at Naples, as a representative of the French Emperor, to watch all the steps of Murat, and to thwart any measure that might be obnoxious to the sovereign empire. French officers and greedy employes swarmed in Naples; Murat was obliged to submit, although unwillingly; he had several serious disputes with his imperial relative, and his consort Caroline went even to Paris to deprecate the wrath of her brother.

‘On his return to Naples after the battle of Leipzig, Murat thought of availing himself of the golden opportunity to be at last a real and not a nominal king. He opened his ports, made friendly proposals to the belligerent powers, and seemed to be sincere in his determination to abandon the Continental system, which, he publicly said to the assembled merchants, was not suited to the position and to the interests of the Neapolitan kingdom. But he soon after began to show his incapacity as a statesman:—

“Tel brille au second rang qui s'écaille au premier.”

‘His policy was crooked and false, both towards his brother-in-law who had been his benefactor, and to the allies who were to be his protectors. In his campaign on the southern bank of the Po, in 1814, he appeared undecided, and after the treaty of Paris, instead of being satisfied with the kingdom of Naples, he continued to occupy by force the province of Ancona, over which he had no claim whatever, and he began to aspire to the sovereignty of all Italy. He roused thereby the suspicions of Austria and the other allied powers, whose good will it would have been his interest to conciliate; and when, in the year following, he made his rash and unjustifiable incursion in the north of Italy he found himself sadly deceived in all his ambitious calculations.’

From Naples, our author sailed for Corsica, and there is something very poetical in his description of the voyage; we select a passage:—

‘Next day we were becalmed; we could see at a distance the high land above Leghorn, and the mountains of La Spezia, the eastern extremity of the Ligurian Apennines. To the westward we saw the craggy coast of Capo Corso, the sides of its mountains covered with dark woods and a few lonely habitations on the seashore. A fine moon-light night succeeded as beautiful a day; one of those nights only to be met with in southern latitudes. The wind was hushed and the sea quite calm; a solemn stillness prevailed, scarcely interrupted by the faint report of the distant surge beating against the dark cliffs of Corsica. Now and then a porpoise would dash in playful sport through the waters, and ruffle for a moment their even surface. The full moon threw its silvery light on the distant scenery, while its beams were reflected in a brilliant stripe over the liquid plain. The sailors lay stretched on deck unemployed; the steersman still clung to the helm, to avail himself of the expected midnight breeze. Lovely climate, where the elements are seldom at war with man, where winter is scarce deserving the name, where ten months in the year are blessed with such nights and days! On the following morning we weathered Capo Corso with a light easterly breeze; but the wind shifting all at once to the north-west, the very point we were steering for, we kept tacking all day in sight of the western coast of Corsica, off the gulph of San Fiorenzo and the mountains of Calvi, names well known in modern British history as the early stage of the exploits of the immortal Nelson. That bleak Corsica, those craggy summits, have witnessed the valour of the English arms: there it, indeed, scarce a spot laved by the waters of the Mediterranean, which has not been consecrated by the blood and made illustrious by the heroism of the sons of Britain!’

Of the Corsicans he gives a very unfavourable character. He says, every year numerous murders are committed, and instead of uniting their efforts for the common good, for the general interests of the country, the Corsicans seem only intent upon injuring and destroying one another:—

‘The relatives think themselves bound to revenge the death of their murdered kinsman, by a similar act of violence; it is to them a sacred duty, dictated by affection and honour, which, if they neglect, they see the ghost of the deceased frowning upon them, like that whom Dante describes in his Inferno. The widow treasures up the bloody shirt of her lost consort, to shew to her young offspring when arrived at an age to appreciate the dictates of filial duty, whose fatal stains are intended to convey.

A hasty word, a spiteful or contemptuous look, are often sufficient to ensue destruction, and a well-aimed shot pierces the breast of the imprudent victim before he has time to be aware of his danger. The people in the country go about armed with daggers, a musket on the shoulder, equally ready for attack or defence.

Such is the moral state of Corsica. Those of the inhabitants whose character or education makes them turn in disgust from such a savage system, emigrate to the continent, and seldom return to their native land. They carry their talents to the best or most convenient market, and they generally succeed by perseverance. There are at the present time, many conspicuous characters, both civil and military, in the service of the principal powers of Europe, who are natives of this land, and who do high credit to their country, shewing thereby what the whole nation might be capable of. The Corsicans, although proud of their countryman Napoleon, were never much affectionate to him, and during the period of his power, he had, perhaps, less partisans among his countrymen, in proportion to their numbers, than among any other people subordinate to his way. They complain bitterly of his having totally neglected his native country, and that he did not direct to have even a good road constructed to communicate through the different parts of the island.*

We shall conclude with an anecdote which occurred at Marseilles, on the restoration:—

* The Marseillais, and, generally speaking, the inhabitants of Provence, continue to be attached to the king; the Bonapartists are few, and despised in the province. In the last changes, some acts of popular revenge took place against several obnoxious persons, who had been in employment under Bonaparte; but they were few, compared to those which happened in Languedoc, and other provinces of France. The Mamelukes, a body of Egyptians who had followed the French on their return from that country, and who were stationed at Marseilles, were particularly marked out as the victims of the popular fury, which they had drawn upon themselves by their overbearing and insolent behaviour in the time of their power. Many of them were killed; and the fate of one of their women, a black, was peculiarly distressing; and the obstinate and stupid fanaticism of an African, she continued to cry vive l'empereur, while all around her were in revolt against that name, and she would never submit to be silent. Surrounded and ill-treated by the enraged populace, she threw herself into the sea, probably with the intention of swimming across the harbour, but while in the water she was aimed at and shot by one of the mob, and her body drawn ashore amidst imprecations.*

The Appendix to this very interesting and unassuming volume, contains some elegant specimens of modern Italian literature, including extracts from Lord Byron's Giaour, which has been successfully translated by Pelligrino Rossi; some pastoral songs and sonnets, in the Sicilian language, by L'Abate Meli; the Address to the Sun and Moon, and other passages from Ossian's poems, which have been freely translated by Cesarotti; some odes and sonnets from Parini, &c. &c. These extracts are judiciously selected, and well calculated to give a very favourable opinion of modern Italian literature, with which the author is evidently very well acquainted. In closing this volume, which we have drawn upon very largely, without impoverishing it in interest, (for an ample quantity remains behind, we cannot but recommend the modesty and good sense of its intelligent author; and we are sure we shall receive the thanks of all our readers for introducing to them a volume in which a fertile but hack-nied subject is treated with novelty and elegance.

AN ACCOUNT OF THE BATTAS, A RACE OF CANNIBALS IN THE INTERIOR OF SUMATRA.

[In a former number of the Literary Chronicle, we gave an account of the first production of the press in Van Diemen's Land; and we can now give an interesting extract from the first book ever printed in the island of Sumatra, entitled 'Maylayan Miscellanies.' We are indebted for the article to the fifth number of the 'Investigator,' a quarterly publication, which, from the well known talents of the gentlemen who conduct it*, as well as from the excellence of its plan, promises to hold a high rank among the periodicals of the day. —Ed.]

The Battas of the interior have an invincible prejudice to the sight of the sea, which they suppose to be the residence of evil spirits; and this circumstance, added to the little communication they have with Malays, or people of any intelligence, renders all account of this singular race of people extremely vague and limited. The sources of my information, are the chiefs of Tapanuli and Sorkom, the latter of whom have twice visited the Tohboh country, which is the parent state: consequently, these memorandums relate only to the countries interior, and the northward of Tapanuli; excepting for produce, however, this description will answer for the countries to the southward of Tapanuli. The Battacountry commences on the borders of the Acheen districts, in the province of Karoh, as pointed out by Mr. Marsden in his map of Sumatra, and extends to the back of Ayer Boujii, south. The districts which are difficult of communication, and excite a desire of being known, are at a distance of from three to six days' journey inland. Their population is numerous, as may be well conjectured from the vast consumption of salt, which it is erroneous to suppose is eaten by the Battas in larger quantities than by any other class of people. Their stature is much above the middle size, and their voice uncommonly strong and sonorous. The country is open and cultivated, and the air keen and healthy. The space separating it from the sea-shore, supports a race of people inferior in stature, power, and wealth, but having a common origin with those of the interior. Whether the face of this part of the country, which is covered with impenetrable forests, produces a climate obnoxious to the constitution, I cannot pretend to say; but it is evident that the inhabitants of these districts resemble those of the former in little more than their language. The population is also inferior; and their villages are at a greater distance from each other, on account of the necessity of choosing a spot favourable to cultivation, and contiguous to a rivulet; for which reason, they commonly reside in the valleys. I understand these parts to have been originally peopled by speculators, wanderers, and outcasts from Tohboh, who, in the course of time, and from various causes, have established themselves into chiefships; hence the almost constant state of war in which they are engaged with each other. Among them, reside the Pangalongs, or traders, who keep open the communication with the interior countries, by conveying thither salt, iron, silk chindies, gongs, and other commodities from the settlements on the shore, receiving in payment, dollars, horses, and grain. The only mode of conveyance is on the backs of men; but in the interior, horses are made use of.

The only mountains of consequence throughout the whole extent of the Tohboh country, appear to be Palakir and Mahimbong. The former is both an object of veneration, from a conception the natives have that it is the chief residence of the evil spirits; and a source of utility, because they are supplied from it throughout Tohboh, with chunam, to eat with the ari leaf; its surface being covered with cockle-shells. The only viable inhabitants, are tame pigeons, which the natives religiously feed. These two mountains are the highest in the knowledge of the Battas. Nor does the Battacoun-try seem to contain the source of more rivers than any other division of the island, though it has certainly the singularity of possessing a fresh water lake in the district of Baligah, in the centre of which is a large island, well peopled. Sampans, large and small, are made use of for fishing, and conveyance from and to the island; to reach which, without a sail, occupies half a day; the whole breadth of the lake may, consequently, be paddled over in a day. The only winds that blow over its surface, are east, west, and north, on account of the direction given to them by the surrounding mountains. They are, however, sometimes so violent, as to occasion a considerable surf on the shores, in which the sampans are sometimes upset. The lake is bordered with a sandy beach all round, and is called Laut Towah. From this lake descends a river, which empties itself into the sea on the eastern side of Sumatra, the name of which I could not ascertain. It is also connected with the river of Batang Tano on this side.

I have already noticed the difference in stature between the inhabitants of the interior and those residing nearer the sea coast; their features are, however, similar, both being remarkable for an extraordinary straight mouth, not of the smallest size. The clothing described by Mr. Marsden is very just; though the better sort, and Rajahs who can afford it, wear very fine blue deths or turbans on their heads, and silk chindies round their waists; the commonalty are contented with a wisp of straw, or the bark of a tree, and coarse cloth of their own manufacture. These cloths are, however, greatly superior in the country of Anrohlo, to the southward of Tapanuli, where great ingenuity and taste are displayed in the workmanship and introduction of such colours as they can procure, the lower part being ornamented with a vandyke fringe of variegated bands. The kampluin, or sari bag, is very neat, made of straw, and curiously ornamented with bands; one side of the mouth laps over like a pocket-book, to the extremity of which is suspended a string of beads, three or four feet long, of various sizes and colours, ending with a little bell. The pipe consists of a brass tube, about three feet long, curiously engraved, with an ornamented bowl, and a stopper of the same metal, connected by a small chain. The warts of the chiefs are generally encreased above the elbow with a bracelet of kimu, or Asuasoo: ear-rings, or drops of a triangular form, made of an inferior sort of gold, are also the ornaments of a rajah. The women, as in most uncivilized countries, are paid little attention to; and their dresses nothing more than the coarse cloth tied under the arms, and not extending below the knee; the better sorts wear vests of similar workmanship to the cloths of Anrohlo.

A kampong will contain from one to two hundred people, one third of whom, probably, may be children. The houses in the interior are well built of plank, curiously carved, covered with ajn in its raw state, and are sometimes a hundred feet long, without a division in them. The parents and all relations live together, if they can agree, or the building can contain them; the entrance, which they close at night, is by a ladder in the centre, from underneath; on every side of the house are large windows. The buildings of the inhabitants near the sea are miserable erections; under each house, are the hogs, cattle, or buffaloes of the owner; and as these compartments are never cleaned, the appearance of a Batta kampong resembles that of a buffalo laudong in rainy weather. The kampongs, in times of hostility, are enclosed by a parapet of sod, about four feet high; outside of which are one, two, and even three, strong paggars of split camphor trees, reaching to the height of the windows of the houses, furnished with platforms in the inside, for the besieged to fire from; and the whole is surrounded with an abbatis of briars, and well planted with ranjans. The entrance is narrow, and over it is a platform, protected by briars, from which they fire on those approaching; the gate or door is strong, and closed by timber wedged against it.

The principal occupation of every member of a family, is husbandry. The low grounds are ploughed; the hills are simply cleared of their wood. The tobacco planted in the northern and interior country, is of an inferior quality, and is smoked nearly in a green state; what I have seen is shredded like the Java tobacco. The cloth is made by the women. The country abounding with sulphur and saltpetre, every chief manufactures his own powder; but it is coarse, and will not long preserve its strength.

Their knowledge of the efficacy of particular shrubs, herbs, and roots, for the removal of many disorders, and healing of sores and wounds, is extensive; and they are not less expert in the selection and administration of different poisons, from those of the most deadly and sudden nature, to others of a less violent, though equally fatal effect. I have seen many suffering under the effects of the latter. The victim of revenge is not insensible of his situation, and sees the mournful prospect of many years to be passed in pain and torment, for the gratification of his implacable enemy. Soom, a China medicine, (for a small stick of which, three or four inches long, a hundred dollars is paid) is the only antidote to these poisons; but it is so seldom to be procured, and the circumstances of the person are in general so inadequate to the purchase, that it is very rare those once poisoned ever recover.

The Battas, with whom the company's settlements to the northward have communication, are a faithless, litigious, vindictive, and an independent race of people. I am sorry to say, I cannot allow them a single virtue. It is only the dread of punishment from a superior power, that will keep them in any degree of subordination, or excite them to the performance of their engagements. It is by no means uncommon for a chief to conceal his real inclinations with so much art, as to receive a compensation as a bribe from both parties, either for his assistance in the wars, or his opinion on a trial. A dispute, of which the value will not exceed ten dollars, is sufficient to set two kampongs, or districts, at war; though in this case, it is not so much the consideration of the sum, (for ten times the amount is probably expended before it is concluded, besides the loss of lives) as the mutual dislike to surrender the point which has caused the difference; and unless mediators appear from other districts, a war of this nature will continue for months and years. They carry their revenge to such an extent, as to eat their prisoners. Should the adverse party have attempted to burn the kampong, or should the war happen to be on a point of consequence, if they cannot vent their hatred in a public manner, they resort to their favourite resource, poison. Some idea of their obstinacy or independence (I believe it should be termed the former) may be obtained, from the conduct of Batta Koolies, hired to work in the company's settlements: they will continue their services as long only as they please; so that unloading a cargo of salt with dispatch, depends on their good humour: the instant an example is made of those who are unwilling to proceed in their work, the rest run away to the main, and leave you to finish the business as you can. The Rajahs have no authority over them; and your only satisfaction is the curtailing of their wages, which they willingly admit, from a consciousness that they have gained their point, and can in future have an opportunity of retaliating, by refusing their services. This circumstance (although the inconvenience attending it is now removed) is sufficient to give you an idea of the impossibility of urging the execution of any scheme or plan, contrary to their real wishes, even when supported by the opinion and concurrence of their chief.

The authority of a chief is hereditary to the son or brother, and founded solely on his abilities in regard to the sway he has among his people: his right to that part of the cognate as one will dispute; but if he be not prompt to resent insult, ready to take advantage of the weak and credulous, endowed with facility of speech and argument, hold in war and rapine, he has but few adherents; who, in return for their services, require from him those qualities, which will protect them in their agricultural pursuits during peace, and lead them to victory in war. Every kampong of consequence is well furnished with matchlocks; and being easily supplied with powder and ball of their own manufacture, they frequently practise firing at a mark, and are, in general, excellent shots.

The Rajah and his adherents being unanimous in the necessity of having recourse to arms, all discussions of a public nature requiring the presence of the community presents and messengers are dispatched to other Rajahs, to join, or preserve their neutrality. This being ascertained, the people are collected by each chief, feasted on buffalo meat, and the cause of the war is loudly proclaimed, accompanied by the music of gongs, drums, and fifes. During this, they supplicate the anger of evil spirits, that their undertaking may succeed; and every man binds himself by oath, to be true to the cause, in taking of which, he participates of the buffalo. The next thing is, to announce the declaration of war, to their enemies, which is done by erecting in the road leading to their kampong, a number of reeds, and the wooden figure of a human face on a post, from which a bamboo, containing the cause of enmity, is suspended. A matchlock is then fired, to draw attention to the spot, and the party returns: after this, every opportunity is taken for annoying each other, and the war is the cause of much privation and confinement; as the husbandman is afraid to work in his ladings, lest he should be shot or carried off by a party of the enemy, of whom there are always small detachments on the look out for the defenceless. Day-break is generally the time of attack, superstition prohibiting any other part of the twenty-four hours to be so appropriated.

ON the western side of a delightful valley, the precise site and designation of which is in nowise material or necessary, stands a neat and pleasant cottage. It had been originally raised by the rude hand of some speculative rustic, who, without having studied that sublime work of 'Hartelman on Architecture' (necessary even in the construction of a hog-sty), had contrived to rear one of the prettiest places in the world. Nature, however, blushing for the rude neglect of her sister, had hidden its white walls with clusters of the honey-suckle, jasmine, and grape-vine, which threw their saucy branches wherever and however they list, sometimes spreading over the very eaves through which the light of heaven was to enter. In this sweet dwelling abides one whom it has been my happiness to call 'friend,' and a better never breathed upon the earth. In early life, we were school-boys together—we mutually participated in the pleasures and the sorrows which our young days brought; we read from the same book; we ate upon the same form; shared the same bed; and, more than all besides, were fogged by the same cane. We were taken from school at no distant interval, he to a life of busy diversity, I to—no matter. After a lapse of forty years, an accidental fancy led us to select for the residence of our elder age, the same spot. We met, again!—and we will never part more.

We have both had our troubles, and they have been many; but while my share has thickened upon me in the monotonous scenes of domestic life, he has foughten hard battles with a varying fortune in climates far from his native land. If he has had to wrestle with necessities abroad, it has been mine to encounter with fate at home—and God knows it has often been a bitter one.

But I am not going to talk about myself; that is, only inasmuch as it is necessary to the absolute education of my poem: perhaps I may do more; I cannot help it—I am an old man, and must have my way.

There has been much discoursed upon the reciprocity of feeling necessary to the constitution of true friendship, and it is, no doubt, all very true; we, however, are an existing negative to its necessity; for, never, I think, were two more heterogeneous or dissimilar. He was always a bold, generous, and warm-hearted fellow, brave as a lion, but hasty, impetuous, and ardent. I—not but I was bold, and generous, and warm-hearted too,—was something diffident. He lacked prudence and circumspection—I, none. I was always a cautious lad, and never overfond of displaying those dashing qualities which characterized him—for this reason; they frequently led to broken scabbards and bodily contusions—things for which, such was the perversity of my disposition, I never had any mighty partiality. No one could be more ready to award his meed of praise to the exhibition of prowess and of courage than I; but, somehow, my own fiery feeling would (particularly in the case of a clenched fist, or a bent brow) instantaneously mellow down into compassionate pity, or the most sovereign contempt. On the score of corporeal illumination it is more difficult to speak, as much lieth in the way of phantasy—a slight contrast will be pardonable.

He was a tall well-formed boy, and of a presence easy, graceful, and commanding; his face was open as a summer-day, and an eye quite as bright; his complexion was of that kind which the world usually calls dark; but it possessed that beautiful taint of gold which the setting sun spreads over all things in an autumn evening.

Now, to be more prelix on a point, which here neglected might be lost for ever—the distinguishing lines of beauty in myself were altogether different, and my manner of make directly reversed. I, too, was above the common standing, but exquisitely slender; the neck, in the article of length was, if any thing, more liberal than stunted, but as it was the means of somewhat propelling beyond the sternum a head of delightful rotundity, the exuberance was nothing discoverable. Touching the visage, it consisted of a series of bold outlines; setting at utter derision all symmetrical proportion; it is true the formation of the jaw was upon an enlarged principle, and the lip pulpy and full; but then the mouth, by the external separation of its component parts—the nether of which something recedent—gave relief to a fine nose of exceeding capacity; the eyes were dusky, finely orb'd, and protruding withal. In the matter of complexion, it was sombre and expressive, well fitted to the features adorned and adorning. (A peit young jack-a-napes, with whom I was everlastingly on terms of a dog-and-cat intimacy, was wont to observe that, in point of bloom, I might have put any calf-skin to the blush; but that was mere spite, and I never much regarded it.) My deportment was easy, extra-ordinary, and peculiarly elegant, that is in its own peculiar way. My arms, slightly exceeding the usual allowance of length, were swung into the air and round about my person with a negligent and alternate sway, corresponding most harmoniously with the elasticity of the respective supporters of the fabric; of each of which latter, the mediating patella had such an eternal propensity to salutation, you might have sworn that from their first construction, they had never fallen out. And with such constituents, it may be well imagined I was more than ordinarily vain of the outward man: I have been triflingly diffuse as concerneth myself, not so much from vanity as from a desire to rectify those conflicting statements of mine adonishian qualifications, which, much to my personal detriment, have gone abroad into the world. But I have done.

One morning, unexpectedly, discovered him enveloped in huge heaps of memoranda, and in deep and busy conversation with their contents. Opining they were but matter of a pound-and-peace moment, and after seemly and decorous greeting, I proceeded to supply the vacuum of my appropriated seat, quietly to await his disengagement. 'I have been familiarizing with some old acquaintance,' said he, 'and we have held most heartily discussion.'—'And with all courteousness, I pray you, which be they,' asked I, cleaning my brows from the dust which had gathered thereabout. 'I have often said to thee,' he rejoined, after a pause of some length, 'I have often said to thee, my good old friend, that in my more active days, it was my occupation to note down every circumstance worth an after recollection, running it into detail whenever it listed my inclinations. I have this morning gone through them again, and they have reminded me of scenes almost forgotten, peopled my remembrance with the bright vision of things fading from it, and told me—a long tale of former misdoings.'

His assumed voice and manner in the commencement, and the strong emotion in the conclusion of his speaking, gave me much disquiet, and the tear which stood beneath his eyelid, told forcibly of internal agitation.

He resumed: 'These papers contain every incident of my life I deemed it useful to record; relate every occurrence which yielded pleasure or afforded sorrow; pleasures which in many, many instances have left nothing but the tale behind; and sorrow which must be carried to the grave. They have excited feelings which seek no sympathy, and must require none of this world. I have often spoken of my intention to disclose to you the wild adventures of my former life, and this intention I now realize.' In many instances you will find the narration broken and abrupt; these deficiencies you will easily supply. And now, my kind friend,' continued he, squeezing my hand, 'now thou wilt see me as I am and as I have been; my heart will stand confessed before thee; and may I hereafter meet with that forgiveness which I know thy own will yield me. If you deem the relation would afford amusement or instruction, make of them what use you will, so you cloak them in a fictitious guise, for to-day we will part—to-morrow all things will be as usual; till then, farewell.'

Availing myself of this license, many weeks were spent in rendering into an eligible form, the mass of writings with which he thus furnished me; and I am now pleased to take no small praise in viewing their present arrangement. My friend knows not in what absolute publicity they go; but so they prove what I incline to hope will be their effects, eminently welcome, happy, and beneficial. I willingly hold responsible my own proper self for the results*.

Biography.

HER LATE MAJESTY QUEEN CAROLINE.

(Concluded from p. 507.)

THE birth of the Princess Charlotte did not, in the slightest degree, tend to reconcile her illustrious parents, and a few months after this event, Lord Cholmondeley, the confidential adviser of the Prince of Wales, was deputed to signify to the Princess his wish for an immediate separation, and that the mother and the child should quit Carlton House. The Princess, not satisfied with a verbal communication of so important a nature, wished to have the will of her husband expressed in more specific terms, when the Prince wrote the following letter to his wife:—

' Windsor Castle, April 30, 1796:
' Madam,—As Lord Cholmondeley informs me that you wish I would define in writing the specific terms upon which we are to live, I shall endeavour to explain myself upon that head with as much clearness and with as much propriety as the nature of the subject will admit. Our inclinations are not in our power, nor should either of us be held answerable to the other, because nature has not made us suitable to each other. Tranquil and comfortable society is, however, in our power: let our intercourse, therefore, be restricted to that, and I will distinctly subscribe to the condition which you required through Lady Cholmondeley, that even in the event of any accident happening to my daughter, which, I trust, Providence in his mercy will avert, I should not infringe the terms of this restriction by proposing, at any period, a connection of a more particular nature. I shall now finally close this disagreeable correspondence, trusting, that as we have completely explained ourselves to each other, the rest of our lives will be past in uninterrupted tranquillity. I am, Madam, with great truth, very sincerely, yours, (Signed) George, P.

To this letter the Princess returned an answer, in which she said that it neither surprised nor offended her, as it merely confirmed what the Prince tacitly insinuated for a twelve month; but she wished it to be distinctly understood that the arrangement did not proceed from herself, but that the 'credit of it' belonged to her husband alone.

On the subject of this correspondence, so open to animadversion, we shall not remark, further than that the Princess was discarded, without the slightest imputation of crime, and for no other ostensible pretext than mere 'want of inclination.' The separation, however, took place, and the mother, exiled from the house of her husband, retired to Montague House, Blackheath, where maternal solicitude for a much-loved child became her chief occupation. When she had remained about eight years at Blackheath, some circumstances occurred which seemed to imply a doubt entertained in a high quarter of the propriety of the Princess's conduct. It is quite unnecessary to enter into any detail of the events which took place in 1806 and 1807; the nature of the solemn investigation and the acquittal of the Princess from all criminality are circumstances too well known to be detailed at length.

One remarkable circumstance followed this acquittal, the elevation of the legal advocate and confidential adviser of the Princess to one of the highest offices of the state. This was the late Spencer Perceval, who, being entrusted with the defence of the Princess, afterwards prepared a statement of the whole evidence, &c., and actually had 5000 copies of it printed, and a day announced for its publication. Before that day arrived, Mr. Perceval became Chancellor of the Exchequer, with the power of nominating several of his colleagues. That the Princess of Wales was the ladder by which Mr. Perceval ascended to promotion (and he has not been the only one) there cannot be a doubt; for no sooner was he seated in power, than he became anxious to destroy every copy of the Report of the Investigation, emphatically called the Book. A few copies and odd sheets had, however, escaped him, and these he purchased afterwards at immense prices. A Mr. Dobson got £700 for a copy. Mr. Peter Stewart, the brother to the principal proprietor of the Courier newspaper, we believe, got double the sum for a copy, and Mr. Blagden received £1000 for another. At length other copies were heard of, for which from five to twenty thousand pounds were demanded. After the conclusion of this investigation, the Princess was restored to her situation at court; and when fresh imputations took place against her character in 1812, Mr. Perceval bore testimony in parliament to her innocence.

In 1813 it was found that fresh inquiries and investigations were going on against the Princess, but these were less public and equally abortive as the former ones, and the innocence of the Princess was, through the instrumentality of the late Mr. Whitbread, again proclaimed in parliament.

An event now occurred, which, more than any other circumstance, affected the mind of the Princess; this was the depriving her of the guardianship, and, soon after, of the society of her daughter. Every tie thus weakened or broken, and exposed daily to new vexations, the Princess determined to make a tour on the continent. Parliament made a new provision for her Royal Highness, fixing her income at £50,000 a-year, but she generously relinquished £15,000 on account of the heavy pressure under which the people laboured.

The Princess of Wales left England in August, 1814; she embarked at Worthing on board the English frigate the Jason, accompanied by Lady Charlotte Lindsay, Lady Elizabeth Forbes, her maids of honour, and other persons of her household. Her Royal Highness first proceeded to Genoa, thence to Naples, where she was treated with great honour at the court of Murat; afterwards, she visited Milan, and then established herself for some time, in a mansion on the lake of Como, which she purchased of the Countess Pino. The Princess afterwards went to Mantua, Bologna, Ferrara and Venice, the Island of Elba, thence to Sicily, where she visited the principal towns.

From Sicily Her Royal Highness proceeded to Barbary, then to Palestine and Jerusalem; Carthage and Attica had also the honour of her presence. After she had seen and admired the Holy Sepulchre and the Temple of Solomon, she visited Bethlehem, the Mount of Olives, the river Jordan, and Jaffa. She returned by Rhodes and Syracuse to Naples, thence to Pizzo, Terracina, and Rome.

During the whole of these extensive travels the Princess of Wales did acts of generosity which left every where the most exalted opinions of the goodness of her heart, and charitable disposition. Her Royal Highness, during the time she resided at Agosta, in Sicily, distributed every day with her own hands, or through the medium of her almoners, sums of money among the poor. At Tunis she obtained the liberty of several slaves, some by her influence, but more by the money which she gave for their ransom. She gave to the new Academy at Athens five hundred of the pieces called colonnates, and she allowed two hundred annually to the same academy. Every person in prison, for debt, at Athens, was liberated by her, for which she paid seven hundred pieces into the hands of the governor; and she gave two hundred pieces to a poor and numerous Roman family, resident in that city.

At Constantinople she gave a poor Frenchman two hundred colonnates, and distributed her charity in almost every corner of the city. To the conventual fathers of Jerusalem, she gave five hundred pieces and settled on them two hundred annually. Finally, at Rome, she distributed two hundred pieces to the poor of that city. These charities, however, extensive as they were, formed but a very small portion of the money which she devoted to acts of beneficence. Of her it may be truly said, 'she went about doing good,' and to the full extent of her means freely gave with liberal hand and willing heart, wherever distress or misfortune presented itself. Some anecdotes of the benevolence of this illustrious lady have already been related in this journal, and could the whole be collected, we feel confident that it would be found she had given more money, and done more in the cause of humanity, than any Prince or Princess in Europe.

During the six years' absence of the Princess of Wales on the Continent, she had the misfortune successively to lose her brother, who fell at Ligny two days before the memorable battle of Waterloo. Two years afterwards, death deprived her of her much loved daughter, who had been married without her knowledge or her being consulted on the occasion: and, to add still more to her afflictions, and to render her 'the most desolate woman on earth,' in 1820, her uncle, father-in-law, and father in affection, her last protector, our late venerable sovereign, was taken away from her. Her Royal Highness now determined to return to England, not only to assume her rights as Queen of England, but also to confront those accusations which, for two years, had been preparing against her by a special commission sent to Milan to inquire into her conduct during the time of exile on the Continent.

When the intention of Her Majesty to return home was known, Lord Hutchinson was sent to St. Omer's to endeavour to prevent it by negotiation and the offer of 50,000*l.* a-year; but she disinclined it and hastened to England, crossing the channel in a packet boat, and landing at Dover on the fifth of June 1820. Her entrance into London, two days after, was like the triumph of a conqueror, and she was received in the British capital with the greatest enthusiasm. Fresh negotiations were opened between the Queen and government, which terminated without any arrangement; and that trial which for so long a time agitated the country, and the memory of which will not easily be forgotten, took place. After an odious and disgusting investigation in the House of Lords, which lasted several weeks, the bill which charged her with adultery and proposed her degradation was withdrawn.

Addresses of congratulation now poured in from all parts of the country on her Majesty's acquittal; but, notwithstanding this she still endured some of the penalties of guilt. Her name was not restored to the litany—she was neither admitted to the court of her husband—nor could she hold one herself.

This humiliation her noble spirit seems to have felt most sensibly, and still more so that she was not to be crowned with her husband. When this event took place, she unadvisedly sought admittance to the ceremonial, but was refused; and it seems that this circumstance preyed much on her mind, and is believed to have had no small share in producing her sudden dissolution.

It was in the latter end of July that her Majesty became ill, and in a few days her disorder assumed an alarming aspect. She bore it with the utmost fortitude, and made her will with a cheerfulness that was remarkable. From the commencement of her illness she seemed sensible of her approaching end, and appeared to hail the prospect of a release from the world with joy. She expressed herself in strong terms of the persecutions she had suffered, and declared that her afflictions were those of the heart and beyond the reach of human skill to cure. On Sunday the fifth of August, her Majesty's disorder took a favourable turn, which induced hopes of recovery to her friends, but on the day following she became much worse, and on Tuesday night, the 7th, at twenty-five minutes past ten o'clock, her persecuted but noble spirit escaped from this world of suffering to that place, where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary soul is for ever at rest.

Her Majesty, by her will, has bequeathed her whole property, a few legacies excepted, to Mr. William Austin, her protégé. She directed that her body should not be opened or laid in state, and that she should be buried by the side of her father and her brother, at Brunswick. She also requested that the following inscription should be engraved on her tomb:—
'To the memory of Caroline of Brunswick, the injured Queen of England.'

Whatever may have been her late Majesty's errors, that heart must be callous indeed which does not shed a tear of sympathy for her sufferings and her melancholy fate, recollecting that
'to sin is human—to forgive divine.'

Her Majesty was a woman of a very strong intellect, and of a well-cultivated mind. A writer, speaking of her Royal Highness while residing at Blackheath, says, 'the Princess of Wales, in her retirement at Blackheath, draws round her an assemblage of poets, sages, and heroes, by the magic movement of her chisel alone. There the noble Caroline of Brunswick converses with the mighty dead; and while she holds converse with the Stuarts and Plantagenets (whose images her own Prometheus flame has re-animated with life), she feels no longer solitary, no longer a pensive recluse; but sees herself (the daughter of heroes!) in the presence of ancestors who seem to smile upon her virtues and to glory in her genius.' The disposition of the Queen was extremely amiable, and her kindness to her domestics made her be considered rather as the parent than the mistress of her household. It was proved, in evidence, before the House of Lords, that when any of her domestics were ill, she frequently visited them, and administered personally to their comfort and relief even to the hazard of her own life. Wherever she went, beneficence accompanied her, and her charities have been felt, and will be remembered, though not by her recorded, in every town and country that she visited. These will form a monument to her memory more desirable than the honours of a crown or the pageantry of royalty.

PARODY OF CATO'S SOLILOQUY.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—Should you deem the following parody worthy of a place in your interesting journal, I should be happy to see it there. It was composed during the period of Bonaparte's threatened invasion; and the age of the writer, at the time, was but sixteen, which I mention as some apology for its imperfections. My particular reason for now troubling you with it is, that recent events seem, in some respects, to have accomplished the prediction comprised in the last five lines. If this communication be favourably received, you may expect to hear again from your constant reader,

RALPH DOGGRELL.

PARODY.

Scene.—Boulogne.—Bonaparte, solus.

It shall be so!—Fate, thou hast counselled well,

Else why this tow'ring hope, this wild desire,
This longing after proud Britannia's ruin?
But, whence this secret dread, this inward horror

Of falling in th' attempt? Why shrinks my conscience

Back upon itself, and startles at destruction?
'Tis mad Ambition that impels within me,—
'Tis Tyranny itself that goads me on.

And intimates Invasion to my soul.
Invasion! Oh, thou pleasing dreadful thought, Through what a mass of conquering British fleets—

Through what bold scenes and hazards must I pass!

The wide, the dangerous prospect lies before me;
But death and sure dishonour rests upon it—
Here must I pause.

— that fate was made for Britons.
I'm weary of reflection;—this must end it.
Thus am I doubly cur'd, my death and shame,
My base and infamy, have both beset me;
This is a moment brings me to an end,
And this informs me I shall die disgrac'd!

But George, secured in his existence, smiles
At Faction's rage and Treason's giddy shaft.
My power shall fade away, and I myself
To shades of darkness and of death descend;
But thou shalt flourish, thou, Britannia's prince,

Unhurt amidst the wars of raging states,
The wreck of tyrants, and the fall of France.

A TRIBUTE

To the Memory of the Queen.

'FEAR no more the Thunderer's

Nor Sorrow's sobbing blast;

Thou thy worldly task hast done,

And the dream of life is past.

Monarchs, emper, peasants, must Follow thee, and come to dust.'

Hallowed by sorrow—weep by million eyes,
The Queen of England's heart sinks in the grave;

Last link of old and lofty ancestry,
Descendant of the kindly and the brave!

'To Caroline of Brunswick gave
No common fire of soul and strength of frame—
Yet that strength sunk; no human aid could save—

And that soul quail'd which wrongs alone could tame;

Oh, shame on her false friends, on her stern
foemen—shame!

Shame on her false friends, who, dimly bribed,
Deserted honour, truth, and innocence!

And mingled with the sleek and servile tribes,
Who can with ill but their base gains dispense!

'Gaiest when th' oppressed can have no safe

defence,

And in whose favour the dark shield of power
Is lifted over, to encompass
The fawning sycophants of the royal power,
The heartless sycophants of Fortune's shining hour.

Shame on her foesmen!—was there sought to soothe,

In women's gentle names, their careless rage?
A woman, tortured from her very youth,
Even till her hair was silver'd off by age;
Oppressed and slandered through life's every stage?

Foul stain on Albion's 'scutcheon!—a disgrace
—That will stand darkly on its record's page—
Oh, had she lived for kindness to eruse
Of all her early pains the deep-indented trace.

It had been happier for all!—but she Has left us—and the hour that was her last,
Saw none of kin—no tie of family

To soothe her wounded spirit as it past
From this cold scene of sorrows that had cast
A cloud upon her life that darkened then;
No child was there—no husband with kind haste

To calm her in that dread hour's trying pain,
When all but such a love is worthless, weak,
and vain.

Yes, she has left us!—long her soul opposed,
With gallant firmness, deep indignity;
But all is over now—the scene is closed,
And this ill-fated Queen no more shall be
The victim of her foes' malignity;
Love need no longer sigh—nor life be galled;
She soars above all love or enmity,
And her ascent for most, even if faults she had,
She had been deeply wrong'd—no need as die
the bad.

The only treasure that she still had left,
She died possess'd of—all a nation's love!
Of this proud boon she could not be bereft,
Although to wreck this last hope Malice strove—

She died possessing what alone must prove
The virtues of her character,—the true
And tried affection of those who, above
All others, knew and served her best—the few Who clung to her unchang'd, thro' changes and new.

She sank with gentleness into the grave
Which lengthen'd sorrows had prepared for
her;

And long will be lamented by the brave
And good, who know that all who live must err,—

And who protected the lone wanderer,
When there were none beside her rights to guard;

And when their fearless virtue could confer
But danger on themselves—the sure reward
Of all who seek the course of tyrants to retard.

Peace to her spirit!—and in lofty places
May her sad fate a warning lesson be!

So she, 'whose virtues, talents, gentle graces,
Were formed to charm and win society,
But whom deep griefs pursued unceasingly,
Will not have borne her weight of woe in vain;
May—mercies in her fate a lesson see,
Which bear to trace may not left this strain,
But which they ought to feel and ponder o'er in pain!

THE CRUSADER.

SIR HUBERT'S steel was at the gate,
His gallant spear stood by,
When forth the knight and his lady came,
A tear bedew'd her eye:

'Now fare thee well, beloved one,

My dear and youthful bride,

For many a long and weary mile,

Imma, thy love, must ride.—

'Oh! promise, Sir Hubert,' the lady said,

'Thou wilt be true to me,

Nor break thy faith for eastern maids,

Thou beautiful they be;

For they tell me many a warrior bold,

Whose truth was once as thine,

Has forsworn his love, his faith and all,

In holy Palestine.—

'Yet doubt me not,' the knight replied,

'I swear by thy sweet blue eyes,

Sooner than grieve thy trusting heart,

Willingly I would die.

Then cheer thee sweet, for the time flies on,

To trust me I shall be true—

One kiss, one long and parting one,

God bless thee!—and adieu.

Soon he is journeying far away

From his love and his native land;

To the Syrian shore the knights are gone,

To join his own true band.

Bold and brave were the warriors all,

Fighting for faith and fame,

And fear would seize the Moslem troops

When they heard Sir Hubert's name:

He saw those many a beautiful maid,

With raven hair and eyes,

But their charms the knight he would not heed,

But coldly pass'd them by;

He thought but of his tender bride,

Yet e'en that thought was pain;

Perhaps, perhaps he ne'er may meet

Her lovely eyes again.

Thus day, that dawns so pure and bright,

Whom the man can tell,

Ere even, how many gallant forms

May bid this world farewell.

And now is the din of battle heard,

Furious is the strife,

The chargers neigh, the trumpets sound,

They fight for death or life.

Sir Hubert is foremost in the strife,

The ground with blood is red;

Yet he spurs his steed and rushes on,

O'er heaps of slain and dead,

He seeks the chief of the Moslem host,

Who scatters death and woe;

And now he has met, in mortal strife,

His proud and laughing foe.

Sudden they close, scarce stay for breath,

They trust to spear and shield;

The Mussulman is bold and brave,

The Christian will not yield.

Oh! long and dubious was the fight,

They bore them gallantly;

Yet, at last he fell the Moslem lord,

'Our lady and victory.'

Sir Hubert was sorely wounded, too,

Earth swam before his eye,

He sank and fainted on the ground,

Alas! and must he die?

His faithful page his master bore,

Beneath an aged tree,

And stanch'd the blood and wip'd his brow,

Then wept this sight to see:

'Roland, kind youth,' Sir Hubert said,

'Nay, weep not, boy, for me;

Do thou bear my corpse to England's shore,

There let me buried be.

And tell my love the vow I made'

I never did forget—

To die without one look from her,

Is all that I regret.

Tell her, if I thought of her sweet form

When in the arms of death,

And blest and prayed for her alone,

With my last parting breath.

He ceased—for his cheek was wan and cold;

His gallant spear lay still,

And the proud and bold Sir Hubert now

Is one among the dead.

They bore his corpse o'er land and sea,

And when evening waxed late,

They came before his castle high,

And stood beside the gate.

Oh! where is Imma to weep on the bier

Of her true and faithful knight?

Oh! why is she the last to mourn

At this afflicting sight?

Alas! alas! her gentle form

Had bow'd before the blast;

With her the evils of this world

Are over now and past.

She had heard the tale that her lord and love

Had fallen before the foe,

And to linger here when her hope was gone,

Was bitterness and woe;

Her wounded spirit droop'd and died

As a flower of the plain,

Its sweetness and its beauty gone,

Never to bloom again.

And now she looks so wan and pale,

Her eye no longer bright;

Those orbs of sweet celestial blue

Are quenched and closed quite.

But her spirit has soared beyond the sky,

Where sorrow is at rest,

And the dearest friends may meet at last—

In regions of the blest.

ELIZA.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—Mr. Moucricff's comedy of Wanted a Wife, has been very judiciously converted into a farce, by cutting out the under-plot, and reducing it into two acts. The spirit and the humour of the piece being thus condensed, the whole has been considerably improved, and was performed with much applause. We do not promise it immortality, but we think it may become popular. The Coronation does not lose any of its attractions, but draws crowded houses every night.

ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.—The active manager of this theatre continues to produce novelties in rapid succession. On Thursday night, a new melo-drama, in two acts, was performed for the first time, entitled The Miller's Maid. It is founded on Bloomfield's poem of that name; and does not differ essentially from the original story, which is very simple. The author has adapted it to the stage with considerable effect; but those acquainted with the poem will know how nearly it approaches a very dangerous point, and we are sorry that the dramatist has dwelt on it much more than was either necessary or proper. The bare suggestion of the possibility of a brother and sister, ignorant of their kinship, being in love with each other, would, we believe, be sufficient to counteract the passion, however violent; but here the brother dwells on the hope, and exacts a condition on the mere chance, of its not being so. Mr. T. P. Cooke as George, and Miss Kelly as the Miller's Maid, played with much feeling, but the principal attraction of the evening was Mr. Emery, from Covent Garden Theatre, in the part of Giles. The character would have failed in almost any other hands, but with him it had the most powerful effect. His strong attachment for the Miller's Maid, rendered almost ferocious by rivalry, and restrained only from the most violent excesses, by a strong moral feeling and an innate goodness of heart, were portrayed with the utmost truth and force. Mr. Bartley was quite at home in the kind-hearted Miller, and Harley made as much as any one could of a very unnatural and constrained character. The scenery is good, and the piece was completely successful.

The Bee.

*Floriferis at apes in solibus omnia limant,
Omnia nos itidem depascitur aurea dicta.*
LUCRATIUS.

Preachers.—A young ecclesiastic, who was remarkable for his affected pronunciation and unseemly gestures, preached in a town in one of the provinces of France. The next day he called on the president, and complained that the officers of his jurisdiction had quitted his sermon to go to see a comedy. 'These gentlemen,' said the president, 'must have very bad taste to leave you for country comedians.'

A preacher had completely wearied all his auditors in preaching on the beatitudes. A lady, who had endured the penance, could not avoid observing to him, after sermon, that he had forgotten one. 'Which is that?' replied the preacher. 'That of those who were so fortunate as not to hear your sermon,' was the reply.

Oliver Cromwell kept his fanatics in order in his own way, for when one of them waited upon him, as he said, in the name of the Lord, to know the destination of one of his fleets, Cromwell said, 'My good friend, the Lord shall know, for thou shalt go with the fleet,' and immediately gave orders for having him stowed in the hold of one of the vessels then under sailing orders.

Authors.—Antiquities, says Dr. Johnson, like every other quality that attracts the notice of mankind, has undoubtedly votaries that reverence it, not from reason, but from prejudice. Some seem to admire, indiscriminately, whatever has been long preserved, without considering that time has sometimes co-operated with chance; all, perhaps, are more willing to borrow past than present excellence; and the mind contemplates genius through the shades of age, as the eye surveys the sun through artificial opacity. The great contention of criticism is to find the faults of the moderns and the beauties of the ancients. While an author is yet living, we estimate his powers by his worst performance; and when he is dead, we rate them by his best.

To run, the Hoop.—An ancient marine custom. Four or more boys, having their left hands tied fast to an iron hoop, and each of them a rope, called a nettle, in their right, being naked to the waist, wait the signal to begin, i. e. a stroke with a cat of nine tails, given by the boatswain to one of the boys; he strikes the boy before him, and every one does the same; at first the blows are but gently administered, but each irritated by the strokes from the boy behind him, at length lays it on in earnest.

Dun.—Dun, an importunate creditor; dunny, in the provincial dialect of several countries, signifies deaf; to dun, then, perhaps, may mean to deafen with importunate demands. Some derive it from the word donner, which signifies give, but the true original meaning of the word owes its birth to one Joe Dun, a famous bailiff, of the town of Lincoln, so extremely active and so dexterous in his business, that it became a proverb, when a man refused to pay, why do you not dun him? that is, why do you not set Dun to arrest him! Hence it became a cant word, and is now as old as since the days of Henry the Seventh. Dun was also the general name for the hangman, before that of Jack Ketch.

And presently a halter got,
Made of the best strong hempsteeper,
And e'er a cat could lick her ear,
Had tied it up with as much art,
As Dun himself could do for heart.

A Narrative of the Campaigns of the British Army at Washington and New Orleans, under Generals Ross, Pakenham, and Lambert, in the Years 1814 and 1815, with some Account of the Countries visited.—By an Officer who served in the Expedition. 8vo. pp. 377. London, 1821.

THE late war in America was not only more painful in its character (and every war with that country must be painful) but more unfortunate in its results, than any in which Great Britain has been engaged since that which terminated in the independence of that country. This was principally owing to the magnitude of the contest in which we were engaged in Europe, and to our carrying our contempt of the American moral character to its resources and power as a military nation. A predatory warfare is the only one to be successfully waged against the United States,—a war of dashing enterprise and not of procrastinated operation. The author of the volume before us expresses himself well and clearly on this point in his concluding remarks, and as they have our entire approbation as to the policy, although we should regret the necessity of resorting to the plan he recommends, we shall quote them. He says,

‘We have long been habituated to despise the Americans, as an enemy unworthy of serious regard. To this alone it is to be attributed that frigates half manned were sent out to cope with ships capable of containing them within their hulls; and to this, also, the trifling handfuls of troops dispatched to conduct the war by land. Instead of five hundred, had ten thousand men sailed from the Garonne under General Ross, how differently might he have acted! There would have been then no necessity for a re-embarkation, after the capture of Washington, and consequently, no time given for the defence of Baltimore; but, marching across the country, he might have done to the one city what he did to the other. And it is thus only that a war with America can be successfully carried on. To penetrate up the country amidst pathless forests and boundless deserts, and to aim at permanent conquest, is out of the question. America must be assaulted only on her coasts. Her harbours destroyed, her shipping burned, and her seaport towns laid waste, are the only evils which she has reason to dread; and were a sufficient force embarked with these orders, no American war would be of long continuance.’

The author has some ingenious reasoning on this subject, in refutation of the objections to his plan, that it would distress individuals and not the government:—

‘They who offer this objection, forget the nature both of the people whose cause they plead, and of the government under which they live. In a democratical government, the voice of the people must at all times prevail. The very members of the House of Representatives are the persons who, from such proceedings, would suffer most severely, and we all know how far private suffering goes to influence a man’s public opinions. Besides, the very principle upon which the advocates for the sacredness of private property proceed, is altogether erroneous. I admit, that, in absolute monarchies, where war is more properly the pastime of kings, than the desire of subjects, non-combatants ought to be dealt with as humanely as possible. Not so, however, in states governed by popular assemblies. By compelling the constituents to experience the real hardships and miseries of warfare, you will soon compel the representatives to a vote of peace; and surely that line of conduct is, upon the whole, most humane, which puts the speediest period to the cruelties of war.’

But, not to dwell on what may be done in a future war, which we hope is far distant, it is our business to speak of the past. The author of this Narrative appears to be an intelligent and impartial observer, who details the facts with fidelity, and comments upon them with acuteness. His work is judiciously divided into letters, since it has nothing of the character of epistolary correspondence, but is an uninterrupted Narrative ‘formed from the substance of a journal kept with considerable care during the progress of the events which it records.’

The work is stated to be a ‘Narrative of the Affairs at Washington,’ &c. but the author devotes upwards of sixty pages, at the commencement, to an account of Bourdeaux, Bayonne, and other places in France, through which the expedition marched previous to its final embarkation for America. This reminds us of the early historians, who, before they commenced an account of the particular country on which they were to write, began with the creation of the world, and continued its subsequent history to the foundation of their own country. We ought not, perhaps, to quarrel with our author on this account, since his introductory letters are interesting. Speaking of the ravages of war, he says,—

‘I am not one of those who love to evince their sensibility by mourning over unavoidable evils; neither, indeed, would it be consistent with my present views and profession so to do; but, in truth, I cannot help observing, that war, when stripped of its parade and excitement, and softened down by all the alleviating circumstances of which it is capable, is a fearful thing. One experiences no regret at seeing the most splendid mansion consumed to ashes, provided it be set on fire by our own shells, and to dislodge the enemy; one has no reluctance in treading down corn-fields, destroying orchards, and ruining in one day the labour of months, as long as the hurry and madness of a battle continue. But when this has died away, and the calmness of repose returns, he who can look with indifference upon the ravages which he has himself contributed to produce, must be either more or less than man.’

This is in a good tone of feeling, and shows that our soldier can feel as well as fight. Without stopping to notice any thing in France, or the embarkation of the troops, we shall accompany our author to St. Michael’s, where he describes a romantic scene with great eloquence and a felicitous power of description:—

‘Descending the mountain, on which we had paused for a few minutes, to glut our eyes and satisfy our curiosity, we arrived at a small hamlet, or rather a group of two or three hovels, as romantically situated as it is possible for the imagination of man to conceive. They stood at the further end of a sort of recess, formed by the hills, which are here broken into a circular valley, cut off, to all appearance, from the rest of the habitable world; behind them rose a towering crag, as perpendicular as the drop of a plummet, from the top of which a little rivulet came tumbling down, giving to the scene an appearance of the most delightful coolness, and amusing the ear with the unceasing roar of a water-fall. From the very face of the cliff, where there seemed to be scarcely soil enough to nourish a thistle, numerous shrubs and dwarf trees protruded themselves; whilst above it, and on every side of the area, the hills were covered with wood, interrupted now and then by the bald forehead of a blackened rock. In front of the hamlet again, there was an opening sufficient to admit the most delicious glimpse of the ocean; and through this the stream, after boiling for a while in a little basin, which it has excavated for itself out of what resembles the foundation of the cliff, makes its way, brawling over a clear pebbly bottom, till it joins the sea.

'This paragon of valleys, and masterpiece of nature's handy-work, burst upon us as such scenes, to be witnessed with advantage, ought to do, without the slightest warning or expectation. The road by which we approached it, being completely shut in with wood, and winding considerably to aid the descent, brought us out nearly at the gorge of the vale, so as to throw the hamlet, the cliff, and the water-fall, into the back ground; and, as the whole was of such extent as to be taken in at one glance, the effect was striking beyond any of the kind I ever witnessed.'

When at Bermuda, where the expedition touched, our author, who seems to have been very active in seeing every thing worthy of notice, with a party visited the two celebrated caves in one of the little isles. After breakfast, he says,

'We supplied ourselves with torches from some dry branches of the calash tree, and, headed by a guide, moved towards the mouth of the nearest and largest of the two caves. We descended into this by a ladder of sixteen steps, and arrived upon a broad ledge of rock, where we halted for a few minutes to light the torches, and accustom our vision to the gloom; when both of these ends were attained, and we had advanced a few paces into the cave, a sight of the most indescribable sublimity burst upon us. The appearance was that of a huge Gothic cathedral, having its roof supported upon pillars of spar, moulded into the most regular shapes, and fluted and carved after the most exact models of architecture. The roof itself, however, was too lofty to be discerned, nor could the eye penetrate to anything like an extremity, all beyond a certain extent being wrapped in the most profound darkness. But the flashes of light at intervals streamed out, as the glare of the torches fell upon pieces of spar as clear as crystal, and the deep echo of our own voices as we spoke, inspired us with a feeling of awe, bordering upon superstition. It is in such a situation as this, that the poorness and insignificance of human labour, most forcibly strikes the mind. The most magnificent church and abbey, with their sculptured pillars and vaulted ceilings, were thought of as mean in comparison of what was now before us; nay, one could not help imagining, that these very churches and abbeys had been built in humble imitation of this, which looked like a temple reared by some beings more powerful than men. It seemed a shrine worthy of the geni of old, while yet they were in the zenith of their glory, and ere they had been driven from their thrones and oracles of darkness, by the light of Christianity.

'As we moved onward, we found the sides of the cave gradually narrow upon us, and the roof became lower and lower. There was, however, a continuance of the same fine-like appearance to the last, though growing more and more contracted; till, finally, we were compelled to advance one by one, and to stoop in order to prevent our heads from coming in contact with the rock. We had now gone as far as it was possible to go with any degree of comfort, and were informed by the guide, that we were upwards of three hundred yards from the entrance, when we found it expedient to wheel about, and to return to the open air. But the effect of so sudden a change from darkness to light, was exceedingly disagreeable; inasmuch, that we hastened into the smaller cave, as well for the purpose of deferring the moment of suffering, as to continue our search after the sublime.

'The entrance to this cavern is extremely dangerous, and not to be ventured upon without either a trusty guide or a thorough knowledge of the ground. After descending a ladder, not quite so deep as that which leads into the larger cave, you arrive at the brink of a fearful chasm, across which, a flat stone, about two feet in width, is laid, connecting the edges by a bridge of four or five feet in length. It is very fortunate that this frightful bridge is of no greater extent, for if you should chance to slip, or lose your balance whilst upon it, nothing could save you from being precipitated into the gulf. To what depth this chasm may reach, the guide could not inform us; but that it is considerable, we discovered, by dropping a large stone, which we could hear for some time as it dashed against the projecting edges of the rock, and at length splashed, with a tremendous echo, into water. The man maintained, that the sea beat under the foundation of the island as far as the spot where we now stood, and his story was rendered at least probable, by the number of pools of salt-water, which we met with in the interior of the cave.

'After having visited the larger cavern, this certainly appeared to disadvantage; but, had I beheld it first, or without seeing the other at all, I should have believed that nothing upon earth could surpass it for grandeur and beauty; the only respect in which it is inferior to the other, being its size. The spar is as clear, and proportionably as abundant; the pillars are quite as regularly formed; and it has even an advantage over its rival in two or three broken columns, which give to it the semblance of a temple in ruins. There is, also, in this cave, a strange propinquity of salt and fresh water pools; the situation of two of which struck me as peculiarly curious. They were divided from each other by a piece of rock not much thicker than a man's hand; and yet the water from the one tasted as if it had been taken from the German ocean, while that from the other was as fresh and pleasant as possible.'

The army having landed in the United States, its first operations were directed against Washington, to which it met with no other obstruction than a slight affair at Bladenburgh, in which the Americans were defeated. General Ross first sent in a flag of truce with terms,

'But whatever his proposal might have been, it was not so much as heard; for scarcely had the party bearing the flag entered the street, than they were fired upon from the windows of one of the houses, and the horse of the general himself, who accompanied them, killed. You will easily believe, that conduct so unjustifiable, so direct a breach of the law of nations, roused the indignation of every individual, from the general himself down to the private soldier. All thoughts of accommodation were instantly laid aside; the troops advanced forthwith into the town, and having first put to the sword all who were found in the house from which the shots were fired, and reduced it to ashes, they proceeded, without a moment's delay, to burn and destroy every thing in the most distant degree connected with government. In this general devastation were included the Senate-house, the President's palace, an extensive dock-yard and arsenal, barracks for two or three thousand men, several large store-houses filled with naval and military stores, some hundreds of cannon of different descriptions, and nearly twenty thousand stand of small arms. There were also two or three public rope-works which shared the same fate, a fine frigate pierced for sixty guns, and just ready to be launched, several gun brigs armed schooners, with a variety of gunboats and small craft. The powder magazines were of course set on fire, and exploded with a tremendous crash, throwing down many houses in their vicinity, partly by pieces of the wall striking them, and partly by the concussion of the air; whilst quantities of shot, shell, and hand-grenades, which could not otherwise be rendered useless, were thrown into the river. In destroying the cannon, a lac-thod was adopted, which I had never before witnessed, and which, as it was both effectual and expeditious, I cannot avoid relating. One gun of rather a small calibre, was pitched upon as the executioner of the rest; and being loaded with ball, and turned to the muzzles of the others, it was fired, and thus beat out their breechings. Many, however, not being mounted, could not be thus dealt with; these were spiked, and having their trunions knocked off, were afterwards cast into the bed of the river.

'All this was as it should be, and had the arm of vengeance been extended no farther, there would not have been room given for so much as a whisper of disapprobation. But, unfortunately, it did not stop here; a noble library, several printing offices, and all the national archives were likewise committed to the flames, which, though no doubt the property of government, might better have been spared.'

Of the American President we have an amusing anecdote, with which we shall conclude for the present:—

'That gentleman, as I was credibly informed, had gone forth in the morning with the army, and had continued among his troops till the British forces began to make their appearance. Whether the sight of his enemies cooled his courage or not, I cannot say, but, according to my informer, no sooner was the glittering of our arms discernible, than he began to discover that his presence was more wanted in the senate than with the army; and having ridden through the ranks, and exhorted every man to do his duty, he hurried back to his own house, that he might prepare a feast for the entertainment of his officers, when they should return victorious. For the truth of these details, I will not be answerable; but this much I know, that the feast was actually prepared, though, instead of being devoured by American officers, it went to satisfy the less delicate appetites of a party of English soldiers. When the detachment, sent out to destroy Mr. Maddison's house, entered his dining parlour, they found a dinner-table spread, and covers laid for forty guests. Several kinds of wine, in handsome cut-glass decanters, were cooling on the side-board; plate-holders stood by the fire-place, filled with dishes and plates; knives, forks, and spoons were arranged for immediate use; in short, every thing was ready for the entertainment of a ceremonious party. Such were the arrangements in the dining-room, whilst in the kitchen were others answerable to them in every respect. Spits, loaded with joints of various sorts, turned before the fire; pots, saucepans, and other culinary utensils, stood upon the grate; and all the other requisites for an elegant and substantial repast, were exactly in a state which indicated that they had been lately and precipitately abandoned.

'You will readily imagine, that these preparations were beheld, by a party of hungry soldiers, with no indifferent eye. An elegant dinner, even though considerably over-dressed, was a luxury to which few of them, at least for some time back, had been accustomed; and which, after the dangers and fatigues of the day, appeared peculiarly inviting. They sat down to it, therefore, not indeed in the most orderly manner, but with countenances which would not have disgraced a party of aldermen at a civic feast; and having satisfied their appetite with fewer complaints than would probably have escaped their rival gourmands, and partaken pretty freely of the wines, they finished by setting fire to the house which had so liberally entertained them.'

Memoirs of James the Second, King of England, &c. &c. Collected from various authentic Sources. 2 Vols. 12mo. pp. 607. London, 1821.

KING James the Second was one of those individuals of whom history has drawn a very unfavourable, and, in some respects, a very erroneous character. He was neither the worst nor the weakest of the Stuarts; and, although he has been branded as a coward for abandoning the kingdom at a time that his affairs were by no means desperate, yet it is notorious, that, in early life, he was not only the bravest of the brave, but so skilful a general, that he was recommended by the great Marshall Turenne, as worthy to succeed him in commanding the armies of France.
